[B] GOD set a Mark on him, to prevent his being killed by any one that met him. It is not agreed what this Mark was. There are some, who imagine God imprinted a Letter on Cain's Forehead, and that this brand was the safe Conduct, by virtue of which this Vagabond might pass to and fro upon the Earth, without fear of being slain; and that this Letter was taken either from the Name of Abel (5), or the ineffable Name of God (6), the Tetragrammaton, which was of so much Efficacy: but others think it taken from the Word Repentance, that every one might see Cain repented. Others say, that this Mark consisted of the three Letters, which compose the Name of the Sabbath, or that it was the Sign of the Cross (7); whilst others tell us, that the Dog, which guarded Abel's Flock, was given to Cain for a perpetual travelling Companion (8), either that Men might perceive by this Sign, that they were not to attack Cain, or that, being conducted by such a Guide, he might avoid all dangerous Roads (9). Others imagine, that all his Forehead and Face were covered with the Leprosy (10); others, that his Mark was only a wild Aspect, with bloody Eyes, rolling in a horrid manner (11). Others say he became subject to such a trembling, that he could hardly lift his Food to his Mouth (12). The Septuagint favour this Sentiment; for they have not translated it: Thou shalt be a Vagabond and a Fugitive, but, Thou shalt be doleful and trembling, σένων και τρέμων. Some say, that, in whatever place he rested, the Earth shook round about him (13). What Visions! In short, some of them tell us, he had a Horn grew on his Forehead (14), not one of those metaphorical Horns, which later Ages have attributed to those Husbands, who have been dishonoured by the Infidelity of their Wives; but a Horn, properly so speaking, which served as a Signal for all Men to avoid him; Fenum habet in cornu, longe fuge (15). Metaphorical Horns would have served only to aggravate his Punishment; it was what the Ancients prayed might light upon Evil doers, as appears from a Passage in Job (16); but Cain's Mark was intended him for his Benefit: it was to be his Safeguard.

touch upon a great many things of this Nature, relating to him: but if I were to mention all the rest, I should never have done. What a deal has been said about the Reasons, for which it is pretended his Offering was rejected by God [C]? Who would ever have thought Josephus capable of giving this Reason for it, viz. that Cain did not, like his Brother Abel, offer things of a natural Production, meaning Animals, but those things, which the Labour and Avarice of Man force out of the Earth, that is, Grain and Fruits (c)? Would not one say, that a Jew, who reasons at this rate, has forgot the Elements of his Religion. Were not the Offerings of the first Ears ordained by the Law of Moses? If the Reasons alledged by Philo (d) were attested Facts, they would be much better than this of Josephus. This last Author says one thing, which is very probable, viz. that Cain grew never the better in his Exile, but, on the contrary, much worse (e): He gratified his Passions at the Expence of others, and enriched himself, by all manner of Violence, with the Spoils of his Neighbours. Josephus attributes to him the Invention of Weights, Measures, and Boundaries of Land. These things were needful amongst a People, whom Cain's Example had accustomed to all sorts of Injustice [D]. One cannot precisely say how many Brothers and Sisters he had when he killed Abel; but they are certainly in the wrong, who affirm there were then but four Persons in the World [E]: For supposing it true, as some will have it (f), that Cain was

[C] What a deal has been said about the Reasons, for which it is pretended his Offering was rejected by GOD? It is guess-work, 'tis beating the Air, to trouble ourselves about the external Defects that might be in Cain's Offering. Perhaps nothing was wanting in that Respect (17); perhaps he had forgot nothing but a good Disposition of Heart, to which principally God has regard. We see St Paul attributes Abel's Superiority over his Brother (18) only to his Faith. However, three grand Faults are found in Cain's Offering. I. That he was too tardy in making it: II. That he did not offer the First-fruits: III. That he did not make choice of the best. It was Philo, who first made this Censure. The ancient Fathers have mostly fallen in with it; for to say nothing of St Ambrose, who, in this Point, was a great Follower of Philo, St Cyril (19) accuses Cain of having reserved for the gratification of his own Appetite, and for his Pleasures, the choicest Fruits the Earth yielded him, allotting to God the very worst, such as the slenderest Ears of Corn, and worm-eaten Apples (20); for they have defended to these Particulars. How often have they, who make choice of the ugliest and most stupid of their Daughters for the Convent, reserving the sprightly and beautiful for the World, been compared to Cain, both from the Press and the Pulpit? And yet is there any thing less certain than St Cyril's Assertion? Is it not evident that Philo is mistaken as to his first Defect: since the Scripture observes, that Abel did not offer the Firflings of his Flock, till Cain brought the Fruits of the Ground. I shall observe, by the by, that this retrograde Verse, Sacrum pingue dabo, nec macrum sacrificabo, is Politian's. These Words are in a Picture representing the Sacrifice of these two Brothers, which is to be seen in the first Cloyster of Madonna Nova at Florence: The two Brothers are placed, in regard to the Inscription, in a Position proper for each of them to make out his own Sense from it (21).

[D] Whom Cain's Example had accustomed to all sorts of Injustice. Josephus affirms, that Cain was a voluptuous Man, and a Robber, and that his Descendants grew worse and worse. Add to what he hath said the Description (22) that Methodius has given us of the Manners of that Race, and you will find there is very good Reason to compare the City of Enochia, built by Cain, to that, which a certain Macedonian King built for a receptacle of all sorts of wicked and dissolute People; whence it was called Poneropolis. Impiety so horribly prevailed among the Descendants of Cain, that, not content to defile one another's Marriage-Beds, and enjoy their Mistresses in public, and in the Sight of all who had a mind to see them, they broke through the Laws of Nature, and abandoned themselves, Men and Women, to the Sin of Non-conformity. 'Furere mortales ac ruerer lymphatis si miles in quidquid dictu scriptuque sœdum est, ac non sufficientibus ad probra nocturnum tenebris aut eubiculorum solitudinibus, connectere turpitudini dierum spatia, populique præsentiam & oculos infanda consuetudine sœdare. . . . Sed illius temporis longius adhuc multo sunt abrepta dedecora, quam quæ finibus limitibusque naturæ continerentur. Superaret fidem, nisi Methodius affirmaret, auctor sane gravis ac sanctus, copiosè jam tum quod postea divinus Paulus deploravit in idolotaris, ut in masculos masculi turpitudinem exercebant, & in feminas feminae, Lesbii flammis exardescerent (23). . . . Men like mad Creatures ran headlong into all manner of abominable Uncleanness; and the Darknes of the Night, and Privacy of a Chamber, not sufficing for their scandalous Actions, would oft their Filthiness in open Day, and, in the Presence and View of the People, practise odious Familiarities not to be named. — But the shameful Practises of that time were carried to such a length, as far exceeds the Bounds and Limits of Nature. It would be incredible, were it not asserted by Methodius, a grave and holy Author, that even then was introduced the Practise, which St Paul bewails in Idolaters, that Men with Men acted that which is unseemly, and Women burnt with Lust to Women. All these things were done before the World had continued more than Six hundred Years. The Author, I just now cited (24), recites the very Words of Methodius, as he found them in his Brother Raderus's Notes upon the Chronicle of Alexandria. I shall here take notice of a thing, which is but too usual; when once a Man is grown scandalous for his ill Actions, the very Good he does shall be condemned: of this Cain is an Example. Nothing could be more useful in a City, so irregular as his, than Weights and Measures; and yet Josephus has very inconsiderately condemned him for introducing the use of them. He has confounded things very easy to be distinguished. Because Weights and Measures have not the Air of Honesty and Simplicity, therefore he thought, that they, who first invented them, destroyed the ancient Candour of Mankind, and taught them Tricks and new Ways of deceiving: and yet who sees not that, on the contrary, the Corruption preceded the use of Weights and Measures, and that they were introduced of necessity, as a Remedy against Cheating. Cain did in this as other Tyrants are used to do; who, after they have opened the way to a thousand Disorders, make however wholesome Laws to stop the Progress of them. In short, Josephus had something else in his Head when he wrote this.

[E] That there were then but four Persons in the World. This Error is very ancient. St Augustin refutes it in his eighth Chapter of the fifteenth Book De Civit. Dei, and in his first Question upon Genesis. And yet St Ambrose, far from refusing it, has run headlong into it, in this Apostrophe he makes to Cain; 'Cur nescis ubi est frater tuus? Soli eratis cum duobus parentibus, inter paucos frater te latere non debuit (25). — Why dost thou not know where thy Brother is? You were only two, and your two Parents; among so few thou shouldst know where thy was but thirty Years old when he committed this Murther, this does not hinder but Eve might have had many Children in that time. I will conclude with an old Tradition concerning Cain's Death. Being very decrepit and blind, say they, he was sitting one Day in a close Thicket (g). Lamech (b), who was then a hunting, being advised that something stirred in the Bush, ran thither, and, fancying some Beast was lodged there, let fly an Arrow, and killed Cain. Some (i) place this Event about the Year of the World 701. Others refer it to 875. Father Salian (k) is of this last Opinion, and faith he agrees therein with Pererius and Torniel: From whence we may conclude, by the way, that Mr Moreri had no Reason to say, that, according to Torniel and Salian, the Murther of Cain, by Lamech, happened in the Year of the World 688. Tostatus (l) makes Cain to have lived near 800 Years. Some pretend he was killed by the fall of a House (m), and place his Death under the Year 931. Paulus Burgenfis (n), who will have it that he died in the Universal Deluge, did not confider that that was to make him almost 1656 Years old. Some there are, who say he killed himself (o), and have the Impertinence to conclude from thence, that GOD did not keep his Word with him, because, say they, he promised him that no Man should kill him. It is not true that GOD's Promise was so exprest; it only regarded those, whom Cain seemed so much afraid of, that is, those who should find him in his Exile.

(b) We shall speak more amply of this when we come to the word LAMECH.

'thy Brother is.' A Rhetorical Figure void of Reality. Many of the Moderns have fallen into the same Error; amongst whom are Burman and Cunæus. 'Ecclesiæ primæ incunabula mundus vidit recens natus, cum in quatuor capitibus flaret humanum genus. Confestim enim impurus genius, cui ex malis nostris jucunda voluptas est, Cænum à recta pietatis semita transversum egit in omne nefas. — Gregem oppido exiguum, hoc est, quatuor oves in tanta mundi vastitate agebat magnus ille pastor: unam ex his lupus hic abstulit (26). — The new created World saw the Infancy of the first Church, when the Race of Mankind consisted of four Souls. For presently the unclean Spirit, who delights in our Ills, turned Cain aside out of the direct Path of Piety, into all manner of Wickedness. — The great Shepherd fed a very small Flock, of only four Sheep, in the wide World, and one of them this Wolf carried off.'

It is true, Burman seems to have left himself a hole to creep out at: 'Cain, faith he (27), in killing Abel, destroyed a fourth part of the People that are recorded to have been then in the World.' If one should press him, he will say he has by no means excluded those, whom the Scripture thought not fit to mention. It is a weak Subterfuge, far less worthy of a Man of Sense than this Reflexion of the same Author; 'As wide as the World was, said he, it was too narrow for these two Brothers. One might quote here that Verse of Juvenal, Sat. x. ver. 168.

Unus Pellææ juveni non sufficit orbis.

One World sufficed not the Pellæan Youth.

and many Thoughts of that kind; but they are more proper to be placed under the Article of ALEXANDER. Our Poet Malherbe ought to be brought in here, as guilty of the Error which I have confuted: 'He had, faith his Historian, a great Contempt for Mankind in general: and after having given an Account of Cain's Sin, and the Death of his Brother Abel, he said, A very fine Beginning! There were but three or four Persons in the World, and one of them must needs kill his Brother. What, after this, could GOD expect from Mankind? Had it not been better at that Instant to have put a final End to the whole Race?'

CAINITES [A], a Sect of Heretics who appeared in the IId Century, and were so called because of their great Respect for Cain (a) [B]. These People took their abominable Doctrines from the filth of the Gnostics (b), and were the Spawn of Valentinus, Nicolas, and Carpocrates. They supposed a great Number of Genii, which they called Virtues or Powers, and who they said were stronger one than another. They pretended, that the Virtue, which produced Abel, was of an Order much inferiour to that which produced Cain (c), and that was the reason that Cain prevailed over Abel, and killed him [C]. They professed an Honour for those, whom

[A] CAINITES.] They may likewise be called Cainians. Tertullian calls them Cainæus (1), and Caianam hæresim (2). They were called Cainians by many of the Fathers (3), before St Epiphanius made use of the Word Kaiavoi. Danæus (4) therefore had no reason to imagine, that St Austin, in calling them Caianos, had been misled by an Error of the Copists of St Epiphanius. Danæus, unable to find any Analogy in the Formation of Kaiavoi, believed that St Epiphanius termed them Kaiavoi, or Kaiyoi, and that the Copists, by mistake, made it Kaiavoi. But all this will come to nothing, if we consider that Caiani was in use before St Austin and St Epiphanius. The Reader may take notice, that these Heretics are also called Caians in French.

[B] A Sect. — so called for their great Respect for Cain.] These People were so senseless as to affirm, That the Divinity, which commands in the Heavens and upon the Earth, being resolved to punish Cain for the Murther of Abel, could never catch him, having neither strength nor swiftness sufficient for that purpose. At last, some Æthereal Powers protected him from the Pursuit and Vengeance of that God, transported him to the Firmament, and hid him in a Place of Surety, in Superno seculo (5), in the Regions above, as they expressed it. The Author, I have cited, quotes no Body.

[C] They pretend that the Genius of Abel was inferiour to that of Cain, and that was the Reason why Cain prevailed over Abel, and killed him.] This is very conformable to the Doctrine of the Heathens, touching a particular Genius that attends every Man. This sort of Genii were principally called Demons (6). They pretended that every Man's Fortune depended on his Tutelary Genius; the Man was happy whose Genius was very powerful; on the contrary, he was unhappy when his Genius was weak, and could not make head against the Genius of other Men. Every Genius laboured for the Interest of his Client; and whenever a Man was beaten, it was a certain Mark that the Conqueror's Genius had been too hard for his. One of these Genii happened to be of an Order inferior to the other; which was the Effect of Chance: for as the Souls that were sent into this World were drawn by Lot, so was likewise the Tutelary Genius of every Person (7). There were some Genii, whose ascendancy over some others was such, that their very Presence confounded them.

whom the Scriptures brand with the most visible Marks of Reprobation, such as the Inhabitants of Sodom, Esau, Corab, Dabban, and Abiram. They had in particular an extraordinary Veneration for the Traytor Judas, under Pretence, that the Death of JESUS CHRIST was the Salvation of Mankind: For they imagined, I know not what Powers, Enemies to our Salvation, which would have hindered JESUS CHRIST from suffering, had not Judas prevented the Effects of their Malice, by delivering his Master up to the Jews, who condemned him to Death, from whence sprung the Salvation of Mankind (d). They carried their Presumption to such a Height as to condemn the Law of Moses, and look upon the God of the Old Testament, as a Being who had sown Discord in the World, and subjected our Nature to a thousand Calamities; so that, in order to be revenged on him, they, in every thing, acted contrary to his Commandments. There was no bodily Uncleaness which they did not plunge themselves into, no Sin they did not think they had a Right to partake of; for, according to their abominable Principles, the way to Salvation was diametrically opposite to the Precepts of Holy Scripture; they imagined every sensual Pleasure had some Genius presiding over it, and therefore they never failed, while they were preparing themselves for any unseemly Action, to invoke, by Name, the Genius presiding over the Pleasures they were going to taste. When we read these things in the Fathers of the Church, one can scarce forbear thinking that the Case was the same with them in respect to Heretics, as with the Heathens in respect to Christianity. The Heathens imputed to Christianity an hundred Extravagances, and Abominations, that had no Foundation. The first who forged these Calumnies, were undoubtedly guilty of the blackest Malice; but the greatest part of those who vented them abroad, after they had been so maliciously sown, were only guilty of too much Credulity, they believed common Fame, and never troubled themselves to dive into the bottom of it. Is it more reasonable to believe, that the Fathers did, with all the Patience requisite, thoroughly inform themselves of the real Principles of a Sect, than it is to believe, that those very Men, who held, that JESUS CHRIST, by his Death, was the Saviour of Mankind, should at the same time hold, that the beastliest Pleasures are the ready way to Paradise? Let who will decide it: I am here no other than a bare Relater. But it must be remembered, that there is no Absurdity of which the Mind of Man is not susceptible; and that, in particular, the Doctrine of many Genii, and those good and bad, superior one to the other, and appointed to divers Offices, is agreeable enough to Reason [D]. The Cainites forged a pretended Holy

REFLECTIONS upon the Heathen System of a multitude of Gods.

This effect had that of Augustus on Marc Antony's:
Ὁ σὸς δαίμων τὴν τέταρτον αἰτίαν, καὶ γὰρ οὐδὲν ὄν καὶ ὑψηλὸς ὅταν ἡ κατ' αὐτὸν, ὅπ' ἐκείνου γίνεται ταπεινότερον ἐγγίσαντα καὶ ἀγε-νέστερα (8). Thy Genius stands in awe of his; it is bold and lofty when alone; but at his approach becomes humble and fearful. And thus we see certain Persons, who, in the Absence of some others, are witty, speak well, and rally finely; but when they are to enter the Lists with them seem much embarrassed. It was without doubt believed, that they who became Emperors were attended by a Genius of an eminent Order, from whence proceeded those great Honours which were paid to such Genii (9). Nations and Cities had likewise their particular Genii (10). Now as they held that these Tutelar Demons presided over the Birth of those who were to be under their Direction, there wanted but a small Remove to pass from this Opinion into that of the Cainites. The latter only added, that every Genius formed the Body of him he was protect. The Platonists, I believe, would have been easily reconciled to them, that the Formation of a human Body requires the Direction of a very excellent Intelligence. See Bar- tholus's Notes upon Rutilius Numatianus (11), concerning these Tutelar Genii. If this Hypothesis is not absolutely necessary, for assigning the Reason of an infinite Number of Historical Phenomena (if I may so term human Events), 'tis at least the most commodious and comprehensible. The Reader will be less surprized at this Observation, which seems foreign, and too much like a Digression, I say he will be less surprized, if he examines diligently the Scope of the following Remark.

[D] The Doctrine of many Genii, — is agree- able enough to Reason. We turn into ridicule the System of the ancient Heathens, their Niades, their Oreades, their Hamadryads, &c. and we are much in the right, when we condemn the Worship they paid to those Beings; for we know, from the Scripture, that God forbid all sort of Religious

Worship, which was not addressed directly and entirely to himself. But if we represent to ourselves human Reason left entirely to itself, and destitute of the Assistance of Holy Writ, I think it very easy to apprehend, that it must conceive this vast Universe as penetrated throughout by a Power exceedingly active, and conscious of it's own Actions. Now, in order to give some Account of so many Effects in Nature different from, nay even contrary, to one another, it was necessary to imagine, either one single Being diversifying his Operations according to the diversity of the Subjects, or else an infinite Number of Souls and Intelligences provided each with a certain Employment; some having charge of the Sources of Rivers, others of Mountains, others of Woods, &c. There were some among the Heathens, who, in the Worship of Ceres and Bacchus, intended no more than to honour the supreme Being,
as the Producer of Corn and Wine. Others of them pretended to worship that particular Intelligence, who, in the Distribution of the Intendencies of the Universe, had the care of the Corn Fields and Vineyards assigned him. This Foundation being once laid there is no knowing where to stop, the Number of Gods is constantly multiplying in infinitum: Sacrifices are offered to Fear, to Fevers, to fair Winds, to Tempells:

Taurum Neptuno, Taurum tibi, pulcher Apollo, Nigram hiemi pœudem, Zephyris felicibus al-bam (12).

A Bull to Neptune, an Oblation due;
Another Bull to bright Apollo stew;
A Milk white Eve, the Western Winds to please;
And one Coal black, to calm the stormy Seas.

There rises a Hierarchy of innumerable Degrees.
The Combinations of Interests are infinitely diversified among these Intelligences, which tho' invisible are allowed to be very active Causes. If it be Holy Scripture (e). They had, among other Books, a Gospel of Judas, and an Ascension of St Paul. In this last, they pretended to have those unspeakable Things which that great Apostle saw and heard, when he was taken up into the third Heaven.

(e) Vide Baronium ad Ann. 145, n. 16, & Dancum in August. de Hæresib. cap. xviii.

asked me what I mean by this Reflexion so far fetched, I shall answer, I am opening the way for those, who will undertake to defend the Fathers, who stand accused of having imputed to the Heretics an hundred Absurdities which no Body held. 'Tis not so unlikely as one would imagine, that Men, who thought they reasoned well, should admit of many Principles, some good, the others bad, and a perpetual Contrast between Beings of an unequal Power, and different Inclinations. 'Tis a great Error, I must confess, but it presents itself several ways, and it is an easy Matter to fall into it. I am apt to believe, that the Gnostics, and such like People, expressed themselves so confusedly, that it is very possible some things may have been honestly charged on them, which they never allowed as Part of their Belief; and yet I am persuaded, that they owned, in the main, those Powers and Principles, which it is said they did. Then, by consequence of Reasoning, after having established this Variety of Powers, they might suppose the Jewish Nation governed by a mischievous Being, and pass from thence into all those abominable Impieties ascribed to them, concerning the God of Abraham, Ishac, and Jacob. But further, (since we have gone so far) the Belief of Intelligences, charged with different Employments throughout the Universe, is of as large Extent, as the Belief of a Deity; for I believe there never was a People who had any Religion, but thought there were mediate Intelligences. The most subtle Philosophers, he who is called the Genius of Nature (13), the most sagacious Cartesians, have all acknowledged some. The Aristotelians do even at this Day, unawares, imply them in every thing; for they place in each Body a substantial Form, to which belong a certain Number of Qualities, whereby it accomplishes it's Desires (14), repels the Enemy, and preserves itself the best it can in it's Natural State. Is not this to admit in Plants, an Intelligence appointed to make a Part of the Universe vegetate, and operating for that end, under the Direction of the Supreme Being? They who deny a Creation, the Spinozists, are so far from being able to get clear of these Intelligences, that there is no System whatever, which more necessarily and unavoidably implies them than theirs. This might easily be proved upon them, but that it is not proper in a Book of this Nature. In the System of a Creation, 'tis very difficult to admit of Intelligences prone to Evil, and who, according to the Whimfies of the Cainites, preside over sensual Pleasures, like the Venus of the Heathens, who, by the Confession even of the Epicurean Poet, presided over the Pleasures of Love (15). But from a System that denies any Creation, it necessarily follows, that Evil may exist as well as Good, and that there may be mischievous Genies as well as beneficent ones.

Left I should be thought to have advanced without Grounds, what I just now mentioned of the most able Cartesians, I desire the Reader to observe, that he among them who is the greatest Stickler for the simple and general Wills of God (16), insinuates evidently, in several Passages throughout his Works, that there is an infinite Number of Occasional Causes which we are unacquainted withal. Now these Occasional Causes are no other than the Wills and Desires of certain Intelligences: They must necessarily be admitted, where the Laws of the Communication of Motion are not capable of producing such or such Effects. This will carry us a great way; 'tis impossible to conceive how those Laws should be sufficient for the Building of a Ship. Every Body will allow that Motion alone, without the Direction of some particular Intelligences, could never produce a Clock: Consequently those Laws are unable to produce the least Plant, or smallest Fruit; for there is more Art in the Construction of a Tree, or a Pomegranate, than in that of a Ship. We must therefore have recourse to the particular Direction of some Intelligence for the Formation of Vegetables, and with much more reason surely for that of Animals. Talk of the Laws of Motion, of Figure, Rest, the Situation of the Particles, as much as you please: This is good, whilst a Man is under Forty Years of Age; but after that, you see the most excellent Cartesians confess ingenuously, that they begin to doubt of the Sufficiency of these Principles. They understand then their Categories as they ought (17). 'Tis true, say they, this will serve to make a Tree or a Clock to be what it is: but as Motion alone, by it's general Laws, has not, nor could cause the Parts of the Clock, to acquire the Figure and Position they now have; let it not be thought, that the Parts of a Tree have obtained their Situation and Figure by the meer Laws of Motion. Once more this goes very far, and leads us to a Genius presiding over animated Machines. But are Minerals, and Meteors easily made? Is there not a great Artifice in their Construction? Greater than can be imagined. The School-Men, instead of a Genius, or Intelligence, make use of these Words, Forma substantialis, & Virtus plastica, &c. But Words alter nothing.

Badin has a Passage which shows he allowed of these Genies, whose Business was not only to preserve, but even to produce all Sublunary Beings. There is some Consistency in this Supposition; for the best way to engage an Intelligence to protect a corporeal Creature, is to entrust it with the Care of it's Make; I mean, of applying Motion, according to the Ideas it has of the Form of that Creature, as Clock-makers and Architects do. These are Badin's Words. 'Quemadmodum in Republicâ bene constitutâ non minus sunt necessarij carniſices, lictores, vespillones, quàm Magistratus, ac Judices, & Curatores: sic in hac Republicâ mundanâ Deus ipse ad rerum generationem, procuracionem, ac tutelam Angelos locis omnibus cœlestibus, elementaribus, animantibus, stirpibus, fossilibus civitatibus, provinciis, familiis, singulis hominibus Principes, ac Moderatores collocavit; neque hoc tantum, sed etiam ministros, lictores, vindices, ultores locis omnibus disposuit, qui nihil injussi faciunt, nec pœnas ullas de hominibus consceleratis sumunt, nisi rebus judicatis, & plenè cognitis (18).

— As in a well constituted Commonwealth, Executioners, Lictors, and Barriers of the Dead, Beadles, and Sextons, are no less necessary, than Magistrates, Judges, and Guardians; so in this Commonwealth of the World, GOD himself, for the Generation, Preservation, and safe Guard of all Things, hath every where appointed Angels over all Beings, Heavenly and Elementary, over Animals, Vegetables, Fossils, Cities, Provinces, Families, and every single Man, for Princes and Governours; and not only so, but likewise has placed every where, Ministers, Beadles, Punishers, Avengers, who do nothing without Order, nor inflict any Punishment on wicked Men, without judging and fully knowing their Actions.

(17) They are contained in these two Verses: Mens, mensura, quies, motus, positura, figura, Sunt cum materiâ cunctarum exordia rerum. i. e. Mind, Measure, Rest, Motion, Position, Figure, are the beginnings of all things. Observe the Spiritual Nature, Mens, at the Head of all. It ought to be considered here as a transcendental Nature, que vagatur per omnes categorias. — Which runs thro' all the Categories

CALCHAS, Son of Thestor (a), attended the Grecian Army to Troy, in quality of Chief Soothsayer; for in those Days such an Officer was as necessary to an Army as a General. All the World knows he foretold that the Siege of Troy would last ten Years, and that the Fleet, detained by contrary Winds in the Port of Aulis, would not set sail 'till Agamemnon had sacrificed his Daughter to Diana. Homer makes frequent mention of him, especially in the Quarrel betwixt Agamemnon and Achilles. It is said, that Calchas, after the taking of Troy, retired to Colophon, where he died of Grief, for that he could not foretel what another of his Profession, called Mopsus, had foretold. We shall speak more fully of this Dispute in the Article of Mopsus. Then was that Prediction, mentioned by Sophocles (b), accomplished, which imported, that, whenever Calchas met with an abler Man in Divination than himself, he would lose his Life. If Mopsus had been as little skilled in his Art as that other Soothsayer, who, upon seeing Calchas planting a Vine, would needs instruct him, he had not been the Cause of the fulfilling of the Oracle: he would only have made Calchas laugh a little too much (c). The Scene of this Adventure lay in the same Place with the Dispute with Mopsus [A]. If one may trust Suidas, one of the Sibyls was Calchas's Daughter, viz. she who was called Lampusa [B], to whom he ascribes several Oracles in Verse. He also calls her Colophonian.

(c) Servius in Eccl. vi, ver. 72.

[A] The Scene of his Adventure, with the Soothsayer — lay in the same Place with the Dispute with Mopsus. [Viz. In a Grove consecrated to Apollo of Claros, near the City of Colophon. I cannot conceive why Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, should say it was at Samos, apud Samum (1). I shall in another Place (2) take notice of their Error in making Mopsus the Affiant, whereas the two Authors they quote, Hesiod and Pherecydes, say, 'twas Calchas (3). Calpin committed the same Mistake.

[B] Suidas says, one of the Sibyls was Calchas's Daughter, viz. she who was called Lampusa. [The ingenious Mr Musard (4) has given us the Portrait of this Daughter of Calchas, in the Two hundred and twenty fifth Page of his Historia Deorum fatidicorum.

The Inscription under it makes her Calchas's Daughter, and Priestess of Apollo. The Discourse, which accompanies the Figure, tells us there were many Prophecies of the Sibyl Lampusa. Strabo is quoted for it; but it ought to have been Suidas. Mr Blondel (5) has criticized upon Suidas, under pretence, that Calchas being an European, there is no reason to think his Daughter should be of Colophon. This is an Objection of no force; for the Sibyls did not always prefer the Name of the Place, where they were born, to that where they established themselves to deliver Oracles. Besides, why might not Calchas probably fix himself in some Asian City, after the Siege of Troy?

CALDERINUS (JOHN), Professor of the Civil-Law at Bologna, where he was born, and where he died about the middle of the XVIth Century. See, above, the Article ANDREAS (JOHN) (a).

(a) Remark [E].

CALDERINUS (DOMITIUS) taught polite Learning, with great Reputation, in Rome, towards the latter end of the XVth Century. He was born at Calderia, near Verona (a). He was a self-conceited Critic, and treated his Adversaries too rudely (b) [A]: Besides, he was a Man of no Religion [B]. He thought Impudence and Cunning the only way to preserve the Reputation he had in the World for his Learning [C]. He died very young [D]; in the Year 1477 (e): The

[A] He treated his Adversaries too rudely. [This we have from Paulus Jovius. 'Peraceras, scilicet be (1), sed juvenuti maxime utiles cum æmulis similitudines exerceat. Ambitioso quidem, & nimis aculeato dicendi genere, ex alienâ inficitâ (dum intemperanter perstringit atque remordet) nomen querens. — He kept up very sharp Feuds of Emulation, which are of great Benefit to young People. Indeed, by lashing and reflecting too severely, he sought to build his Reputation on the Ignorance of others, in too conceited and satirical a Manner.' His Friend Volateranus could not but own him guilty of this Fault. 'Hujus ego quamquam eram familiaris vitium unicum livoris atque obsecrationis in omnes pene doctos non præteribo, dignus præterea, ut de Cælio Quintilianus ait, vitâ longiore, ac ingenio meliore (2). — Though he was my Friend, I must not conceal his only Fault of ill Nature, and Conjurioseness, towards Men of Learning in general; so that, as Quintilian said of Cælius, he deserved a longer Life, and sweeter Temper.' Latomus plays upon him for it in an Epitaph of Calderinus. See Jovius.

[He went as seldom to Mass as he could possibly, and whenever he went, for Company sake, at the Solicitation of his Friends, Come, said he, let us go see the Public Error. Domitius Calderinus ne missam quidem volebat audire, & quam ab amicis eo duceretur dixisse fertur, eam ad communem errorem (4). Which gave Politian an occasion for this Epigram.

I have seen some Books of Controversy composed by Protestants, wherein Calderinus has his Place among the Witnesses of the Truth, viz. among those enlightened Persons, who, in the midst of Popery, could discern the Abuses of the Roman Communion. A very worthy Witness indeed!

[C] He thought Impudence and Cunning the only way to preserve the Reputation he had — for Learning. [See what Politian tells us. 'Auctoritas tam magnæ fuit, ut Romæ inter Professores juvenis adhuc primam sibi celebritatem vindicaverit: cujus tuendæ ac retinendæ gratia factum compluries putamus, ut in suis operibus frontem perficeret, & per æqua per iniqua famam captans parum ex fide quæpiam retulerit; nonnulla etiam male fœlers, & præstigiis, speciem quidem primorem veri habentia magno credentium dispendio sententis ignorabilibus implicuerit, & pulverem, quod aiunt, oculis offuderit: aut sicubi major difficultas nec absistens nec congregiens spem lectoris eluserit. by all Methods right or wrong: Some things also, which had an Appearance of Truth at first sight, he with great Art and Cunning would disguise with his obscure Interpretations, so as to mislead the credulous; and, as they say, throw dust in their Eyes: or in more difficult Subjects, by neither giving them up, nor engaging about them, he would disappoint the Expectations of the Reader. So that while he endeavoured to prove he knew every thing, he would advance Falsities far beyond those of the Cretes and Parthians. There can be no better Description given of an impudent Boaster. Whenever this Man saw himself embarrassed in any great Difficulty, he would neither fight nor yield. This puts me in mind of the Knavery of some Informers, who will neither retract nor make good their Accusation.

[D] He died very young. At Thirty Years of Age, if Leander Albertus (6), and Volaterranus (7) may be credited. Boissieu saith at Thirty four (8): but since he observes that Domitius writ a Comment upon Ovid's Ibis, in 1495, he should not have said that this Critic died so young: for it is impossible that a Man, who published a Commentary in 1474 (9), should write another upon Ovid's Ibis in 1495, and yet be but Thirty four Years old when he died. He died of the Plague, as some say (10); but, as others, of a continual Fever, after having ruined his Constitution by too much Study. 'Ætate laudeque florentem, sed imbecilli stomachi temperaturam nimis lubricationibus extenterem, quum digna multis seculis opera conciperet, rapida febris eripuit' (11).

I have often wondered at the ill Custom of Writers of Elegies: They frequently forget the Year the deceased was born in, and that in which he died, with many other such Chronological Points. I have searched into the Cause of it, and find it cannot be the Love of Brevity, which occasions this Omission (for one Sheet of Paper would contain five or six hundred Dates of this Nature), but downright Idleness; they cannot call to mind these Circumstances, and will not take the Pains to inform themselves about them.

[E] He was the first who attempted to comment on the difficult Poets. Volaterranus asserts it: 'Ac vir ingenio, saith he (12), PRIMUS qui hoc tempore Poetas durissimos diligentius cepit enarrare, & in eos commentarios edere admodum juvenis. — A Man of a penetrating Judgment, the FIRST who at that time undertook to explain more carefully the obscure Poets, and publish Commentaries upon them, while he was yet a young Man.' Calderinus himself, in his Preface to Statius, says, 'Incidi in libros 5. Silvarum Papinii Statii, opus granditate heroica sublime, argumento varium, doctrinâ remotissimum, quod nemo ante nos aut ausus est aut potuit attingere. — I happened upon Papinius Statius's Silvæ, in five Books, a very sublime heroic Work, of great Variety of Subject, and Difficulty of Doctrine, which no body before me durst or could attempt.' This Work came out in the Year 1475 (13): See Barthius's Commendation of it (14).

CALENUS (OLENUS), the greatest Soothsayer of his Time, in all Etruria. He had like to have put a Trick upon the Roman Embassadors in an Affair of the greatest Importance, if his Son had not taught them the necessary Precautions. Tarquin the Proud ordered him to be consulted upon a Prodigy: In digging the Foundations of a Temple he was going to build to Jupiter, on the Tarpeian Mount, a human Head was found. He thought he ought to proceed no farther without consulting what this might presage. He sent for the Soothsayers of his own Kingdom; but they told him it was beyond their Art to explain, and that he must address himself to the Prophets of Etruria. They named to him the most famous, to whom Tarquin immediately sent his Deputies. Calenus, understanding that this Prodigy betokened an extraordinary good Fortune, endeavoured to deprive the Romans of this glorious Advantage, and to secure it in favour of Etruria. He had gained his Ends, had not the Deputies, forewarned of his Intentions, carefully avoided being misled in their Answers to his Interrogations (a) [A]. I shall explain this curious Particular in a Remark.

(a) Taken out of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, lib. iv, cap. lxvi, lxvii; and Pliny, lib. xxviii, cap. ii, pag. 558.

[A] He had gained his Ends in deceiving the Romans, had not their Deputies — avoided being misled in their Answers to his Interrogations. Pliny mentions this, to prove that one Word is sufficient to change Fate. Here is the whole Passage: 'Multi vero (Auctores sunt) magnarum rerum fata & ostenta verbis permutari. Cum in Tarpeio fodientes delubro fundamenta, caput humanum invenissent, missi ob id a se legatis, Etruriæ celeberrimus vates Olenus Calenus præclarum id fortunatumque cernens, interrogatione in suam gentem transferre tentavit, scipione prius de terminata templi imagine in solo ante se: HOC ERGO DICITIS ROMANI? HIC TEMPLUM JOVIS OPTIMI MAXIMI FUTURUM EST: HIC CAPUT INVENIMUS: constantissima Annalium affirmatione, transiit fuisse fatum in Etruriam, ni præmoniti a filio vatis legati Romani respondissent: NON PLANE HIC, SED ROMÆ INVENTUM CAPUT DICIMUS (1). The Example is very home. Here is a Man's Head discovered in the Foundation of the Capitol. They had dug a great Depth before they met with this Prodigy, the Head of a Man, just killed, still warm and bloody (2). Men, less superstitious than the Heathens, would have found a Mystery in this. It was really an Omen, that the Place, where that Head had been dug up, would, in time, become the Head of all Italy (3); but, by a sophistical Juggle, the Privilege, allotted by the Destinies to that Place, might be transferred to another; and if Tarquin's Messengers had forgot to name Rome, and the Tarpeian Mount, when the Soothsayer asked them, Is it not here the Prodigy was found? they had lost the Command of Italy, and the Omen had been turned to the Advantage of the Etrurians. Calenus endeavoured to put a Trick upon them; for after they had informed him of the Nature of the Question, he drew with his Staff a Circle upon the Ground, and drawing a right Line towards the East, Here, said he to the Messengers, stands Mount Tarpeius; here is the East, there the South, there the North, and here the West; Is it here, or is it there, the Head of a Man was found? If they had answered, it is here, the Advantages, promised by Fate, had passed over to the Etrurians, and the Place where Calenus stood would have been the Seat of the Italian Monarchy. But the Deputies were upon their Guard, and constantly answered, It is not here this Head was found, but in the Tarpeian Mount in Rome. Calenus's Son had before given them this Caution: My Father, said he, will tell you the Meaning of this Prodigy without any Falshood; for a Lie is not allowable in his Profession; but take particular care how you answer his Questions. Behold a fine Piece of Morality: Here is a Prophet who made Conscience of telling a Lie, in the Interpretation of a Prodigy; but never found the least remorse in laying Snare for those, who came to consult him, and deceiving them by Equivocations and captious Questions.

It

It is no wonder the Heathens believed a Fatality attending certain inanimate Things; for since the Idea they had of God did not exclude any Imperfection, they were not confined from attributing to their Deities any Caprice whatever. They might therefore believe them capable of setting their Affection upon an Image, a Shield, &c. i. e. of granting certain Favours to any Nation, which should be successively possessed of that Image or Shield, &c. But this Combination of the Destinies is incompatible with the Grandeur of a Sovereign Being acting immediately. The Occasional Causes of the Cartesians might afford some sort of Solution in case of Necessity. But however this may hold with the Palladium of Troy, or Numa's Amulet, we have in this Affair of the Capitol a particular Absurdity; for is it possible to imagine that a Benefactor, how capricious soever he be, should change his Resolutions through the frivolous Subtleties of a Soothsayer? He is pleased to give the Empire of Italy to that City, where a Man's Head should be found under the Earth: You are of that City, and ingenuously tell the Soothsayers in another Place, who show you the Figure of your Country, Here is the Place where the Head was found; from this Moment, you have lost your Prerogative, and the Italian Empire is translated from you to that Place. What can be more monstrous? I make no doubt but Pliny, at the bottom of his Heart, laughed at these Fopperies; yet he reports them in a very serious Manner: Hæc fati sint, faith he (4), exemplis ut appareat, ostentorum vires & in nostra potestate esse, ac prout quæque accepta sint, ita valere. — Let this be sufficient to shew, by Example, that the Effects of Prodigies are in our own Power, and take place just as they are understood.

CALIGULA (CAIUS CÆSAR), Emperor of Rome, succeeded Tiberius, Anno Christi 37. He was the Son of Germanicus and Agrippina, and degenerated in so abominable a manner, that he made even the Reign of his Predecessor lamented (a): This is saying every thing. They who have affirmed that Nature made choice of him, in order to convince the World how far it could extend it's Power on the wrong Side [A], have judged very right. There is great Reason to believe, that a superiour Force, I mean a Physical Cause, encreased the moral Depravity of this Emperor [B]. The Philtre they gave him, deprived him in a manner

[A] Nature made choice of him, in order to convince the World how far it could extend it's Power on the wrong side. So have I taken the Liberty to translate these Words of Seneca (1). 'C. Cæsar quem mihi videtur rerum natura (2) edidisse ut ostenderet quid summa vitia in fortuna possent. What he faith in another Place, is altogether as emphatical; Nature, faith he, produced him to the Disgrace and Ruin of Mankind: 'Non possum — hunc præterire ex omni Cæsarum numero excerpendum, quem rerum natura in exitium opprobriumque humani generis edidit (3).'

[B] A Physical Cause encreased the moral Depravity of this Emperor. Fools and Madmen have a Privilege to sin with Impunity, at least in regard to human Laws. For they do not hang up a distracted Wretch, who breaks his Chains, and murders the first Man he meets with? The most violent Enemies to all Revolutions of States in general, in which lawful Sovereigns are deposed, allow it to be necessary, when the Wickedness of the Prince is incorrigible; or, which amounts to the same thing, when it proceeds from a Disorder of the Organs, from some Bodily Distemper, or, in one Word, from some Physical Cause. The Question is, whether Caligula's Fury was of this Nature. It is very likely that the Philtre, they gave him, added to his natural Perverseness, and raised it to a Fierceness mechanical and irresistible, if I may be allowed, upon this Occasion, to make use of a Term consecrated to the Efficacy of Grace. Juvenal attributes Caligula's bloody Phrenesies to the Malignity of this Philtre:

tamen hoc tolerabile, si non Et furere incipias, ut avunculus ille Neronis, Cui totam tremuli frontem Cæsonia pulli

DRYDEN.

Suetonius not only says, that this Philtre made him mad, but attributes the contrary Passions, with which he was distracted, to a Distemper of the Mind. He observes, that this Prince rested but little, and that a thousand extravagant Visions persecuted him in his Sleep. 'Mentis valetudinem & ipse senferat: ac subinde de secessu deque purgando cerebro cogitavit. Creditur potionatus à Cæsonia uxore, amatorio quidem medicamento, sed quod in furorem verterit. Incitabatur in somnia maxime: neque enim plus quam tribus nocturnis horis quiescebat: ac ne his quidem placida quiete, sed pavida miris rerum imaginibus: ut qui inter cæteras, pelagi quondam speciem colloquentem secum videre visus sit. Ideoque magna parte noctis vigiliæ cubandique tædio, nunc toro residens, nunc per longissimas porticus vagus, invocare identidem atque expectare lucem consueverat. Non immerito mentis valetudini attribuerim diversissima in eodem vitia, summam confidentiam, & contra nimium metum (5). — He himself observed his Head was out of Order, and had now and then some Thoughts of keeping within, and purging his Brain. It was believed his Wife Cæsonia had given him a Love Potion, which had distracted him. He was much troubled with Dreams; and never slept above three Hours in a Night: nor then quietly, but terrified with strange Representations; having once, among other instances of that Kind, fancied himself conversing with the Sea. So that being tired with lying awake great Part of the Night, he used sometimes to sit right up in his Bed, and sometimes to get up and walk about his Galleries, impatiently wishing for and expelling the Light. I think it but just to ascribe to a distempered Brain, his contrary Excesses of Boldness and Cowardice.' I confess that Tiberius, who, being a very wicked Man himself, but withal as great a Hypocrite, was very capable of judging of the wicked Inclinations of another, foretold that Caligula would prove a Plague to Mankind (6). I do not deny therefore, but that Caligula was naturally of a very pernicious Disposition; but he might have been able to conceal and correct manner of his Free-Will : So that, if the Romans had even deposed him in Form, I do not know what Advantage the Enemies to Monarchy could have drawn from such a Proceeding. The Corruption of his Soul appeared very early ; for he was but yet a Boy, when he was surprized in the Act of Incest with one of his Sisters (b) [C]. He debauched them all, and kept one of them publicly, as his Wife [D]. But as we ought to do Justice to all the World, I must needs say, I think they do him wrong, who accuse him of Incest with his own Daughter [E]. He was as great a Blasphemer as ever lived. He was so exactly obsequious to his Grand- father, and those about him, that it has been justly said of him, There never was a better Servant, nor worse Master. Yet his natural Temper was cruel and abusive, &c. Which shows, that though, on certain occasions, he discovered the Fierceness of his Tem- per, yet he could be Master of himself, and govern his Passions by his Reason, whenever he had a Mind to it. If we enquire into his Conduct after this, we shall find in it the Symptoms of a Distemper, and the Marks of a Madman.

[C] He was yet but a Boy, when he was surprized in the Act of Incest with one of his Sisters.] See, above (8), the Article of ANTONIA: You will there find in the Margin (9). Suetonius's Words which prove this Fact; as you will likewise in the following Remark.

[D] He kept one of his Sisters publicly as his Wife.] He had three Sisters, who all passed thro' his Hands: but Drusilla was always his Favourite: it was with her his Grandmother Antonia sur- prized him in the Fact, and it is she we mean in the Text of this Remark. The Sorrow he ex- pressed at her Death, and the Divine Honours he ordered to be paid her (10), are not the least Extravagancies of his Life. As for his other Sisters, he prostituted them to his Catamites; and afterwards punished them under the Pretence of Treason and Adultery: * Cum omnibus fororibus suis stupri con- suetudinem fecit, pleneque convivio singulari- fra se vicissim collocabat uxore supra cubante. Ex his Drusillam vitasse virginem prætextatus ad- huc creditur, atque etiam in concubitu ejus quon- dam deprehensus ab avia Antonia apud quam simul educabantur. Mox Lucio Cassio Longino consu- lari collocatam abduxit, & in modum justæ ux- oris propalam habuit. Hæredem quoque bonorum atque imperii æger instituit. — Reliquas forores nec cupiditate tanta nec dignatione dilexit, ut quas sæpe exoletis suis poltraverit. Quo facilius eas in causâ Æmilii Lepidi condemnavit quasi adulteras, & infidiarum adversus se conficias (11).

[E] I think they do him wrong, who accuse him of Incest with his Daughter.] He satisfied his Lewdness with his own Sisters; and to ap- pear yet more prodigiously incestuous, he de- bauched a Daughter he had by one of them. This is what we find in the Abbot de Marolles's Translation of Eutropius; but I fear he did not rightly understand the Original. These are Eutro- pius's own Words: Stupra fororibus intulit, ex una etiam natam filiam cognovit (12). I am very much mistaken if the true Sense of those Words be not this; He conversed incestuously with his Sisters, and even owned himself Father of a Daugh- ter which one of them was delivered of. I am very sensible that the Latin Phrase cognoscere fœminam, may be proved, by Examples, to signify sometimes the enjoying a Woman; but, besides that these In- stances are rare, I cannot see any appearance why Eutropius, on such an Occasion, should use it in that Sense. That was not a proper Place for such decent and ambiguous Expressions: he had used the Word stuprum, speaking of a Brother with his Sister, and would surely, in the same Sentence, never have mentioned a Father with his Daughter in more palliating Terms. With Casaubon's (13) leave, I find no grounds for it. I add, that the usual Signification of cognoscere gives a good Sense to Eutropius's Words; for it was a new Degree of Impudence, to own, for his Daughter, a Child he had by his own Sister. To conceal an incestuous Commerce is paying some Regard to the Public; which is proportionably greater or less, according as that Commerce is made more or less a Secret: but to own, and father, the Children which are the Fruit of such Commerce, is defying the whole World. I do not object to Mr de Marolles, that Caligula was never reproached with the de- bauching his own Daughter; for my Construction of Eutropius is no more founded upon other Histo- rians, than his Translation. Eutropius is the only one I know, who takes notice of this Acknowledg- ment or Incest; which makes me very much suspect the Truth of his Observation. An Emper- or, who died before he was Twenty nine Years old, had a Daughter by his own Sister, grown up to Years of Maturity, and she also debauched by him, or boldly, and without reserve, owned by him for his Daughter from her Cradle, is a thing too extraordinary to be taken notice of only by Eutropius.

(13) He takes the Word in the same Sense with Mr de Marolles. See his Notes on Sueton. in Calig. cap. xxiv. Con- rad. Dieterici in Vita Calig. pag. 29, does so too.

Observe that, according to all Appearance, his first Commerce with his Sisters did not begin 'till after he went into his Grandmother's Family; and being at that time eighteen Years old (14), it is impossible he could have a Daughter from that In- cest grown to Years of Maturity before his Death. If it be urged, that cognoscere is not so proper a Word for the Sense I understand it in, as agnos- cere (15); I answer, Eutropius is not an Author of so very great Exactness of Style.

[F] He believed there was a GOD, and trembled; and yet vented Blasphemies - - - against the Deity.] Here is a Passage of Calvin, which it will not be amiss to cite. * Nemo in audaciorem, aut effrænatio- rem numinis contemptum prorupisse legitur quam C. Caligula: nemo tamen miserius trepavit cum aliquod iræ divinæ indicium se proferebat: ita Deum quem studebat ex professo contemnere in- vitus exhorrescebat (16). — We no where read of a more presumptuous and daring Contemner of the Deity than C. Caligula: and yet no Body betrayed more wretched Instances of Fear on the least Appearance of divine Vengeance: So that he could not avoid dreading the very GOD he took such Pains to defy. This is founded upon Suetonius: He tells us, that the same Caligula, who pretended so great a Contempt of the Gods, crept under his Bed whenever he heard a loud Clap of Thunder. Qui Deos tantopere contemneret ad mi- nima tonitrua & fulgura convivere, caput obvol- vere, ad vero majora proripere se à strato sub lectum- que condere solebat (17). But we must observe, he was not always so timorous: sometimes he affected to be even with Jupiter, both as to his Thunder and Bolt: with the Noise of his Machines he would answer that of his Thunder, and when the Bolt was discharged from the Clouds, he would throw up Stones towards Heaven, and cry out to the Thunderer, Eiſter thou shalt take me out of the World,

Honours [G], nor, was there any one Crime which he made a Conscience of committing (c). The last of his four Wives was called Cæsonia; she was neither young nor handsome, and yet he loved her passionately; though sometimes, in the midst of his Cares, he gave her some Proofs of his cruel, barbarous Temper [H]. He had, by her, one Daughter, who perished with her Father and Mother, in Cassius Chærea's Conspiracy (d), Anno Christi 41. Lollia Paulina, another of his Wives, was never married to Caius Cæsar, the Son of Agrippa, as the learned Usher has imagined (e) [I]. Pbilo mentions a Thought of Caligula, well worth considering [K]. Seneca wonders how this Emperor could insult others, by his Railleries, while

 Torrentius will have it, that these are rather the Words of a fearful than of a daring Person; and immediately cites Suetonius's Account of Caligula's Fear of Thunder: Non tam comminantis quam timentis effe etiam, aut me occide, aut ego te. Exporfice autem Caium fulmina auctor est Suetonius (19). But this seems forced and unnatural. The Terms in question can never be supposed to come from a Coward;
 they contain a bloody Challenge, from one resolved to fight it out to the last drop, and neither give nor receive quarter. Seneca has ver-clearly explained it (20); 'Ad pugnam vocavit
 ' Jovem, & quidem sine missione, Homericum il-
 ' lum exclamans verum (21). --- He challenged
 ' Jupiter, very madly, repeating that Verse of ' Homer (21).' Another of his Impieties was, that at high Noon-Day he would approach Jupiter's Statue in the Capitol, that he might seem to converse with that Deity. Sometimes he would speak to him aloud, sometimes softly whisper into his Ear; and then, in his turn, he would put his Ear to Jupiter's Mouth. This Conversation never passed without high Words. One day he was heard to threaten Jupiter to send him back into Greece, εἰς γαίαν δαδανῶν πύθων ὅς. He boasted that Jupiter, by submissive Prayers, had prevented the Effects of this Menace, and obtained the Favour of being lodged with him; for which Reason, said he, I have built a Bridge between my Palace and the Capitol (22).*

[G] He arrogantly usurped all divine Honours. He would very often get in between the Statues of Cæstor and Pollux, where he would receive the Adoration of all Comers. He built himself a Temple, where were daily sacrificed to him the choicest Animals (23). Once he said he was Jupiter, and added, that for this Reason he had lain with so many Women, and with his own Sisters. Another time he was Juno, Diana, Venus, Bacchus, and clothed himself in the Habits of every one of those Divinities (24). He caused a College of Priests to be founded for himself, of which his Wife Cænonia and his Uncle Claudius were Members: None but the wealthier sort were admitted into it, and who paid a great Price for that Dignity. He had a mind to be his own Priest, and for that Reason became one of that College; and he admitted also his Horse (25).

[H] He loved Cælonia passionately; tho' sometimes, in the midst of his Careless, he gave some Proofs of his cruel Temper.] This Passage of Balzac will serve as a Commentary upon these Words.

' Those Beauties, says he (26), who are beloved
 ' by Tyrants, are not late. - - - Poppæa was first
 ' Nero's Mistress, then his Wife, and always his ' Governess: she had subdued, and tamed this ' Monster, and yet he broke loose from her in the ' end; and in one passionate Moment killed her
 ' by a Kick on the Belly. His Uncle Caius was ' not so rough with Cælonia; however, in the ' very height of his Love, these were, amorous Ex' pressions: This fine Head of your's shall be chopt
 ' off, as soon as I give the Word: And sometimes
 ' he would tell her he had a mind to put her upon
 ' the Rack, that he might confess what it was ' made him love her so passionately.' This is taken
 ' from Suetonius. ' Quoties uxoris vel amiculae col-

‘Ium exosculetur, addebat, tam bona cervix simul jacere demetur. Quin & subinde jactabat exquiritur se vel fiducialis de Cæsonia sua curam tantopere diligeret (27).’ It is very strange that this Woman, who was neither young nor beautiful, and had had three Children by her Husband, should inspire such a Brute with so vehement and constant a Passion. But let Youth value itself as it will, we shall find, if we observe it, that the Address and Arts of a Woman between thirty and forty will secure her Empire, when once she is Mistress of a Prince’s Heart, far better than the artless Beauty of a Girl of fifteen. Besides, Calpurnia’s Mistress, and so very probably have a great many others of the same Stamp, found out several Secrets which would amply repair the fading Charms of Youth. However it be, Suetonius seems to be of opinion, that Cæsonia was so very much admired for the warmth of her Constitution. He was so extravagantly fond of her that he would needs shew her naked to his Friends. ‘Cæsoniam neque facie insigni neque ætate integra, matremque jam ex alio viro trium filiarum, sed luxuriæ ac lasciviæ perditæ, & ardentius amavit, & constantius, ut sæpe clamyde peltea & galea ornatum & juxta adequitamentum militibus ostenderet, amicis vero etiam nudam (28).’ He never owned her for his Wife till after she had a Child by him: It happened to be a Girl, and was much beloved by him, and he knew her to be his own Daughter chiefly by this Mark, that she would be constantly scratching the Faces of her little Play-Fellows. ‘Nec ullo firmiore indicio ipsi feminis esse credebatur, quam seritatis, quæ illi quocunque tanta jam tunc erat, ut infestis digitis ora & oculos simul ludentium infantum incesceret (29).’ Sure he, who put her to that Death, the Plautius might have befal the Children of Babylon (30), might very well say, he was crushing a Serpent just hatched. Malis corvi malum ovis.

[1] Lollia Paulina, one of his Wives, was never married to Caius Cæsar as _____ Uther has imagined.] That which mislead Uther was, that he thought those Words of Suetonius, in the Twenty sixth Chapter of the Life of Claudius, Deque Lollia Paulina, quæ C. Cæsari nupta fuerat, ought to be understood of the Grandson of Augustus: but if he had observed two things, he had not fallen into this small Mistake. He should first have considered, that Suetonius, in the twenty fifth Chapter of the Life of Caligula, informs us, that this Emperor married Lollia Paulina, and a little time after divorced her. Secondly, That Tacitus, in the fortieth Chapter of the fourth Book of his Annals, tells us, that Caius Cæsar, Augustus's Grandson, married Livia, the Daughter of Druſus, and Sister of Germanicus, and died before her; for we know she was married afterwards to Druſus, the Son of Tiberius. I am obliged for this Observation to the learned Father Noris (31).

[K] Philo mentions a Thought of Caligula well worth considering. Let us see what one of our modern Authors has made of it. 'So far, says he (32), 'am I from wondering that every Prince is not so deserving as he ought to be, that I am rather surprized that they do not reason with themselves as Caligula did, and that our blind Submission to their Wills, how unjust soever, does not always excite in them an extravagant Presumption. As they, whose Buyness it is to look after Herds of Cattel, falsify this Madman *, are not Brutes like them, but are of a more excellent Nature; so they, who have an absolute Command over Men, and are obeyed by all, ought not to be esteemed meer Men like their Subjects, but Gods. This is the natural while his own Person was the most ridiculous Object in his Empire [L]. It must be because he thought no one durst take that Freedom with him, which he did with others. Or perhaps because he was ignorant of his own Imperfections. One of his most extravagant Follies was to call out upon the Moon, when she was at the Full, to come and lie with him (f). Nay, he bragged he had enjoyed her (g). What shall we say of the Order of Priesthood he conferred upon his Horse (h)? See the last Remark [M]. He was so fit to be the Original of that Man of Sin, that Antichrist, the Apostle has given us a Description of, that I do not wonder some ingenious Men have applied that part of the Prophecies of the New Testament to him (i): Though I cannot say they have been right in their Guesses.

We shall see in the Article MACRON, that the Intrigues of a certain Woman were very serviceable to Caligula, in his Advancement to the Empire. A Professor of Utrecht, has, in one of his Orations (k), given us a lively Description of the wicked Qualities and monstrous Actions of this Emperor.

'natural Effect our Flattery must have upon the Minds of Princes; and this is what generally happened in the time of Paganism.' That we may judge of the Difference between one Author and another, I shall shew how St. Remond has confounded all this. 'About this time, says he (33), flourished Caius, that eminent Philosopher, to whom is attributed this ingenious Apophthegm. He who is to command others, ought to be not only a Man, but more than Man; that is, much more virtuous and perfect than the rest; for as a Sheep is not intrusted with the Care of the Flock, so to govern Men, requires not a Man, but a GOD. Pastor Ovium, says he, non est ovium, sed capra sed homo, ergo hominum Pastor aliud quam homo esse debet, Quid ergo? Deus. Other wife he runs the hazard of destroying both them, and himself.' The Reader may take the Pains, if he please, to count how many Blunders there are in the Words of this honest Monk.

[L] He insolently ridiculed others by his Raileries, while his own Person was the most ridiculous Object in his Empire.] He was the most foul-mouthed Man breathing, and of the worst Figure. Pale, with hollow rolling Eyes, hairy necked, bald-pated, enormous Feet, and spindle-shanked. And yet, as monstrous as he was in his Make, he ridiculed all Mankind, and said the most shocking things imaginable: as when he openly told Valerius Asiaticus, at a full Table, the Faults he found with his Wife whilst he was enjoying her (34). Let us hear what Seneca saith upon it: 'C. Cæsar inter cætera vitia quibus abundabat, contumeliosus mirabiliter ferebatur omnibus aliqua nota feriendis, ipse materia rursus benignissima. Tanta illi palloris insaniam testantis fœditas erat, tanta oculorum sub fronte anili latentium torvitas (35), tanta capitis destituti, & emendicatis capillis asperis deformitas. Adjice obseffam fetis cervicem, & exilitatem crurum, & enormitatem pedum. Immensum est, si velim singula referre, per quæ in patres avosque suos contumeliosus fuit, per quæ in universos ordines: ea referam, quæ illum exitio dederunt. Asiaticum Valerium in primis amicis habebat, ferocem virum, & vix æquo animo alienas contumelias laturum. Huic in convivio, item in concione, voce clarissima, qualis in concubitu esset uxor ejus, objecti. Dii boni, hoc virum audire, Principem scire, & usque eo licentiam pervenisse, ut non dico consulari, non dico amico, sed tantum marito Princeps & adulterium suum narret, & fastidium (36)?' The Passage in Suetonius, which I have above quoted, shews that Valerius Asiaticus's Lady had a great many Companions in her Disgrace, and that there were many others who had their secret Imperfections betrayed by Caligula's Indiscretion. They who are acquainted with the Injury Henry III did himself by such an Indiscretion, will wonder the Roman Ladies had so small a share in the Plots against Caligula: for I believe they, in those Days, were as sensible, when provoked, in such Cases, as the Ladies in the Court of France were in the XIth Century. Now let us hear Mezerai. 'The King was told the League intended no less than to make him a Monk, and that the Dukes of Montpensier shewed the Scissars with which the intended to clip him. What provoked this Widow was the King's discovering some of her secret Imperfections; an Affront Women resent as much more unpardonable than an Attempt upon their Honour (37).'

[M] See the last Remark.] His Conversation with Jupiter's Statue, the pretended Secrets he whispered into his Ear, his Reprimands and Menaces during this worthy Conversation (38), his lying with the Moon, the Consulship appointed for his Horse, the Whim to make him dine at his Table, with an hundred other Passages, are incontestable Marks of Lunacy. He was wicked enough in Conscience, but yet he was at least some small matter more mad than wicked. One thing is certain, that he was no Atheist: All his Impieties are Instances that he believed there were Gods; and therefore the Author of the Thoughts upon Comets had Reason to produce him for an Example, that the most profligate Wretches, mentioned in History, have acknowledged a Deity.

CALLIRHOË, Daughter of the River Achelous, and Wife of that Alcmeon who killed his own Mother Eriphyle. She was married to him whilst he had another Wife living: He had made a Present to his other Wife of that famous Necklace which had been given to Eriphyle [A], to oblige her Husband Amphiarus to engage

[A] That famous Necklace, which had been given to Eriphyle.] The Necklace was of Gold, and had been made a present off by Venus, to her Daughter Hermione, the Wife of Cadmus (1). She gave her at the same time a Peplum, which is a sort of Robe. Both these Presents came into Eriphyle's Possession. The Necklace was given her by Polynece, and the Peplum by his Son Thersander. For the Necklace she betrayed her Husband, and her Son betrayed her for the Peplum. But to satisfy the Curious more particularly, I must add, that there are various Accounts concerning this Necklace of Hermione. Some have said (2), it came originally from Jupiter, that Jupiter gave it to Europa, Europa to Cadmus, and Cadmus to Hermione. Others say (3), Vulcan made it, and presented it to Cadmus. They add (4), that he presented it out of Malice, on purpose to revenge on Hermione, who was the Fruit of the adulterous Commerce of Venus with Mars, the Injury his Wife had done him. He contrived it so, that it should be always fatal to those who had it in possession: for he made it of ominous Materials and Figures; and among other things, used the Ashes left behind upon the Anvil after the Forging of Thunderbolts (5). In a Word, he seemed resolved to make it a fatal Talisman; and hence it was, that Hermione, Semele, Jocasta, Eriphyle, &c. who were successively in the Possession of it, came all to unfortunate ends. It may be compared to the Gold of Toulouse, and the Horse of Sejanus. When Polynece being banished Thebes, fled to Argos, he took this Necklace, and the Peplum with him (6), Statius (7), gaged himself in the Theban Expedition. Callirhoë, having heard of this beautiful Necklace, told Alcmeon absolutely, and in plain Terms, that unless he would make a Present of it to her, she would lie with him no more [B]. The unfortunate Husband repaired to Phegeus (a), his other Wife's Father, and made him believe, that he was told by the Oracle, he should never be cured of his Madness (b), 'till he had offered up that Necklace to the Temple of Delphos. Phegeus delivered it to him; but being informed he designed it for Callirhoë, he gave order to his two Sons to murder Alcmeon, which they executed. Callirhoë was much concerned at his Death, but it was in such a manner, as much more inclined her to meditate Revenge, than to pine away with Sorrow. She passionately desired her Husband's Murder might be revenged; but at the same time could not forbear tasting the soft Delights of Love. It was in one of these amorous Engagements (c), she begged of Jupiter that the Children she had by Alcmeon, who were then very little, might, in a Moment, become Men [C]. This was taking him at a time when he could refuse her nothing (d). She frankly confessed, that the reason of her desiring that Favour, was, that her Sons might soon be in a Capacity to revenge their Father's Death. Her Request was granted, and her two Sons, Amphoterus and Acarnan, set out immediately to seek their Revenge. They found the Murderers of Alcmeon on the Road [D], as they were going to make an Offering of Eriphyle's Necklace and Robe to Apollo at Delphos. They killed them, and then went to Psophis, where they massacred Phegeus and his Wife. At their Return they were pursued as far as Tegea; where, meeting with timely Succour, they put the Enemy to flight. After having given Callirhoë an Account of their Proceedings, they departed for Delphos, there to consecrate the Necklace and Robe, as they were ordered by Achelous. After that they retired into Epirus, where they founded a Colony (e). As for the two Children, Euripides supposes Alcmeon had by the Prophetess Manto, we must understand their Father sent them to be brought up by Creon, King of Corinth. One of these was a Boy, called Amphilocbus; the other a Girl, and a perfect Beauty, named Tisiphone. Creon's Wife being apprehensive her Husband would marry her, got her to be sold, and Alcmeon bought her without knowing her. Apollodorus, from whom I have borrowed this Article,

(8) Dionys. l. v. and Nonnus (8) have given us a full Description of this Necklace; but particularly Nonnus is excessively lavish in his Expressions. Statius's Scholiast says (9), this Necklace was consecrated to Apollo, and thrown into a Fountain where it was still to be seen; but that whenever, they attempted to touch it, the Sun appeared angry, for Tempests arose immediately. The Tradition of Pausanias is not so chimerical. This Author (10) is of Opinion, that when the Temple of Delphos was pillaged by the Phœceans, Hermione's Necklace was part of their prey; and he shews, that the Necklace, said to be Hermione's and Eriphyle's, which was carried to the Temple of Venus and Adonis at Amatonte, in the Isle of Cyprus, was a counterfeit.

Diodorus Siculus assures us, that a Phœcean Lady, who, after the sacking of the Temple of Delphos, presumed to dress her self in Eriphyle's Ornaments, was burnt in her House, her eldest Son, animated by the Furies, setting Fire to it (11). See the Remark [S] of the Article HELENA. Note, that Athenæus (12) quotes an Author, who says the Necklace of Eriphyle, was actually consecrated by Alcmeon to the Temple of Delphos; and that Apollo demanded it as a reward for the Cure of his Madness. The Heathen Gods would do nothing gratis: That which you ask of me, saith the Oracle, is of great value; You desire to be restored to your Senses; You must therefore make me some rich Present, bring me your Mother's Necklace (13). Apollo acted the Merchant, and used the Conditions of a Contract do ut des: he was not contented with the voluntary Offerings of his Votaries, but liked to drive Bargains, and receive the Consideration.

[B] She told her Husband, that she would lie with him no more. I express it so, because she had already two Sons by him, when she demanded this Necklace. Correct therefore in Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, the mis-timing of Facts. They affirm Alcmeon made Callirhoë this Present, on Condition she would promise to be his Wife. Apollodorus and Philostratus take no notice of it: The last says expressly (14), that Alcmeon had two Sons by her, when she obliged him, against his Will, to fetch her the desired Necklace.

[C] She begged of Jupiter, that the Children she had by Alcmeon, might, in a moment, become Men. Ovid has given an Account of it, very well worth our repeating. His Description of Alcmeon's part, as well as the rest, is very fine.

Tum demum magno petet hos Achelœia supplex
Ab Jove Callirhoë, natis infantibus annos.
Addat: neve necem finat esse ultoris inultam.
Jupiter his motus privignæ vota (15) nurusque
Præcipiet: facietque viros impubibus annis (16).

A Son, possess'd with just yet impious Ire, Shall kill his Mother to revenge his Sire.
Banish'd his home and sense in wild affright,
Furies shall haunt him, and his Mother's Spright:
Till his new Wife, the fatal Gold demands,
Then shall he perish by Phœgeian Hands.
Then shall Callirhoë of great Jove obtain,
Her infant Sons, a sudden Youth may gain:
Jove shall consent, thy Pow'rs exert; and then Precipitate th' unrippen'd Boys to Men.

SEWELL.

Mr Moreri says (17), it was Achelous who obtained from Jupiter: that the Children of Alcmeon, should suddenly pass from Infancy to Manhood: Which takes away the Beauty of the Story, and falsifies it at the same time. He cites these Verses of Ovid, and therein condemns himself by that Testimony. Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, will have it, that Jupiter turned Alcmeon's Sons into Gods as soon as they were born. I believe they found nothing of this among the Ancients.

[D] They found the Murderers of Alcmeon on the Road. How then came Charles Stephens to pass such an Error upon us, to be bandied so long from one Dictionary to another? It is, that Phegeus's Sons died upon the spot with Alcmeon, Qui tamen & ipsi ab eodem (Alcmeone) mutuis vulneribus petiti perierunt.

(15) He means Hebe, the Goddess of Youth, the Daughter of Juno, and Wife of Hercules.

ticle (f), does not tell us how Tisiphone came to be known! It was, without doubt, the Catastrophe of one of Euripides's Tragedies.

We read in Pausanias, that Clytius, Alcmeon's Son by Phegeus's Daughter, withdrew himself from his Uncles by his Mother's Side, as not doubting but they were guilty of his Father's Death. He retired into Elis, where he left his Children. The Diviner Eperastes, who gained the Prize in the Olympic Games, was descended from him (g).

CALLISTRATUS, an Athenian Orator, acquired a great Reputation and Credit in his Country. It was he, who induced Demosthenes, yet a School-Boy, to dedicate himself entirely to the Study of Eloquence; for, having pleaded with extraordinary Success, and in a set Speech, a Cause relating to the City of Oropus, it excited an ardent Desire, in the Mind of this Child, to raise himself by the Profession of an Orator. Demosthenes, admiring the Force of Eloquence, and the Glory which it procured to Callistratus, thought now of nothing else but distinguishing himself the same way (a). Some pretend, that he was already a Disciple of Plato, and that he quitted Philosophy, to apply himself to Rhetoric [A]. Callistratus was banished; the common Fate of those, who had the greatest Share in the Government of the Common-Wealth of Athens. He said a thing, during this Disgrace, which deserves to be praised, and which gave Seneca an occasion of laying down some good Maxims [B]. He, one Day, reproached the Thebans with the Parricide of Oedipus, and the Argians with that of Orestes; but Epaminondas gravely and subtly replied to him; We banished them from our Cities, and you received them in yours (b). Melanopus, the Rival of Callistratus, in the Management of public Affairs, suffered himself constantly to be gained over to him by Money; after which he would mount the Rostrum, and say to the People; 'It is [A] Some say, that, when Demosthenes attacked himself to Callistratus — he quitted Philosophy, to study Rhetoric. Hermippus reported it so, and even said, that it was by accident, that Demosthenes heard that fine Oration of Callistratus: for, going to the Academy, where Plato read his Lectures, he perceived an extreme Concourse of People, and enquired the reason of it; and, being informed, that they were going to hear a great Orator, he was desirous to see, whether the Eloquence of This Man deserved such great Eagerness. He was so charmed with the Harangue, that, from that time, he followed Callistratus, and renounced Plato, and his Academy (1). Ita motus & demulctus & captus est, ut Callistratum jam inde sectari cœperit, Academicum cum Platone reliquerit (2). Henry Stephens has corrected some Words in the Chapter, in which Aulus Gellius relates this. He even believed, that the Callistrato Rhetore, in the Title of the Chapter, is a Mistake, since Callistratus, who is styled an Orator, and a Demagogue, in the Chapter, ought not to have been called a Rhetorician in the Summary (3). I am of Opinion, however, that Aulus Gellius considered him as one, who taught Rhetoric, and who actually instructed Demosthenes in it; but I believe likewise that he is mistaken. However I would make no alteration in the Summary, because it ought to answer to the Contents of the Chapter.

[B] He said — a thing — which gave Seneca an occasion of laying down some good Maxims. These are that Philosopher's Words. Callistratus aiant, 'ita certe Hecaton auctor est, cum in exilium iret, in quod multos simul cum illo seditiosa civitas & intemperantur libera expulerat, optante quodam ut Atheniensibus necessitas restituendi exules esset, abominatum talem reditum. Rutilius noster animosus: cum quidam illum consolaretur, & diceret infatigare arma civilia; brevi futurum ut omnes exules reverterentur: Quid tibi, inquit, mali feci, ut mihi pejorem reditum quam exitum optares? Malo, ut patria exilio meo erubescat, quam reditu mereat. Non est istud exilium, cujus neminem non magis, quam damnatum, pudet. Quemadmodum illi servaverunt bonorum civium officium, qui reddi sibi penates suos noluerunt clade communi, quia fatius erat duos iniquo malo affici, quam omnes publico: ita non servat grati Homini affectum, qui bene de se merentem difficultatibus vult opprimere, quas ipse submoveat: qui etiam si bene cogitat, male precatur. Ne in patrocinium quidem, nedom in gloriam est, incendium extinxisse quod feceris (4). — Hecaton informs us, that

Callistratus, going into Banishment with several other Exiles, whom the City of Athens (at that time full of Sedition, and making an intemperate use of its Liberty) had driven out, and one of them wishing that necessity might oblige the Athenians to recal them, expressed great Horror at such a Wish. Our Rutilius spoke more like a Man of true Greatness of Mind. For a certain Person endeavoring to comfort him, and saying, that a Civil War was at hand, and that the Exiles would soon return to Rome; what Injury, said he, have I done you, that you wish me a Return worse than Exile itself? I had rather my Country should blush for my Banishment, than weep for my Return. It is not Banishment, when every one else has more reason to be ashamed of it, than the condemned himself. As therefore Callistratus and Rutilius behaved like good Citizens, in not wishing to return to their Houses on Condition of public Calamity, it being better that two Persons should suffer unjustly, than a whole People be involved in Misfortunes; so He, who wishes to see oppressed with difficulties a Person, who deserves well of him, on purpose that he may extricate him from them, does not preserve the sentiments of a grateful Man: for, let his Intention be never so good, his Wish is not so. It is very little to your Credit, to extinguish a Fire, you have your self lighted up.' Seneca had already expressed very nobly the same Thought by other Examples; and this, in order to prove, that it is ingratitude to wish, that One's Benefactor may stand in need of One's Assistance (5). 'Quis pius diceret Aeneam, si patriam capi voluerit, ut captivitate patrem eripiat? Quis Siculos Juvenes, ut bona liberis exempla monstrarent, si optaverunt, ut Aetna immensa ignium vi supra solitum ardens & incensa præcipit, datura ipsis occasionem exhibendæ pietatis, ex medio parentibus incendio rapta? Nihil debet Scipioni Roma, si Punicum Bellum ut finiret, aluit: nihil Decii, quod morte patriam servaverunt, si prius optaverant, ut devotionis fortissimæ locum ultima rerum necessitas faceret. Gravissima infamia est medicis, opus quaerere. Multi quos auxerant morbos, & incitaverant, ut majore gloria sanarent, non potuerunt discutere, aut cum magna miserorum vexatione vicerunt (6). — Who will call Aeneas pious, if he wished the City of Troy might be taken, that he might rescue his Father out of Captivity? Or the young Sicilians, if, in order to set their Children a good example, they wished, that Aetna, would throw out an uncommon Torrent of Fire, to give them an Opportunity of shewing their filial Duty, by snatching their Parents is true, Callistratus, who maintains the contrary Opinion, is my Enemy; but, in Cases of this Nature, I always submit to him; the Public Good ought to carry it (c).

Parents out of the Fire? Rome owes nothing to Scipio, if he prolonged the Carthaginian War, to have the honour of putting an end to it; nor to the Decii, for dying to save their Country, if they first had wished that an extreme necessity of Affairs might give them an Opportunity of bravely devoting themselves. Nothing can be more infamous in a Physician, them to make himself Work. Many have not been able to dispel, or have conquered with great Vexation to their poor Patients; Diseases, which they themselves had increased (7).

We find in Demosthenes, a Callistratus, who was banished to Metbona in Macedonia, and whom the Athenians had twice condemned to Death, and who had a Daughter married to Timomachus, an Inhabitant of the Isle of Thasus (8). He is probably the same with the Callistratus of This Article: Justus Lipsius does not doubt it (9).

CALVIN (JOHN), one of the principal Reformers of the Church in the XVIth Century, born at Noion in Picardy, the tenth of July, 1509. Being designed for the Church, a Benefice in the Cathedral of Noion, was obtained for him early, and after that the Cure of Pont l'Evêque (a) [A]. But this first Design proved ineffectual; as well because Calvin, being engaged by Robert Olivetan to study Religion in it's Source, resolved to renounce all Superstitions: as that his Father, having altered his Mind, chose rather to make him an Advocate than a Divine. So that after he had finished his Humanity Studies at Paris, he was sent to Orleans, there to study the Civil-Law under the Direction of Peter de l'Etoile (b), and from thence to Bourges, to continue that Study under Andreas Alciatus. He made great Progress in this Science; and pursued his private Studies in the Holy Scriptures with no less Success. He learned Greek at Bourges under Wolmar, who was Professor there in that Language. Being recalled to Noion, upon his Father's Death, he staid there but a very short time; and went from thence to Paris, where he wrote a Commentary upon Seneca's Treatise De Clementia [B]. He was quickly

(a) A Village near Noion, where Calvin's Father was born.

(b) He was President in the Parliament of Paris, and called in Latin Parvus Stella.

[A] A Benefice in the Cathedral of Noion was obtained for him early, and after that the Cure of Pont l'Evêque. They who report Calvin was Canon of Noion are mistaken. The Benefice which was given him was not a Canonicate, but a Chapel called de la Gessine. He was preferred to this the Twenty first of May, 1521. As for Pont l'Evêque, he was made Curate there the fifth of July, 1529, by Exchange for the Cure of Marteville, to which he was presented the Twenty seventh of September, 1527. Whoever has a mind to see the Exchanges, Resignations, Sales, &c. of these Benefices, will find them in a Book of Mr Drelincourt (1). We there find, that in 1534, Monday, the fourth of May, Calvin resigned the Chapel of la Gessine to Mr Anthony de la Marliere, and the Cure of Pont l'Evêque to Caim. Mr Maimbourg therefore must be in the wrong, when he places this before Calvin's Journey to Paris, in 1532 (2). We must observe, that Calvin was never in Priests Orders; nor any farther an Ecclesiastic than by simple Tonsure.

[B] He wrote a Commentary upon Seneca's Treatise de Clementia. He dedicated it to Claude Hangeest, Abbot of St Eloi in Noion: The Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Paris, the fourth of April, 1532. This Book therefore must be writ in his Twenty third, and not in his Twenty fourth, Year, as Beza will have it (3). Mr Varillas's Faults, in relation to this Piece, are so enormous, that they are enough to make one renounce the Study of History: for so many Historians, of former Ages, having laboured under as strong Prejudices, as he has done, how shall one be assured that what they have related is any more to be credited, than his Falsities? If Calvin's Treatise had been lost, no body would dare to call in question what Mr Varillas has related with so many Circumstances. There is but too much reason to believe, there are a great many Historians of his Class. However it be, here follow his Falsities on the Subject now in hand.

I. Calvin, says he (4), presently gained their Esteem by a Book he wrote on Constancy, with an Intent to encourage them to suffer for the new Doctrine. This was neither the Title nor Design of that Book. II. It is surprizing to think this little Book should make that Noise it did in the World, and that Calvin's Panegyrist should prefer it to all the Pieces of Eloquence and Learning wrote either by the Ancients or Moderns upon the same Subject. We deny any body ever gave it that Character, and challenge Mr Varillas to produce any such Panegy-rists. III. There are Faults in that Book unpardonable, were it not in respect to Calvin's Age, he being then but eighteen. He was then in his Twenty third Year. IV. There appeared nothing extraordinary in the Book on Constancy but continual Passion, and extravagant Figures. There is nothing like it in the whole Book, which is only an Explication of Seneca's Thoughts, confirmed by Authorities and Examples; the whole being composed in the Style of a Commentator. Varillas never saw this Piece; he took it for an Oration. V. The Sacramentarians burnt for their Heresies are extolled in it to the Skies, and preferred to the most illustrious Martyrs of the Primitive Church — and Francis I — is painted in the blackest Colours. There is not a Word mentioned, either in commendation of those who suffered Death for their Religion under Francis I, or against that Prince. How durst Calvin have published such a Piece as Mr Varillas would have this to be, at Paris, with his Name to it in Latin (5), and with that of the Abbot of St Eloi, who was the Patron? VI. The rest of this Piece contains nothing but Fragments taken out of Seneca the Philosopher, and patched very negligently together. The whole Piece is a continued Commentary upon Seneca's Treatise de Clementia. Seneca's Text is there entire, and, at the end of every Chapter, Calvin comments upon it after the manner I have already mentioned. VII. The most ridiculous thing of all is, that Calvin had not at that time found out that there were two Seneca's born at Corduba in Spain; one called the Rhetorician, by reason of his Eloquence, which he taught all his Life-time; the other, Son to the Rhetorician, and the most famous of the two, called the Philosopher, who was Nero's Tutor. Now as both lived to a good old Age, though the Philosopher obeyed Crevo's (6) Order for his Death, Calvin, who could not make the Distinction, attributed to one the Age of both, and made his imaginary Seneca live One hundred and forty Years. If Mr Varillas really believed Calvin to be then but eighteen Years old, it was not so ridiculous a thing for him to be ignorant at that Age, that there were two Seneca's. Nor is it true, that Calvin allowed his Seneca One hundred and forty Years, but about One hundred and fifteen. Observe, by the way, that this Author has given a much more just Account of this Piece in his History of Francis I. He composed, says he (7), a Commentary upon Seneca's Book de Clementia, to acquire a Reputation, by couching his Design under the Appearance of a Piece of Heathen Morality. He intended to insinuate into quickly known to those who had secretly embraced the Reformation. The Harangue he suggested to Nicolas Copus, Rector of the University of Paris, having very much displeased the Sorbonne, and Parliament, occasioned the beginning of a Persecution of the Protestants; inasmuch that Calvin, who had like to have been taken in the College of Porteret [C], retired into Xaintonge [D], after having had the Honour to confer with the Queen of Navarre, who appealed this first Storm. That Princess likewise delivered the learned Faber Stapulenſis out of the Hands of the Inquisitors, and sent him to Nerac. Calvin paid him a Viſit; after which he returned to Paris; in 1534. Servetus was there at that Time, and failed meeting him at a Conference agreed to be held between them. This Year proved very troublesome to the Reformers, for which reason Calvin resolved to quit France, after having published, at Orleans, a Treatise against those who believed that the Soul sleeps after leaving the Body [E]. He chose Baſil for the Place of his Retreat, where he studied Hebrew. There he contracted a particular Friendship with Grynæus and Capito; and though he was not greedy of Praise, he was obliged to publish a Work which contributed greatly to his Reputation. This was his Chriſtian Inſtitution, dedicated to Francis I [F]. After the Publication of this Book he went

* Francis I, who was a great Admirer of such Treatises, a Dislike of those Fires he had kindled throughout France, against those who were convicted of speaking against the Religion of their Fathers.

[C] He had like to have been taken in the College of Porteret. Beza's Silence makes me doubt what follows: 'The Lieutenant Morin — went well accompanied to Cardinal le Moine's College, where Calvin lodged, to seize him: but coming into his Chamber, they found he had escaped out at the Window by the Help of his Sheets, which were left tied to it (8). If this account were true (9) Beza would be a very ill Historian; for he says only, that Calvin happened to be then abroad, quo forte domi non reperto (10). Varillas's Account is the same with Maimbourg's, and he accompanies it with abundance of Circumstances (11).

[D] He retired into Xaintonge. He there met with a good Friend, at whose request he composed some short Christian Exhortations, which were read as Homilies in some Parishes, to accustom the People, by degrees, to search after the Truth. Beza (12) takes no notice of this Friend's Name, for what reason I cannot imagine: for a Man, in whom the good Seed had taken so deep Root, who retired with Calvin into Switzerland for the Sake of the Gospel, as this Historian informs us (13), very well deserved to have his Name remembered in the Life of this Great Reformer. It will not be amiss therefore to observe here, that his Name was Lewis du Tillet (14), and that he was Brother to John du Tillet, Register of the Parliament of Paris, and to another du Tillet, Bishop of Meaux. Maimbourg says (15), that this Lewis du Tillet was Canon of Angoulême, and Curate of Claix, and that 'he returned from his Error by the Remonstrances of his Brother John du Tillet — who went after him into Germany, to bring him back again to the Catholic Church.' This Author adds, that 'Calvin, being abandoned by his Patron, and not daring after that to shew himself at Angoulême, went in search of others to Poitiers;' that he found some there, and got new Disciples, 'to whom he administered the Sacrament, after his new Way, in Caves and Grottoes.' I very much doubt the Truth, to say no worse, of this last Account; for if it had been true, Beza could not have been ignorant of it, and consequently would not have omitted it in Calvin's Life. Add to this, that if the Register, John du Tillet, went as far as Germany in search of the strayed Sheep, I mean his Brother the Canon of Angoulême, it must be after Calvin and this Canon were retired to Baſil, and during their stay there. Now Calvin not being then at Angoulême, Maimbourg ought not to have told us, that he durst no longer shew his Head there. In short, Beza assures us, that after this Journey to Baſil, Calvin returned only into France to settle his Affairs; and that afterwards he went thro' Savoy in his Way to Baſil, and stopt at Geneva in the Year 1536. 'Ex Italia — in Galliam regressus rebus suis omnibus ibi compositis, abduetoque, quem unicuique superstitum habebat, Ant. Calvino fratre, Basileam vel Argentinam reverti cogitantem, interclusis aliis itineribus per Allobrogum fines iter institutum prosequi bella cogerunt. Ita factum ut Genevam veniret (16). See the Remark [G].

[E] He quitted France, after having published, at Orleans, a Treatise against those who believed that the Soul sleeps after leaving the Body. 'Postquam Aureliæ insignem illum Libellum edidisset, quem Pſycopanaychian inscripſit, adversus illorum errorem qui dormire seſundas à corporibus animas, errore à vetustissimis usque sæculis repetito, docebant (17).'

[F] He was obliged to publish — his Christian Institution, dedicated to Francis I. Some say he composed the greatest Part of his Institution at Lewis du Tillet's House at Claix (18). This may be; but Beza takes no notice of it, nor of the Year in which it was published; although he observes the occasion of it. He says (19), That Francis I, to curry favour with the German Protestants, who he knew were highly incensed at the Cruelties their persecuted Brethren suffered in France, made use of an Evasion suggested to him by du Bellai (20); which was, to persuade them that he only punished a Company of Enthusiasts, who under the Name of Anabaptists substituted their pretended Inspirations to the Scriptures, and despised the Magistracy. Calvin thought himself obliged to make an Apology for the Reformed, who were burnt in France: It was this engaged him to publish his Institution, with a Dedicatory Epistle to Francis I, which is one of those three or four Prefatory Pieces so much admired (21). It is dated from Baſil, the first of August, 1536. This Date agrees perfectly with Beza's Account; for it was in 1535 that William du Bellai made use of that miserable Subterfuge, verifying exactly that old Proverb, You take us for Germans. Here is what we find of it in Calvin's Life. 'Eedere coactus est Christianæ Religionis Institutionem, quam vocavit, operis longè maximi rudimentum. Quum enim illam Francisci Regis carnificinam agere ferrent Germani Principes, qui Evangelio nomen derant, & quorum ille tum amicitiam ambebat, hoc unum ille propter carum, auctore *Gulielmo Bellai*o Langæo repererat, ut sese non nisi in Anabaptistas pro verbo divino suum tantum spiritum jactantes, & omnium Magistratum contemptores animadvertisse diceret. Hoc verò dedecus veræ Religionis inſultum non ferens Calvinus, ejus edendi libri occasionem arripuit, meo quidem judicio incomparabilis: addita excellenti ad Regem ipsum præfatione, quam si forte legisset ille, aut ego vehementer fallor, aut magnum esset illi meretrici Babylonice jam tum vulnus illatum (22). — He was obliged to publish his Institution of the Christian Religion, which he gave as the Specimen of a very large Work. For Francis I, having, by his cruel Executions, greatly disgusted the German Princes, who had espoused the Gospel, and whose Friendship he courted, contrived this only cunning Expedient, by the Advice of William du Bellai, Lord of Langai, to declare to them, That he had only proceeded against Anabaptists, who set up their Eutheusiasm against the Word of GOD, and contemned all Magistracy. Calvin, not being able to bear this Reflexion cast upon the true Religion, took occasion to print that Book, in my Opinion an incomparable

'one: and added an excellent Prefatory Epistle to the King himself, which if he had chanced to have read, I am much mistaken, but it would have given a fatal Wound to that Whore of Babylon.' Beza pretends, that Calvin, after the Publication of this Book, went into Italy, to pay a Visit to the Dukes of Ferrara: from whence being returned into France, and having settled his Affairs, he had a mind to return to Basil, or Strasburg, through the Territories of the Duke of Savoy, but was obliged to stop at Geneva, where he was declared Minister, and Professor of Divinity in the Month of August, 1536. This is so inconsistent with the Date of the Preface, that it is needless to prove the Inconsistency. See, below, the Remark [U]. I do not oppose Mr Spon to Beza: Spon says (23), that in September 1536, Farel persuaded Calvin to settle at Geneva, not to preach but teach Divinity (24). We should never have done, were we to quote all the chronological Differences we meet with in the Relations of different Authors. For Example, Mr Leti says (25), that Calvin arrived at Geneva the fourteenth of September. This carries us a great way from Beza's Month of August; for according to Mr Spon, whom Leti does not at all contradict, Calvin a long time resisted Farel's Importunities. Mr Leti supposes, that Calvin, as a Man of Wit, expected to be intreated, and made a great many Excuses, till the Syndics joined with the Ministers in their Solicitations. But let us return to his Christian Institution.

The first time it appeared it was only like the rough Draught of a great Work (26). The Author retouched it afterwards more than once, and rendered it so excellent, that Scaliger himself could not but admire it (27). Thurius's famous Distich is known almost to every Body:

Præter Apostolicas post Christi tempora chartas

No Christian Work has been so much admir'd, Except those only, Heaven itself inspir'd.

(30) Beza in Vita Calvini, ad Ann. 1538, says so. But note, that Calvin's Preface to his last Latin Edition is dated August 1, 1559; and that this Edition in Folio, printed by Robert Stephens at Geneva, is dated 1559.

The first Edition was printed at Basil in 1535, in 8vo; The second at Strasburg 1536, in Folio, where Calvin was then Divinity Professor and Minister: It was larger, and more correct, than the former. And the same may be said of the third in regard to the second. This third Edition was printed at Strasburg in 1543. It is to this Edition (28) John Sturm's Words relate, which are usually printed at the Head of the Work. 'Johannes Calvinus homo acutissimo ingenio summaque doctrina, & egregia memoria præditus est, & Scriptor est varius, copiosus, purus, cujus rei testimonium est Institutio Christianæ Religionis, quam primo inchoatam, deinde locupletatam, hoc vero anno absolutam edidit. — John Calvin is a Man of great Parts and Learning, and excellent Memory; he is, in general, a copious and clear Writer, as appears from his Institution of the Christian Religion, which he printed first as a Specimen, afterwards much enlarged, and now this Year absolutely completed.' Gefner (29) had been told, in the Year 1554, that they were preparing a fourth Edition of it in the same Place, with new Additions. That therefore of Geneva in 1550, by John Gerard, in 4to, must be the fifth at least. The Title informs us that it was corrected in a great many Places, and enriched with two Indexes. 'Nunc ex postremâ Autoris recognitione quibusdam locis auditor, infinitis vero castigatio — additi sunt Indices duo locupletissimi; unus rerum insignium, alter verò locorum omnium, quos partim ex sacris Bibliis, partim ex aliis Theologiæ Doctoribus, Author tanquam ex divite penu in suum usum vel apte transtulit, vel docte interpretatus est.' The Author's last Revision, both of the Latin and French Editions, was in 1558 (30). It was then the Work was divided into four Books, and each Book into several Chapters, which amounted in all to eighty, having eighteen in the first Book, seventeen in the second, Twenty five in the third, and twenty in the fourth. The Edition of 1550 is divided only into Twenty one. Varillas therefore falsely asserted, that, about the Year 1535, Calvin's Institution was printed in four Books, and One hundred and four Chapters (31). But he was led into that Error by Papyrius Masso, whose Words are these: 'Basilæ anno 1536, publicavit de Institutione Christianæ Religionis libros quatuor — illa Institutione sæpe acta & millies excusa capitibus centum & quatuor — rejicit, &c. (32). — At Basil, in the Year 1536, he published the Institution of the Christian Religion, in four Books — that Institution being often enlarged, and a thousand times printed with One hundred and four Chapters — he rejects, &c.' I have elsewhere observed (33), that Beza was blamed for his altering and correcting every new Edition of his Notes upon the New Testament. Bosset presses Calvin with the same Complaints, or rather with gross Insults, for the frequent Corrections of his Institution. 'I cannot, says he (34), pass by one thing mentioned by Beza, to the great Honour, as he thinks, of his Master, Father, and Friend, Calvin; which is, that being detained at Home by Sickness, and hindered from his public Function, reading and preaching, yet he lost no time; for he studied so hard at Home, that he began and finished, during that Confinement, his last Christian Institution; both in Latin and French. It would be proper to ask Beza what he means by this last Institution, for I never saw any more than the first which he wrote, and published a great while before. If the first was so well written, and so intirely compleat, what need was there of mending it so often? Here is the Discovery of a Falshood advanced by Beza, in saying his Master, Father, and Friend, Calvin was so compleatly learned, that he never retracted any Sentence or Proposition he once delivered, either in speaking or writing. For being censured and accused of Heresy, for several false Propositions in the first and second Edition of his Institution, he adjusted and corrected them, and then, suppressing the first, he reprinted the same Book thus corrected. After this he bid Defiance to all those who censured and reproved his Errors, and called them Liars, Impostors, and Slanderers, referring himself to this last Edition of his Institution, in which he had corrected those Errors; and, by this Device, passed himself upon the World for a perfect and infallible Doctor, who never retracted what he had once advanced.' If Maimbourg may be credited (35), Calvin's Christian Institution appeared first in French.

Spondanus (36) says the same thing, and adds, that it was printed at Basil the first of August, 1535, and that it had in the Title Page a flaming Sword with this Motto, Non veni mittere Pacem sed Gladium, — I came not to send Peace but a Sword. I cannot tell whether they are in the right; but this I know, that, before the Year 1544 (37), there were French Editions of it, and that Calvin himself had translated it into French. It has appeared likewise in Italian (38), High-Dutch, Low-Dutch, Spanish (39), and English. But Mr Teissier should not have taken Papyrius Masso's Millies Excusa in the literal Sense. He affirms, saith Mr Teissier (40), that it was so well received by the Public, as to pass thro' above a thousand Editions in a little time. Papyrius Masso could never mean so. You will find, in the Remark [BB] of this Article, and in the Remark [B] of the Article SCHULTINGIUS, a Supplement to this.

Here is the Extract from a Letter. 'The oldest Edition there is of Calvin's Institution, in the Library of Geneva, is an Octavo of Five hundred and fourteen Pages, printed at Basil, by Thomas Platterus and Balthazar Latius, in March, 1536. At the end of the Book is the Figure of Minerva, with this Motto, Tu nihil invita facies, dicebat Minerva. The first Forty two Pages are wanting. So that it cannot be known by this Copy, whether the flaming Sword was in this Edition: It is in several others both Latin and French, as in a French one of the Year 1545, and another of the Year 1561 (41). his Affairs, he prepared to set out for Strasbourg, or Basil [G], accompanied by Anthony Calvin, the only Brother he had living: But the War having left no other Passage open, but through the Duke of Savoy's Dominions, he took that Course. This seemed a particular Direction of Providence, which had designed him for Geneva; for, intending only to take that place in his Way, he found himself detained there, as it were, by an Order from above [H]; for William Farel solemnly denounced served, that John Girard, the Bookseller, who printed this Institution in Latin, in the Year 1550, in 4to, did not put this Motto, Non veni pacem mittere sed gladium, round the flaming Sword, as he did in the Title Page of Calvin's Treatise against the phantastic and furious Sect of the Libertines, in the Year 1545; but I have also observed, that he has used this Motto in the French Edition of the Institution, of the Year 1553, in 4to. To conclude, I do not take this Edition of Basil, by Thomas Platterus and Balthazar Latius, in March, 1536, to have been the first: I shall give my Reasons in the Remark [B] of the Article SCULTINGIUS.

THE Order of Calvin's Travels.

[G] He prepared to set out for Strasbourg or Basil. Every rational Person will agree with me, that as to the Historical Order of Calvin's Travels, no Author deserves more Credit than Beza, in such things as neither contribute to, nor diminish, Calvin's Reputation. Since therefore he has told us, that Calvin left Paris in order to go to Xaintonge, that from Xaintonge he returned to Paris, from whence he retired to Basil; that from Basil he went to Ferrara, from Ferrara came back into France, and from France went to Geneva with an Intent to proceed farther, either to Basil or Strasbourg, we ought to receive this Account as more authentic than those of Maimbourg and Varillas: For whether or no Calvin went from Ferrara directly to Geneva, or returned first into France, and thence to Geneva, is on neither side material to his Reputation. I believe therefore, all sensible Men will reject what Maimbourg has reported (42), that Calvin, having travelled into Germany with Lewis du Tillet, returned into France, preached secretly at Poitiers, where he converted some of the Magistrates and Professors, with a great many other Disciples, to whom he administered the Sacrament, after his Mode, in Caves; that he returned to Paris; that, finding the Persecution more violent than ever, he forsook France quite, and sheltered himself at Basil; that from Basil he went to Ferrara, from whence, being constrained to fly, he went to Geneva, with a Resolution of returning to Basil. The Adventures at Poitiers are so much to Calvin's Honour, that it is very strange Beza should be ignorant of them, and more strange still that, if he knew them, he should take no notice of them in Calvin's Life. As for Mr Varillas, he tells us (43), that Calvin and Lewis du Tillet, designing for Germany, parted at Geneva, Tillet the Register, who over-took them here, having persuaded his Brother to return; that Calvin continued his Journey as far as Strasbourg; that he conferred there with Bucer; that he returned into France; that he fixed at Poitiers, where he gained a great many Profelytes; that he sent some of them into the Provinces, as his Apostles, to preach the Gospel; that he returned to Paris; that he left it soon after to go to Strasbourg, where he founded a Church of French Refugees, and taught Divinity; that, having spent two full Years in this painful Occupation, he went from thence to Ferrara; that, not daring to stay there any longer (44), nor knowing where to dispose of himself, he bent his Course to Geneva, where Farel detained him in the Year 1536. This Account is full of Falsities and Anachronisms: For, I. When Calvin and Lewis du Tillet went into Germany, they did not pass through Geneva, but through Lorraine, and arrived together at Basil. 'Secedere ex Galliâ statuit, eoq. consilio una cum illo quicum eum apud Santonas aliquandiu vixisse diximus iter Basileam versus per Lotharingiam ingressus, non procul urbe Metensi in in maximam difficultatem incidit - - - adeo ut vix Argentinam indeque Basileam provenerint' (45).

(45) Beza in Vita Calvin. pag. 367, ad Ann. 1534

'in Xaintonge, I have mentioned his having resided for some time, he met with so much Difficulty near the City of Metz, - - - that - - - he had much ado to get safe to Strasbourg, and from thence to Basil.' II. Calvin at that time only passed through Strasbourg, and returned not into France till after he had seen the Court of Ferrara. III. He was not Minister and Professor at Strasbourg, till after he was driven from Geneva in 1538. IV. Lastly, this Account suffers more than Mr Maimbourg's, from Beza's Silence. You may please to observe, that the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches, wrote by this last Author, does not give the least hint, that Calvin had any hand in beginning the Reformation at Poitiers (46). Such a Silence in that History would be very unaccountable, if all the Relations of other Authors contained any thing of Truth in them. The Author of the Historia Genevina (47) supposes, that Calvin, having left Paris, on account of the Edict of Banishment published against the Lutherans by Queen Catherine (48), who then had the whole Administration, retired to Angoulême, where, not being able to live any longer than three Years, he was after that constrained to pass into Italy, from whence escaping almost by a Miracle (49), he went to Geneva in 1536. One must be very cunning to find at that time a Queen Catherine in France. Besides, Beza, in the fourteenth Page of the first Book of his Ecclesiastical History, tells us, that Calvin, being retired into Xaintonge, returned the Year following to Paris.

Observe, that Varillas's Account is copied from Florimond de Remond: See, below, the Remark [A]. The Principle, laid down in the beginning of this Remark, will serve very well to refute those who say (50), that Calvin, being a Student at Orleans, revolved from the Romish Church, and went into Italy, residing principally at Rome, Venice, and Padua; that he returned from thence to Paris; that he had like to have been seized by the Lieutenant-Criminal; that he retired to Noion, where he disposed of his Benefices; after which he went into Gascony and Bern, in the Year 1533, where he was not well received, because he was a Sacramentarian; that he went from thence to Geneva, where he was very near being thrown headlong from the Bridge (a Punishment in use there), for spreading his Doctrines; that escaping from thence he fled to Lausanne, but returned a little while after to Geneva, where several being already infected in the Article of Religion, he from that time enjoyed his full Liberty. This is the Substance of an Information, communicated by a Notary of Noion to Cornelius Vander Myle, which Mr Drelincourt has inserted in his Defence of Calvin, where he observes (51), that Andrew Rivetus had before published it in his Jesuita Papalans. James Desmay, Doctor of the Sorbonne, published at Roan, 1657 (52), a little Book, intitled, Remarks upon the Life of that Arch-Heretic, John Calvin, extracted from the Registers of Noion, the Place of his Nativity. He says (53), pag. 39, that Calvin ran through the Universities of Paris, Orleans, Toulouse, and Padua, that he travelled to Rome, Venice, Bern, and to several other Places; that he staid but a little while at Rome and at Venice; and that he was much longer at Padua. Reject, without scruple, out of the Catalogue of his Travels, all those which are not mentioned by Beza. Had they been real, he could not but have known them; and had he known them, he would infallibly have recorded them, since they would have done honour to Calvin's Reputation. I am surprized to see so many unprofitable Forgeries.

[H] He found himself detained at Geneva - - - as it were by an Order from above. 'Farellus ut erat plane vir ille spiritu quodam heroico afflatus, multis cum verbis frustra obtestatus, ut secum potius denounced the Curse of GOD upon him, if he refused to be his Fellow-Labourer in that Part of the Vineyard. Calvin, therefore, found himself obliged to accept of the Office, which the Consistory and Magistracy, with the Consent of the People, had offered him, as well that of their Preacher, as Divinity Professor [I]. The latter he complied with, and would have declined the former; but he was at last forced to undertake both Functions, in the Month of August 1536. The Year following he made all the People solemnly swear to a Form of Faith, and abjure Popery: And because the Reformation of Doctrines had not removed that Corruption of Manners, which had prevailed in Geneva, nor that factious Spirit, which had so much divided the principal Families, Calvin, assisted by his Colleagues, declared, that, as all their Remonstrances had proved ineffectual, they could not celebrate the Holy Sacrament whilst those Disorders continued. He declared likewise, that they could not submit to the Regulations lately made by the Synod of Bern [K], and that they desired to be heard in the Synod, which was held at Zurich. Upon this the Syndics, having summoned the People, Calvin (c), Farel, and another Minister, were ordered to depart the City in two Days time, for refusing to administer the Sacrament. Calvin retired to Strasburg, where Bucer and Capito gave him a thousand Marks of their Friendship and Esteem. He founded a French Church at Strasburg, where he himself was the first Minister, being likewise appointed Divinity Professor. However he continued his Affection for the Church of Geneva, which appeared, among other Things, in the Answer, he composed in 1539, to the fine artful Letter of Cardinal Sadolet (d) [L], Bishop of Carpentras. Two Years after, The Divines of Strasburg desired he might assist at the Diet the Emperor had called at Worms and Ratibonne, to see if it were possible to reconcile the Differences in Religion. He therefore appeared there along with Bucer, and conferred with Melancthon. They of Geneva made such pressing Instances to have him again, that at last he agreed to continue their Minister for a certain Term (e): but they were to wait for his Return from the Diet of Ratibonne. He re-entered Geneva the thirteenth of September, 1541, to the infinite Satisfaction of the People and Magistracy. The first thing he did, was to establish a Form of Discipline, and a Consistorial Jurisdiction, with Power to exercise Canonical Censures and Punishments, even to Excommunication exclusive. This displeased a great many, who urged, that it was restoring the Roman Tyranny; however the thing was executed: And this new Canon passed into a Law, in a general Assembly of the People, the twentieth of November, 1541. Both the Clergy and Laity engaged themselves to a perpetual observance of it. The inflexible Severity, with which Calvin, on all Occasions, maintained the Rights of his Consistory, raised him a great many Enemies (f), and occasioned some Disorders in the Town. He was frightened at nothing; and it would be difficult to believe, if there were not incon-

(d) He wrote it to the Senate, Council, and People of Geneva, to exhort them to return into the Bosom of the Church.

tus Genevæ laboraret, quàm longius excurreret, nec ei facile Calvinus assentiretur. At ego tibi, inquit, studia tua prætexenti denuntio omnipotentis Dei nomine, futurum ut nisi in opus istud Domini nobiscum incumbas, tibi non tam Christum quam teipsum querenti Dominus maledicat (54). — Farel being a Man of a truly heroic Spirit, after having used a great many Arguments to no purpose, to prevail with Calvin to stay and assist him at Geneva, rather than proceed any further, said to him, Behold I declare to you, in the name of Almighty GOD, that unless you will here become Fellow-Labourer in the Work of the LORD, his Curse will be upon you for seeking yourself rather than CHRIST.

[I] He accepted the Office — as well of Preacher, as Divinity Professor. This is so plain from Beza, that Mr Moreri could not possibly be deceived. Calvinus sese Presbyterii, & Magistratus voluntati permittit, quorum Suffragiis accedente plebis consensu delectus non Concionator tantum (hoc autem primum recusavit) sed etiam sacrarum literarum Doctor, quod unum admittebat, est designatus Anno Dom. 1536. mense Augusto (55). — Calvin complied with the desires of the Ministers and Magistrates, by whose Election, together with the consent of the People, he was not only appointed to the Office of Preacher (which he at first refused) but also to that of Professor of Divinity, (which was the only one he liked) in August 1536. What can be more particular? And yet neither Mr Spon nor Mr Leti among the Protestants, nor Maimbourg among the Papists, have understood this Fact. Farel, willing to detain Calvin at Geneva, says Spon (56), 'was refused by him a long time; but Farel, persisting more vehemently in his Importunities, prevailed with him at last, not to preach, but to teach Divinity. Mr Leti says as much. Calvinus si lascio persuadere di fermarsi non già con la condicione di predicare, di che ne lasciava a gli altri la cura, ma d'insegnare la Theologia (57). — Calvin was persuaded to stay, not in the Capacity of Preacher, which he chose to leave to others, but of Professor of Divinity. And here are Maimbourg's Words: 'They divided between them the Employments of the Ministry. Farel, who used to thunder from the Pulpit, continued his Sermons, and Calvin, who had not the Faculty of speaking in public, undertook to teach Divinity, as he understood it, without having studied it (58).

[K] He declared — that they could not submit to the Regulations, lately made by the Synod of Bern. The Church of Geneva made use of leavened Bread in the Communion: They had likewise removed out of their Churches the Baptismal Fonts; and abolished all Festivals except Sundays. Now the Churches of the Canton of Bern disapproved of these three Things; and, by an Act made in a Synod held at Lausanne, required that the use of unleavened Bread, the Baptismal Fonts, and the Festivals should be established again in Geneva. These were the Regulations, with which Calvin refused to comply (59).

[L] The Answer, he composed in the Year 1539, to the — Letter of Cardinal Sadolet. This Answer is in Calvin's Volume of Opuscula; it was dated at Strasburg the first of September 1539, and it is certain Calvin did not return to Geneva till 1541. This has not been sufficiently attended to, in the Historia Genevina (60). Questa Lettera fu ancora comunicata a Calvino in Strasburg; che pure rispose ma dopo ritornato in Geneva. — This Letter was communicated to Calvin at Strasburg; which he answered indeed, but not till after he returned to Geneva.

testable Proofs of it, that, in the midst of so many Agitations at home, he could shew so much Care, as he did, of the Churches abroad, in France (g), in Germany, in England, and in Poland, and write so many Books [M], and Letters. He did more by his Pen than by his Prefence; nor did he fail to appear sometimes in Person upon Occasion; as particularly at Frankfort, in 1556, to compose the Differences which divided the French Church. He had been sick a little before, and the Report, which was spread abroad of his Death, was received with no small Joy among the Catholics [N]. He lived in continual Action, and almost constantly with his Pen in his Hand, even when Sickneſs confined him to his Bed: He lived, I say, in perpetual Labours, arising from his Zeal for the general Good of the Churches, till the Twenty seventh of May, 1564 (b). He was a Man on whom God had conferred extraordinary Talents, a great deal of Wit, an exquisite Judgment, a faithful Memory [O], an able, indefatigable, and elegant, Pen, an extensive Knowledge, and a great Zeal for the Truth. Joseph Scaliger, who scarce thought any Man worth his commending, could not forbear admiring him (i). He praises him, among other things, for not commenting on the Revelations [P]. The Catholics have at last been forced to acknowledge the Falsity of those infamous Calumnies published against Calvin's Morals: Their best Pens are now content [Q] to say, that, though he was free from corporeal Vices, he was not so from spiritual

[M] It would be difficult to believe - - - that he could - - - write so many Books. The Geneva Edition of his Works comprehends twelve Volumes in Folio. That of Amsterdam, 1667, has reduced them to Nine. His Commentaries on the Bible are the most considerable Part of the Works of Calvin. See the Judgment Father Simon has made of these Commentaries (61); it is part good, and part bad, but, taken all together, it distinguishes and honours Calvin's Merit, to a very great degree. There is a Jesuit who falsely supposes, that Calvin, after Servetus's Punishment, published a Book De non castigandis Hæreticis. He alleges it as a Proof that the Spirit of Heresy is for uniting Contradictions: 'A thing, says he (62), never so notoriously remarkable as in the Person of John Calvin - - - for, as soon as Calvin had got Servetus condemned to die for the Innovations and Atheism he introduced into Geneva, immediately after that cursed Heretic was burnt, and his Ashes dispersed by the Winds, Calvin wrote a Book De non castigandis Hæreticis, contradicting his Action by his Doctrine. Thus wicked Men fight against themselves, like Ari'stotle's Antiphero.' All this is ridiculous; for Calvin, on the contrary, after Servetus's Execution, published a Book intitled, Fidelis Expositio errorum Michaelis Serveti, & brevis eorundem refutatio, ubi docetur jure gladii coercendos esse Hæreticos: a Book which makes the Author still terribly exclaimed against. This Falshood, vented against Calvin, could no where appear better than in the Remark which concerns his Writings.

[N] The Report, which was spread abroad of his Death, was received with no small Joy among the Catholics. In the Year 1556, he was seized in his Sermon with a fit of a Tertan Ague, and being thereby obliged to quit the Pulpit, there were a thousand Lies spread about it. Beza adds, that the Canons of Noion made a solemn Procession to thank Heaven for the Death of the Arch-Heretic born in their City. Multis inde falsis secutis Rumoribus, usque adeo Pontificiis gratis, ut de Calvini morte solenni supplicatione Novioduni, Calvini patria, Canonici suis idolis gratias egerint (63). I am afraid the Author's Memory gave him the slip here. I doubt he has confounded the Year 1551 with 1556. I have elsewhere (64) cited a Passage of Calvin, which shews that this Procession of the Canons, his Townsmen, by way of Thanksgiving for his supposed Death, was in 1551. Would they have repeated it Five Years after upon the like false Report? I can scarce conceive this; but think it much more likely, that Beza, writing several Years after, might be mistaken as to the Time. The best of Memories make such slips oftner than we imagine.

[O] He had a faithful Memory. His Historian gives us these Instances of it. He remembered People he had seen but once, several Years after; whenever he was dictating any thing, and happened to be interrupted for some Hours, he renewed the Thread of the Discourse without having occasion to be reminded where it was he left off; he never forgot any thing he had once intrusted to his Memory, I speak of such things as it was his Duty to remember. 'Memorie incredibilis, ut quos semel aspexisset, multis post annis statim agnosceret, & inter dictandum sæpe aliquot horas inturbatus, statim ad dictata nullo commonefaciente rediret, & eorum quæ ipsam nosse munis sui causa interesset, quantumvis multiplicibus & infinitis negotiis oppressus, nunquam tamen oblivisceretur (65).'

[P] Scaliger, among other things, commended him for not commenting on the Revelations. He owned him however for the happiest of all the Commentators, in apprehending the Sense of the Prophets. O quam Calvinus bene assiquitur mentem Prophetarum! nemo melius (66). Since then he adds, Sapit quod in Apocalypsim non scripsit, that is to say, He was in the right not to attempt the Revelations; he must be of Opinion, that there was nothing to be done on that Book. I have read in Bodin what I am going to relate: 'In oraculis interpretandis, malui judiciorum illam formulam, NON LIQUET, usurpare, quam temere ex aliorum opinione non intellecta cuiquam assentiri. Ac valde mihi probatur Calvini non minus urbana quam prudens oratio: qui de libro Apocalypseos sententiam rogatus, ingenue respondit, se penitus ignorare quid velit tam obscurus scriptor: qui qualisque fuerit nondum constat inter eruditos (67). — In interpreting the Scriptures, I had rather use that Judicial Form, IT DOES NOT APPEAR, than rashly subscribe to the Opinion of another which I do not understand. And I am very much pleased with that Saying of Calvin's, which was no less candid than discreet: who, being asked his Opinion of the Book of the Revelations, replied ingenuously, that he was not able to understand any thing in so obscure a Writer, whose Name and History were not yet settled among the learned.' I should be glad to know whether Calvin said this in any of his Writings, or only in Conversation: I am more apt to believe the latter; for it would not have become a Man of his Character to declare, that the learned were not yet agreed who was the Author of the Revelations.

[Q] The Catholics have been forced to acknowledge the Falsity of those - - - Calumnies published against his Morals: their choicest Pens are now content, &c. I would not be here interpreted in a more general Sense, than these sort of Propositions are able to bear. I know Cardinal Richelieu, or that excellent Pen, which has published, under his Eminency's Name, La methode pour convertir, has adopted Bossuet's Impertinencies. It is therefore very possible, that even now-a-days some famous Author may be of the same Opinion: I do not pretend to deny it. I only say, that, in general, the best Authors talk no more in that strain. As for the vulgar Writers, who, as Papyrius Masso remarks (68), first spread these scandalous, they will never renounce them. They are a sort of People who let no News whatever be lost, if it does but please them; so that, Thanks to their Diligence, one may say, there is not so much as a scurvy Gazetteer but may promise to himself Immortality.

ritual ones, such as Pride, Passion, Slander, &c. There goes a pleasant Story of his Devotion for St Hubert [R]. They, who esteem it a Fable, on the Supposition that Calvin had no Children, are mistaken; for it is not true that his Marriage was fruitless [S]. Nothing shews more apparently the ill Effects Zeal has upon the mortality, for the grofs lies he invents with his Pipe in his Mouth. They will be copied, in a few Months after, by one or other of these worthy Authors, and repeated from time to time by others, as occasion shall happen; and if they may be serviceable either to any private or public Interests, some two or three hundred Years afterwards, they will be found in some Library among satirical Collections, and quoted in some new Libel (69). As long as there are any Calvinists in the World, and they have any Enemies, Bosset's Book will have this Fate (70). But it will suffice for an eternal Conviction of his Calumnies, that there are among the Catholics several grave Authors, who will not in the least countenance his Stories; which is a demonstrative Proof, that they are without Foundation. Had they carried the least appearance of Truth, they would not so readily have been relinquished with all their Advantages. This Observation is very material. One of the most dignified Authors we can meet with (71), has lately copied after Bosset.

[R] There goes a pleasant Story of his Devotion for St Hubert. It says, that Calvin, after having, in vain, applied all proper Remedies for the Recovery of his Son, who was bit by a mad Dog, had at last Recourse to the Intercession of St Hubert: And adds, that the Son of this Arch-Heretic, having performed all the necessary Devotions at the Shrine of this Saint, was cured of his double Frenzy, one communicated by the Dog, the other by his Father; and a copy of Verses is quoted, which was composed on that Subject. 'Notabile illud fuit, filium Calvini frustra expertum alia quævis amuleta, misum Genèvâ Andainum ab impio & sacrilego parente, ut ibi ope sancti Huberti à rabidi canis morfu curaretur. Quemadmodum ille reipsa ibidem, abjuratâ simul hæresi, ab utraque, hoc est, caninâ & Calvinianâ, rabie convalluit. Exstant verò de eâ re carmina Bartholomæi Honorii, Poetæ illius ætatis (72).' These are the Verses (73).

Scis quid Calvinus Sanctorum fecerit osor,
A cane cum rabido filius iclus erat?
Tentavit medicis illum sanare venenis,
Quæ Pedemontanus iussit Alexis emi.
Sed Deus hunc non est medicinâ passus abuti,
Ne quis ob hoc Divos temneret Hæreticus.
Namque opus invalidum Calvinus reddidit, ut se
Per cunctos cuivis ferre probaret opem.
Ille itaque incautum sudans, est nocte coactus
Pignus in Ardennam mittere languidulum.
Immortalis ubi Numen se pandit Huberti,
Talia qui CHRISTI vulnera curat ope.
Venit eò proles scelerati manca parentis,
Et supplex aras procidit ante sacras,
Quodque precabatur superos erat, ut sibi vellent
E membris morbum pellere tabificum.
Neve sibi objicerent male sani dogmata patris,
Quæ modo per Mundi climata nota forent.
Nam se cum stolido non consentire parente,
Velle sed in veteri Religione mori.
Hæc ubi fatas erat, sacra cum veste Sacerdos
Prodiit, illius vulnera dira fovens.
Nec multos mansisse dies narratur ibidem,
Quin fuerit dono sanus, Huberte, tuo.
Sparserat interea Calvinus in urbe Geneva,
Saxonicas natum nuper adisse plagas;
Ille quidem dignus, non qui luat à canetali
Vindictam, sed quem Cerberus ipse voret.

While furious, Calvin did the Saints detest,
A mad Dog's Bite his darling Son distress.
To pow'rful Medicine strait for Aid he flies;
But pow'rful Medicine all its Aid denies.
The Father's Heresy does Heav'n displease,
And thus is punish'd in the Son's Disease.

All human means still crossing his Design,
By Night he sends him to St Hubert's Shrine:
Where Crowds of Sick attend the healing Pow'r,
And Divine Miracles perform the Cure.
Here prostrate, he the holy Place adores, Recants his Father's Creed, and Health implores.
The solemn Priest his sacred Talent shews, Washes the Wound, and Hubert's Boon bestows.
Calvin, ashamed the Miracle to own,
Pretends in foreign Parts the Cure was done:
Worthy himself the worst of Bites to feel
By making Cerberus one hungry Meal.

This deserves no Confutation, no more than what we meet with in Varillas; I. That Calvin, being exhorted by a Canon to return into the Bosom of the Catholic Church, answered, That since he had engaged himself in these novel Doctrines, he would persist in them to the end; but that if he was to begin again, he would never forsake the Faith of his Fathers. II. That Calvin's Nephew — asked him one Day, if it was possible for a Man to be saved in the Romish Communion? To which he replied, it was. III. That a Catholic exhorting him once to recant, he answered, with a sigh, it is too late (74). These are things an Author, who rightly understands his Duty, would never venture to publish; because, if they be denied, he must be reduced to a shameful Silence.

[S] It is not true, that his Marriage was fruitless. Calvin was not so eager for Marriage, as some others. He was full thirty Years old when he married Idelette de Bure (75), the Widow of an Anabaptist, whom he had converted. He married her at Strasbourg by the Advice of his Patron Martin Bucer (76). She had Children by her former Husband Johann Stordeur, a Native of Liege (77), and died in the beginning of 1549, to the great Grief of Calvin (78), who continued a Widower all the rest of his Life. See what he says for himself, in his Answer to the Reproach cast upon the Reformers, as if they warred against Rome for the same Reasons the Grecians did against Troy, for the Sake of a Woman. 'Fingunt adversarii nos mulierum causa quasi Trojanum bellum movisse. Ut alios in præsentia omittam: me saltem ab hoc probro immunitatem esse concedant necesse est. Quo mihi ad refellendam eorum putidam garrulitatem major suppetit libertas. Cum semper ad ducendam uxorem sub Papæ tyrannide liber fuero, ex quo me inde eripuit Dominus, per annos complures sponte cælebs vixi. Mortua uxore, singularis exempli scemina, jam sesquiannus est, ex quo non invitum cœlibatum rursus colo (79). — Our Adversaries pretend we wage a sort of Trojan War for a Woman. To say nothing of others at present; they must allow myself at least to be free from this Charge. Since I am more particularly able in my own Case to refute this scurrilous Reflexion. For notwithstanding I was at liberty under the Tyranny of the Pope to have married, from the time of the Lords releasing me from thence, for many Years, I voluntarily led a single Life. It is now a Year and half since I buried my Wife, a Woman of singular Virtue, from which time I have again preferred a single Life.' His Wife brought him a Son, who died before his Father. This is a particular he has delivered to the Public, in answer to those who reproached him for being childless (80). Crimen asopias sibi obiectum diluere volens (Balduinus) orbitatem mihi exprobrat. Dederat mihi Deus filiolum: abstulit: hoc quoque recenset inter probra liberis me carere. Atqui mihi filiorum sunt myriades in toto orbe Christiano (81). — To wipe off the Charge of want of natural Affection, which had been objected to him, (Balduin), he accuses me of being childless. GOD was pleased to give me a Son, and to take him away again: and this he makes a Reflexion upon me to be without Children. But I have Children innumerable the Judgment, than to see Authors of Reputation affirm, with all the Seriousness imaginable, that Calvin had a mind to make the World believe he could raise the dead [7]. It is not long since a young Abbot accused him of a Thought altogether brutal; but being called upon to produce the Passage, which he pretended to have met with, and not doing it (k), we may place this Accusation in the Number of convicted Calumnies. Mr Moreri has not been so much out in this Article, as might have been expected [U]. He doth not deny, but Calvin was

Master

'numerable through the whole Christian World.' Had Papyrus Masso known this Passage, he would never have said, that Calvin could get no Children. Eam sibi matrimonio junxit irrita spe proliis & liberorum, nullis enim suscipere potuit. Spondanus has repeated the same thing, and added this Observation, that Calvin's Wife had brought Children to a former Husband. Ideletam Buriam matrimonio sibi junxit & multis annis cum ea vixit, nullis tamen susceptis liberis, quamvis illa ex priori marito nonnullos haberet (82). Florimond de Remond had observed before, that it was a Marriage doomed to a perpetual Barrenness, though Idelette was young and handsome (83). But why should we wonder at the Mistake of these three Authors, when even Rivetus, a Minister of great Reading, did not know Calvin had been a Father. Amongst other things he has urged against the Fable of Calvin's Son being cured by the Intercession of St Hubert, he says, he thinks it impossible to prove Calvin ever had a Son. 'Vamus ego sim si ille vel quisquam alius unquam probet Calvinum fuisse filii parentem, nedum ut filium suum miserit Huberto sanandum, quod nemo etiam crediturus esset mente sanus, vel si decem liberos habuisset Calvinus. Ergo Bartholomæus ille non Honorius, sed inglorius & infamis manebit, qui secum miserum Loyolitam in participationem infamiae pertraxit' (84). And in another place, he says positively, that Calvin never had a Son: Claudius miraculorum Huberti specimen in filio Calvini, qui nunquam fuit in rerum natura (85).

[7] Authors of Reputation affirm, with all the Seriousness imaginable, that he had a Mind to make the World believe he could raise the Dead. Claudius Episcopus was, without doubt, a very learned Man, and one of the most illustrious Divines of the XVIth Century; and yet was so weak as to take upon himself the publishing this silly Story. 'Alii etiam illum nescio quem vivum pro mortuo cadavere excitando universo etiam teste populo supposuisse fabulantur, quod non minus putidum mendacium quam si Romæ Papa fuisse diceretur, ausus est rapidus ille Sorbonicus Claudius Spensia' maledicentissimo quodam libro inculcare (86). Had there been at that time any Missionaries, Cutlers, or Cobblers, by Trade, it would have been no wonder if they had diverted the Mob in the Market-Place, on a Holy-Day, with a burlesque Recital of such a Story; but for Men of Gravity to publish such a thing, is very extraordinary. They, who have been guilty of this Folly, are not at all to be pitied, whenever we find them under Beza's Correction (87): though upon another Subject his Censures might appear too violent. If Calvin had met with the Adventure Bolfec speaks of in his thirteenth Chapter, if he had undertaken to raise one who pretended to be really dead, and who proved really to be so, Balduin would not have spared him (88), but made him suffer all the Mortifications so monstrous an Imposture must have deserved. He has not one word of it, directly nor indirectly; from whence we may conclude the Story to be nothing but a ridiculous Romance. Bolfec produces no other evidence for it than a Woman banished from Geneva. 'It was, says he, the Widow of the very Man, who was to pretend himself dead, and to revive when Calvin should give the Word.' A very worthy Witness! Out of her own Mouth she might have been judged and condemned. She confessed, that, for the Sake of a share in the Church Alms, she engaged to serve Calvin in so abominable a Cheat, and that she carried on the Farce, till the Loss of her Husband obliged her to make a Discovery. Was not this owning herself wicked enough to traduce Calvin, at the Pleasure of those who would reward her for her Pains (89)? Surely he must be as foolish as she was wicked, or rather as wicked as herself, who can encourage her Story. There are several Writers of this Class; and amongst the rest, Baronius's Continuator (90). Father Labbe has set down the very Year in which this wonderful Prodigy happened; nay, if one had a mind to be nicely critical, we might affirm that he has marked even the Day: for see how he expresses himself under the Year 1553. 'Calvin caesit Seroetus to be burned at Geneva, on the Twenty seventh of October, and, pretending by his Prayers to raise a poor Fellow, whom he had suborned to feign himself dead, he made the Man play his part so long till he was dead indeed' (91). Varillas was cleared enough to see the Absurdity of this Story, but too cautious to publish his own Sentiments of it. He left out of his History of Francis I what he had writ upon that Subject; but as there were Copies of his Manuscript abroad, it was easy to know his Thoughts, and to publish them to the World in the Holland Edition. Here are his Words, which he durst not publish: 'Calvin was very far from pretending to raise the Dead, having maintained that all real Miracles became useless after the first Establishment of the Christian Religion: and as far from putting Money out to Usury, being contented with a Pension of an hundred Crowns a Year for the Maintenance of his Family' (92). This is all taken from Masso, pag. 431, 432.

[U] Mr Moreri has not been so much out in this Article as might have been expected. I insist only upon Errors of Fact, and among them too, upon those only which I can refute otherwise, than by a bare Comparison of the Encomiums Calvin has received from his Friends, with the Calumnies he has met with from his Enemies. I say then, I Mr Moreri is liable to the Censure mentioned above, concerning Calvin's Return into France, after his Rupture with the Canon du Tillet. Nay, he seems to have given himself a greater Latitude than others: for he supposes that Calvin, after his Return, spread his Doctrines not only at Poitiers and Bourdeaux, but also at Angoulême, where, according to Maimbourg, he durst not shew his Head after Lewis du Tillet's Conversion (93). II. Moreri saith, Calvin fell in Love with a very fine Woman called Idelette de Bure, married to an Anabaptist of Leige, and that she being left a Widow some time after, he married her. I never met with any Author (94), who says, this Woman was handsome, or that Calvin fell in Love with her before she was a Widow. Bucer was the Cause of his marrying her; so that it was not a Match of his own seeking. III. Bolfec — reports several things, upon the Subject of this Match of Calvin's, very particular, though perhaps not altogether true; he gives however a pretty good Account of the Persons and Places he knew. So says Moreri; Now it is certain, Bolfec has not mentioned Calvin's Match, nor said one Word good or bad of Idelette. IV. Calvin had no Children by this Wife. I have shewn before (95), that this is false. V. He published his Institution, at Basil, in 1534, under the Name of Alcuin, which is the Anagram of his own Name. I have already said, that the Epistle Dedicatory of this Book is dated from Basil the first of August, 1536; though I owned at the same time, that it was impossible to make this Date agree with Beza's Account of Calvin's Travels from the Publication of this Book to his Establishment at Geneva in August 1536. The most proper Expedient to obviate this Difficulty, in my Opinion, is, to alter the Date of that Dedication, from 1536 to 1535 (96); for Calvin's Institution must of necessity have appeared in 1535. The Shifts, made use of in Germany to palliate the Executions of the Lutherans by Francis I, made Calvin resolve to publish this Piece (97); as he himself tells us. 'Quum incognitus Basileæ laterem, quia multis piis hominibus in Gallia exultis grave passim apud Germanos odium ignes illi excitaverant, sparsi sunt

Master of a great many extraordinary Qualities. There are a great many among the Roman Catholics, who would do Calvin Justice if they durst speak their Thoughts. Guy Patin has taught us to make this Judgment [X]. It was he who was the Cause of the Life of this Reformer, wrote by Papyrius Masso, being made public [Y]. This Life has done a great deal of Mischief to the Copiers of

Baleſc;

(98) Calv. Pref. in Psalmos.

‘ ejus reſtinguendi cauſa improbi & mendaces libelli, non alios tam crudeliter tractari quam Anabaptiſtas, ac turbulentos homines qui perverſis deliriis non religionem modo, ſed totum ordinem politicum convellerent. Ego hoc ab aulicis artiſtibus agi videns, non modo ut indigna ſanguinis innoxii effuſio falſa ſanctorum martyrum infamia ſepeliretur, ſed ut poſthac per cædes quaſlibet abſque ullius miſericordia graſſari liceret, ſilentium meum non poſſe à perfidia excuſari cenſui, niſi me pro virili opponerem. Hæc mihi edendæ Inſtitutionis cauſa fuit (98). — While I remained concealed at Baſil, becauſe the burning of ſo many pious Men in France had raiſed every where, among the Germans, the utmoſt Abhorrence, ſeveral wicked and ſcandalous Libels were bandied about to palliate it, under pretence that theſe Cruelties were only exerciſed againſt Anabaptiſts, and other Incendiaries, who by their enthuſiaſtical Doctrines not only attempted the Ruin of Religion, but alſo of Government itſelf. Upon my obſerving this Piece of Court Policy, contrived not only to bury the moſt barbarous Effuſion of ſo much innocent Blood in the forged Infamy of the pious Martyrs, but alſo to give a free Scope to future Executions without the Pity of any one, I thought my Silence would be perfidious, if I did not do my endeavour to defeat it. This was the Occaſion of my publiſhing my Inſtitution.’ Now the Martyrdom of theſe Lutherans fell in Jan. 1535. This Piece therefore muſt have been ſent to the Preſs after January, 1535, and by conſequence the Year 1534, ſet down by Moreri for the Edition of it, muſt be a Miſtake. The Edition could not be in 1536, becauſe it is certain, that, preſently after this Book appeared abroad, Calvin went into Italy to the Ducheſs of Ferrara; from whence coming into France, and deſigning to return towards the Rhine, he paſſed by Geneva, where he ſettled in Auguſt 1536. Beza is not the only Man, who tells us Calvin retired from Baſil after this Book was printed: We have it from Calvin himſelf, and with this Circumſtance, that no body knew he was the Author of it (99). Read the Preface, wherein he ſays ſo, and likewiſe informs us, that his natural Baſhfulneſs made him decline appearing publickly, and forced him to conceal himſelf without minding his Reputation: Read, I ſay, his Preface to the Palms. As for the name Alcuin, ſee the Remark [BB].

There is, in Moreri's Supplement, an Article of Calvin, taken word for word out of Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm: I ſhould therefore be guilty of needleſs Repetitions, if I undertook to cenſure it here. You will find it done in the foregoing Remarks.

[X] A great many — Catholics — would do him Juſtice — if they durſt. Guy Patin has taught us to make this Judgment.} ‘ As for Calvin, I am very well informed of his Merit. Mr Varin gave me an extraordinary Encomium on him, a long time ago; when I was not above twenty Years old. Joſeph Scaliger ſaid, Calvin was the greateſt Wit the World had ſeen ſince the Apoſtles (100). — No Man ever underſtood Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory like him. At the Age of Twenty two, he was the moſt learned Man in Europe. I was once at an Entertainment given by one who commenced Doctör, where an old Doctör, named Baſin, ſaid, that Calvin had perverted all the Scriptures: but I took up this good Man, and made him ſo ridiculous, that Mr Guenaut the younger, who ſat near me, told me I was too hard upon him, and that I ought to take pity on his Age and Weakneſs. John de Monluc, Biſhop of Valence, uſed to ſay, that Calvin was the greateſt Divine in the World. Never fear that any one will venture to ſay as much at Rome (101). [Y] Patin was the Cauſe of the Life of Calvin, writ by Papyrius Maſſo, being made public.} This Particular we have from Patin, in the Letter I have juſt now cited. ‘ Papyrius Maſſo, ſays he, writ his Life ſeparately, which his Brother, who was a Canon, preſented me with in 1616. But ſince that, as they were printing here a Collection of his Elogies, I obtained, with much ado, that this Life ſhould be added: the Bookſeller conſulted the Jeſuits about it, who enjoined him the contrary; but however I prevailed, by aſſuring him, that this Addition would make his Book ſell the better.’ The Text of this Remark proves plainly I have not been over complaiſant to Mr Varillas. I have diligently conſidered all he ſays of the Life of Calvin, printed with Papyrius Maſſo's Encomiums, and I find nothing there able to invalidate Guy Patin's Teſtimony. The Reader, if he pleaſe, may judge of my Conduct, after comparing Mr Varillas's Words with my Notes which follow them.

‘ Baleſdens got Papyrius Maſſo's Encomiums printed, among which was inſerted a Life of Calvin; becauſe having found it amongſt this Author's Papers, he took it to be written by him. This Miſtake is the more inſupportable, becauſe it is writ in ſo different a manner from all Maſſo's other Works, that it needs but an ordinary Knowledge of the Latin Tongue to perceive it at firſt fight. But I cannot help being ſurpriſed, that the famous Spondanus, Biſhop of Pamiers, ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be impoſed upon by Baleſdens, in believing Maſſo to have been the Author of this Piece, and paying a greater Deference to another's Judgment, than to his own. I have been informed by Meſſieurs Dupuy, that it was compoſed by the illuſtrious James Gillot, Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris, who had ſo great a ſhare in the Works of the Learned of his Time, without ever publiſhing his Name: and indeed, that Life ſeems to me altogether worthy the Pen of ſo great a Man. It is a Maſter-piece in it's kind: and though we have ſome of the ſame nature much larger, we have none better performed, nor more correſtly finiſhed. However, it has been of no great ſervice to me; becauſe it ſeems rather deſigned to clear Calvin from the Reproaches of Balduin the Civilian, and Weſſalius the Divine, than to give a particular account of his Actions (102). Theſe are the Words of Varillas: Upon which I obſerve, I. That Baleſdens was not the Perſon who found this Life among Maſſo's Papers: We have been told by Patin, it was he who furniſhed the Bookſeller with it, and perſuaded him to join it to the Elogies of Papyrius Maſſo. But this is not all; Maſſo's Brother made a Prefent of it to Patin, not doubting but it was his Brother's; to which he himſelf added ſeveral things he had received by Tradition, whiſt he was Canon at Angoulême II. The Manner, in which this Life is written, does no otherwiſe differ from the reſt of Maſſo's Works, than as Lives ought to differ from Elogies. If Mr Varillas had compared this Life with thoſe of Charles IX, Dante, Petrarch, and Boccace, all compoſed by the ſame Author, I am certain he would have found it of a Piece with the reſt. You find, in all theſe five Lives, the ſame Division of the Contents and Chapters, the ſame Style, the ſame Genius and Manner of Writing. This, added to Patin's particular and expreſs Teſtimony, makes me believe, either that Meſſieurs Dupuy were miſtaken, or that Varillas did not well remember what they had told him. But I have ſtill a ſtronger Argument. The Author of this Life of John Calvin had ſtudied the Civil-Law under Balduin (103). This exactly agrees with our Papyrius Maſſo (104), but I think not at all with the illuſtrious Gillot. We read in this Life, that Balduin put Calvin to ſilence, to his very great Mortification (105). What Papyrius Maſſo remarks, in his Elogy upon Balduin (106), is perfectly conformable to this. III. Therefore Baleſdens and Spondanus were not to blame for aſcribing this Life to Maſſo's Pen. IV. It does not deſerve thoſe extraordinary Commendations Varillas

Bolsec; for who can read it without laughing at those who accuse this Minister of loving good Wine, good Chear, Money, &c. Some cunning Satirists would have said, that he was naturally sober, and not at all sollicitous to heap up Riches [Z]. They, has bestowed upon it: which I submit to the Judgment of those who are judges of these sort of Productions. V. It is not at all designed to vindicate Calvin from the Aspersions of Balduin the Civilian, and Westphalius the Divine. That Civilian is very often quoted, but without being contradicted; so far from it, that the Description of Calvin's morose, passionate, haughty Temper, is founded upon Balduin's Testimony (107). Varillas's manner therefore of reading of Books must be very unaccountable. He was the only Man in the World, who, upon reading this Life of Calvin, could affirm, that it's principal Design was to refute that Civilian.

If Mr de Vigneul-Marville would but take the pains to consider these things, and, above all, to compare, according to the Rules of Criticism, this Life of Calvin with Massé's other Pieces, I am persuaded he would no longer think 'that the Latin Elogy of Calvin, which is very improperly added at the end of Papyrius Massé's Illustrations Men, is a Piece of Mr Gillot's (108).'

I was mistaken in my Conjecture; he saw this, and yet persisted in his first Opinion. He says, that 'what I alledge, that this Elogy was found among the Papers of Papyrius Massé after his Death, as his Brother declared to the late Dr Patin, proves nothing. Writings of Authors pass every Day from one Study to another, without giving room to draw any such Consequence. As to the Style, it is not at all like that of Papyrius Massé, who wrote neither so politely, nor so exactly, nor with so much brevity, as Mr Gillot: Besides, there is something at the end of the Work not at all agreeable to Papyrius Massé's Character, but very much so to Gillot's, who did not lay the Affairs of those Times so much to heart (109).'

I have examined this with all possible Attention, and yet persist in my Opinion: and to shew that it is not without reason, I shall remark, I. That whoever reads the Words of Mr de Vigneul-Marville, and not my Dictionary, must judge that my only, or at least my principal Reason, was, that this Life of Calvin was among Massé's Papers. The truth is, that I have not at all made use of that Argument. I know very well, that I rejected as false what Mr Varillas says, that Baleiden had found this Elogy among Papyrius Massé's Papers; and I confess that, in order to shew the Falsity of that, I maintained that this Manuscript was communicated to the Bookeller by Guy Patin, who had it from Papyrius Massé's Brother: but none of my Proofs is grounded upon this Work being found among the Papers of the Person I take to be the Author of it. To represent my Argument right, it should have been said, that Papyrius Massé's Brother gave this Manuscript to Guy Patin as his Brother's Work. The Reflection of Mr de Vigneul-Marville doth not affect this Proof; for it is easily apprehended, that Men of Letters know very well how to distinguish, among a Brother's Papers (110), those, which were wrote by him, from those composed by other hands. I forbear to add, that it is probable Papyrius Massé might tell his Brother which among his Papers were the Manuscripts of his own composing. As for the Style, I appeal to those who are judges, and will take the pains to compare this Life of Calvin with some other Lives composed by Massé. This is my second Remark. The third and last is, that the Character of Mr Gillot, who did not lay the Affairs of those times so much to heart, is so far from being against me, that, on the contrary, nothing can be a greater confirmation of my Opinion. For at the end of the Work, we meet with this Passage. 'Hæc de vita Calvini scribimus neque amici neque inimici, quem si labem & perniciem Gallia dixerit, nihil mentiar, atque utinam aut nunquam natus esset, aut in pueritia mortuus. Tantum enim malorum intulit in patriam ut Cunabula ejus merito detestare atque odire debeas. (111). — I write these Things of the Life of Calvin, without considering him either as a Friend or Foe, tho' if I should call him the Pest and Destruction of France, I should not be in the wrong. And I heartily wish he had either never been born, or had died in his Infancy. For he brought such Misfortunes upon his Country, that it has reason to detest and abhor the Hour of his Birth.' This is the Language of a furious Roman Catholic, and not of such a Catholic, as Mr Gillot, who hated the Leaguers and all the Monks, and who had a great deal of Kindness for Scaliger and other Protestants.

[Z] He was not sollicitous to heap up riches.] For a Man, who had acquired so great a Reputation and Authority, to content himself with an hundred Crowns a-year Salary, and, after having lived till near fifty five Years of Age with the greatest Frugality, to leave behind him no more than three hundred Crowns, his Library included; is something so heroic, that it must be stupidity itself not to admire it. 'Accumulandis scilicet opibus studuit, cujus bona omnia, caræ etiam divendita ipsius Bibliotheca, vix trecentos aureos æquant, ut non minus scire quam verè calumniam istam longè impudentissimam refellens hæc verba usurpat (in Præfat. in Comment. in Psalm.) Me non esse pecuniosum si quibusdam vivis non persuadeo, mors tamen ostendet. Testari certè potest Senatus, quum perexigua essent ejus stipendia, tantum abuisse ut in iis non acquiesceret, ut ampliora etiam oblata pertinaciter recusat (112). — It is a strong proof of his having studied to heap up riches, that all his Effects, notwithstanding his Library was sold very dear, scarce amounted to Three hundred Crowns; so that he might very justly, as well as elegantly, in order to wipe off this monstrous Calumny, use these Words, (in the Preface to his Commentary on the Psalms,) If I cannot in my Lifetime persuade some People that I am no hoarder of Money, I shall convince them at my Death. The Senate certainly can witness for him, that, tho' his stipend was but very small, yet he was so far from being unsatisfied with it, that he positively refused the offer of encreasing it.' This is one of the most extraordinary Victories, Virtue and Magnanimity can obtain over Nature, even in those who are Ministers of the Gospel. Calvin has left behind him many, who imitate him in his active Life, his Zeal and Affection for the Cause; they employ their Voices, their Pens, their Steps and sollicitations, for the Advancement of the Kingdom of God: but then they take care not to forget themselves, and are, generally speaking, a Demonstration that the Church is a bountiful Mother, and that nothing is lost in her Service: They verify St Paul's Doctrine, that Godliness has the Promises of the present Life as well as of that which is to come. In a word, God is pleased to give so great a Blessing to their domestic Cares, that we see them enjoy considerable Pensions, and leave large Estates and Settlements to their Heirs. They distribute Alms, they bestow great Charities: which they may easily do, when appointed Trustees for the disposal of all Sums given by others, without being liable to any Account. To conclude, such a Will as this of Calvin, and such a Disinterestedness, is a thing so very extraordinary, as might make even those, who cast their Eyes on the Philosophers of ancient Greece, say of him, Non inveni tantam fidem in Israël. — I have not found so great Faith, no not in Israel. When Calvin was taking his leave of those of Strasburg, in order to return to Geneva, they offered to continue his Freedom, and the Revenue of a Prebend they had assigned him: He accepted the first, but rejected the latter. 'Id tandem Argentinenses concesserunt, ea tamen conditione, ut jus civitatis honorarium, quod in Calvinum contulerant, salvum esset, & præbendæ, quam vocant, annuos redditus retineret; quorum illud probavit Calvinus, istud vero ut acciperet nunquam ab eo extorqueri potuit, ut qui nihil minus quam opes curaret (113).'

He carried one of his Brothers with him to Geneva, 370, ad Ann. 1541, without ever thinking of advancing him to any Honours, as others would have done with his great Credit. He took care indeed of the Honour of his Family;

They, who are desirous of seeing a full and curious Justification of this great Man, need only read what Mr Drelincourt published at Geneva, in 1667, upon that Subject.

I shall here consider a Passage of Mr Moreri, which I let pass in my first Edition, and which relates to the Judgment Erasmus is said to have made on Calvin, after a Conference they had together concerning the Controversies of those times. The Author of this Particular is guilty of so many Mistakes, that his Credit may well be called in question [A A]. The Reflexions, which have been cast on Family; for he found means to disengage him from a Wife, who was an Adulteress (114), and obtained leave for him to marry another: but even his Enemies say he had him taught the Trade of a Book-binder, which he exercised all his Life (115). See the Margin (116).

[A A] I shall consider a Passage on — the Judgment Erasmus is said to have given of Calvin — The Author of this Particular — is guilty of so many Mistakes, that his Credit may well be called in question. * Calvin staid some time at Basil; where * Bucer presenting him to Erasmus, that great Person, who was a good Judge of Men, having discoursed him about Religion, declared openly, that the Church had bred up, in the Person of that young Man, a Plague which would one Day prove fatal to her. These are Moreri's Words: I dare swear he never consulted the Original, I mean Florimond de Remond; and I imagine he has examined no farther than Spondanus's Annals (117). However it be, we shall cite the Original Author (118): * The Register of the Parliament at Paris, concerned at his Brother's Misfortune, pursued him immediately, and brought him back into France, leaving his Friend Calvin behind in Germany, who accompanied Roussel, whom I mentioned before, as his Servant. There he met with most of those who made it their Business to disturb the Consciences of the People, and among them Bucer, by whom he was presented to Erasmus, who was looking about him without suffering himself to be hurried away by the Crowd. When Bucer had given him an Account of this excellent Genius, and Erasmus had conferred some time with him upon the most crabbed Points of Religion; surprized at what he had discovered in this Soul, he said to Bucer, pointing to Calvin, Video magnam pestem oriri in Ecclesia contra Ecclesiam, I see a great Plague born in the Church against the Church. Observe Florimond de Remond's Note in the Margin of his Book in these Words, Beza in his Preface to Joshua places this Journey in 1534: Observe this, I say, as a proof that he admits this small point of Chronology. We shall see presently he has done it to his prejudice; for, thirty Pages after, he tells us, that * Calvin, fearing he should be apprehended at Poitiers, went to visit Roussel and Le Fevre at Nerac, and observes afresh, that Calvin had been Roussel's Servant in his Journey into Germany (119). Calvin, continues he (120), having taken his leave of them, returned to Paris, which he quitted for fear of Faggot, with Torch in Hand, and a Mind incensed with Repentment, and a Resolution of setting Fire to his Country, which he never saw afterwards, and which, ungrateful as she was, refused him, as he said, an Abode. He retired to Strasbourg, becoming for two whole Years Bucer's Auditor and Disciple, who received him as a Person he immediately found proper to trouble the Repose of the Church. — He communicated to him his Christian Institution, which he finished here and at Basil, dedicating it to Francis I. In the first Plate, which he caused to be put at the head of his Institution, he took, for his Device, a flaming Sword, with this Motto, Non veni mittere pacem sed gladium, — I came not to send peace but a sword. — During his stay at Strasbourg, he comforted and assisted his Countrymen, who fled from the Fires kindled up in France, and began from thence to be in great Credit and Reputation every where. — But, upon hearing the News that the Dukes of Ferrara — — began to embrace the Truth, he went to wait on her; and, after a sufficient Ramble, returned by the way of Geneva, where he had made himself known, in his Passage with du Tillet, and, at Farel's Instigation, he there took upon him (121) the Charge of reading Divinity, and making some exhortations to the Refugees. We must take notice, that in the Margin he observes, that the first Impression of Calvin's Institution was in the Year 1534. Here then is the Original of Varilla's sad Anachronisms, which I have already censured (122). But they are yet much grosser in Florimond de Remond's Account: as I will now undertake to convince the least reasonable Persons, observing, in the first place, that Roussel's Journey into Germany followed immediately upon the first Dispersion of the Preachers of the Reformation in France, which happened in 1523 (123). Farel, one of them, fled into Switzerland; * Le Fevre of Etaples bent his Course through Guienne. — — — As for Roussel, he got to Germany, being desirous to see Luther, that great Man, who had made so great a Noise in the World (124). This I have from Remond, who adds, that Roussel, being returned from his Travels (125), was received in Bern by the Queen of Navarre, and attended her to Paris, where he preached (126), was imprisoned, and after his Release retired to Nerac, and passed the rest of his Life in France. It was at Nerac, Calvin saw him, as this Author told us before (127). The Result of this must be, That, if Calvin attended Roussel as his Servant into Germany, it must of necessity be in 1523. Now it is certain Calvin was then a Student at Paris, where he continued his Studies some Years after, being preferred to a Chapel at Neion (128). Observe here, that the Historian follows Beza's Chronology, who makes Calvin and du Tillet leave France in 1534. Since then he assures us, that Tillet, prevailed upon by his Brother, who had followed him a great way, left his Friend Calvin in Germany, who upon that attended Roussel — as his Servant (129), he must allow this to be in 1534. A great blunder this! for he himself had placed Roussel's Journey in the Year 1523. Besides observe, I. That he says Calvin's Institution was first printed in the Year 1534 (130), and that the Author had drawn the Scheme of it at Angoulême (131), and communicated it to le Fevre at Nerac. II. That, after this communication, he makes him go to Paris, and from thence to Strasbourg, in order to be Bucer's Disciple. How is it possible, upon this Foot, that Calvin, in 1534, should accompany Roussel as his Servant into Germany? And again, how is it possible, that, being gone into Germany this Year, and having been two Years Bucer's Scholar at Strasbourg, he should finish his Christian Institution at Basil, which was printed in 1534? Once more, how is it possible, that, after he had been two Years under Bucer at Strasbourg, he should take a Journey into Italy, finish his Ramble, take the Road to Geneva, and settle in that City in 1536 (132). This is not all; for the same Author, still following Beza's Chronology, says, that Calvin at twenty three Years of Age vented his Opinions at Paris, where he staid not long; * because the Place grew too hot for those who dissented from the Faith — he retired thence privately — to Angoulême, for his greater Security, where he was entertained three Years at Lewis du Tillet's Charge (133). — who, having his Head full of the Opinions Calvin had instilled into him (134), went with him into Germany, but left him on the way. The other pursued his Journey, made a Visit to Bucer, conferred with Erasmus, and, at his Return into France, retired to Poitiers (135), where he gained some Disciples, held his first Council (136), and celebrated his first Lord's Supper, and took his Measures for spreading his Opinions throughout the Kingdom: but, fearing a Surprise at Poitiers, where his Mine

Calvin for changing his Name, will give room for a Remark, which will illustrate some Points of his History, and serve for a Supplement to some of the foregoing Observations, particularly to the Passage where I have treated of that famous Work, the Christian Institution [BB]. They have been so zealous in heaping up Scanda, (137) Ibid. cap. xvii, pag. 920. had taken Air, (137) he stole away, and conveyed himself to Nerac, to visit Roussel and Le Fevre; and, having taken his Leave of them, he returned to Paris (138), from whence, for fear of the Faggot, — he retired to Strasburg. — It was here, and at Basil, he put the last Hand to his Institution, which was printed in 1538. This Account is full of so many Mistakes, that, if it be no surprising thing that so many Catholic Writers should copy from it, yet it is very strange that none of the Protestant Authors, I have met with, should expose it's Contradictions. It was very easy to be done: consider but this Touchstone of Chronology. Calvin was born the tenth of July, 1509 (139), and retired from Paris to Angoulême at the Age of Twenty three (140). Florimond de Remond agrees in these two Facts; this Retreat therefore must be placed in 1532. Now he supposes, that the first Edition of Calvin's Institution was in 1534: Between these two Terms therefore he thrusts in his three Years stay at Angoulême, a Journey into Germany, a Return into France, a Residence at Poitiers, sufficient for the Establishment of a clandestine Church, the Celebration of the Lord's Supper, the holding of a Synod, &c. a Journey to Nerac, another to Paris, and an Abode of two whole Years at the City of Strasburg. Can any thing be more monstrous? We must not forget, that he supposes Charles le Sage, Doctor Regent at Poitiers, and Native of Noion, was one of Calvin's Converts, after his Journey into Germany, three or four Years after his Flight from Paris, which happened in the Year 1532. Since then he pretends, that this Doctor le Sage was a Man in great Esteem, especially with the Queen Regent, the King's Mother, who was very near being staggered and seduced (141), he would make us believe, that this Doctor, who was perverted himself in 1536, had staggered the Queen Regent, who died notwithstanding in 1531.

This is the Author, who affirms, that Erasmus passed, upon Calvin, the Judgment mentioned in the Text of this Remark. My Readers must judge whether the Authority of such a Man be of any weight, a Man who contradicts himself most grossly, who forgets in one place what he asserted in another, who confounds and misplaces Circumstances, and cannot see in his Work the Blunders, Absurdities, and Impossibilities, which stare full in his Eyes. Such an Historian ought to be treated like a Bankrupt Merchant, who has lost all Credit: no body will trust him without sufficient Pledges; it is expected he should give Security, and find Bondsmen. We should be very weak therefore, to give any Credit to Florimond de Remond, when he brings neither Witnesses, nor any other sort of Proof. We should be very imprudent to trust him, and highly deserve to be deceived, if we made so bad an Use of our Sincerity. I thought therefore that a Censure of this Author's Falsities would serve me as a Preliminary, and that after this my Readers might judge with greater certainty of the matter in question. Undoubtedly this is the only witness in the Cause; for he who has taken so much pains to make Erasmus pass for a good Catholic, and could draw so many Advantages from the Truth of this Story, could cite no other than Florimond de Remond (142). However, all things rightly considered, this Judgment of the great Erasmus must be very much to Calvin's Glory, according to the Protestant Hypothesis. It proves that he acknowledged the eminent Qualities of this young Man.

To conclude; I should not have been so busy in exposing the Falsities of Florimond de Remond, if I had not observed, that they spread from Book to Book, and that the most celebrated Authors procure them a sort of Perpetuity by adopting them. I have met with them in the last Volume of Father Alexander's Ecclesiastical History in Folio, which is an Edition corrected and enlarged. I persuaded myself this famous Author had not copied Spondanus, Remond's Copier, had he seen the latter criticized as above. If the Protestants complain that he has revived Remond's confused Narration, and put it in a way to make a better Fortune than under the Auspices of it's first Parent, he may complain of them in his Turn for neglecting to discover his Impertinencies. It is very difficult, even by a substantial Confutation, to hinder some Errors from being perpetuated. What must it be therefore, if they are let alone?

[BB] The Reflexions ----- cast on Calvin for changing his Name will give room for a Remark ----- which will serve for a Supplement ----- to the Passage, where I have treated of his Christian Institution.] It has been taken very ill, that, instead of Cauvin, which was the Name of his Family, he took that of Calvin. Mr Drelincourt has justified him very well, not only by some Examples (143), but also from solid Reasons. 'In Reality, says he (144), the Change of a Letter in Calvin's Name, is very inconsiderable, or we may even say it is none at all. And indeed, in turning Cauvin into Latin, to give it an Air and Termination suitable to the Genius of that Language, it cannot be translated otherwise than by Calvinus. For as the Picard Word Cauve, and the French Chauve, is by all good Authors expressed in Latin by Calvus; so Cauvin in Picard, and Chauvin in French, must in Latin be Calvinus. Now the first Works of this godly Man being wrote in Latin, and having made him universally known by the Name Calvinus; if afterwards, when he wrote in French, he had used any other Name than that of Calvin, the Work might have been ascribed to some different Author, to the great Damage both of the Public and Printers.' But here follow some other Changes of his Name. 'The most notorious Cheat of all the Heretics, in matter of Disguises, was John Calvin, who, when first he revolted, being hurried by a restless Spirit, and afraid of his own Shadow, changed his Name oftener than his Lodging: For, I. In 1559, having licked his little Cub, his first Institutions, into some sort of Shape, he presented them to Francis I, under the Name of JOHANNES ALCUINUS, which was his Anagram, and under which they were printed at Strasburg per Vendelinum Ribellium mense Augusto, Anno MDXXXIX. II. In 1543, he called himself JOHANNES CALIDOENIUS, a Name half Greek and half Latin, as if he would say Johannes de Calido vino. This is his Name at the end of Pacianus's Works, in his Epistle to his Friend Boygard, Boycardo Johannes CALIDOENIUS. S. This Name seems exactly to answer that of his Family: for Calidænius is Chauvin in French, which is believed in reality to be the true Name of his Father. III. In 1548, he would be called JOHANNES CARVINUS, as much as to say Cherwin, and it is thus he subscribed himself at the end of Orus Apollo's Ænigma's, printed at Paris, Anno 1548, for Christian Wechel, per Joannem Mercetrum, who first translated them; for at the end of this Translation is an Epigram under the Title of JOANNIS CARVINI ad Mercetrum. Epigramma. IV. After 1550, he made his Friends call him CHARLES DE HAPPEVILLE, which was a fatal Omen, faith Matthew Launois, in his Reply, that Cavin, and his Followers, would one day, bapper les villes, seize and take our Towns by Treachery and Surprize, and sculk within our Walls, as the Experience of fifty Years has sufficiently convinced us, at the Expence of so much Noble Blood shed to expel those Traitors out of the Places they have been hitherto in Possession of. V. To put an end to this Extravagance, he at last called himself JOHN CALVIN, which Name has been continued to him to this Day (145). These Words of Garasse are very apt to mislead all the Critics who have not the Opportunity of consulting great Libraries:

baries: And for myself, who am of that Number, I confess I am very unable to refute this Passage in the manner it deserves. I am persuaded it is full of Falsities; but, not having those Books by me which are requisite to furnish literal and demonstrative Proofs against this Author, I can only oppose him with Probabilities. His first Article shall be considered hereafter. His second I can say nothing to; but I will venture to maintain he is mistaken in the third: For what likelihood is there, that Calvin, in 1548, should amuse himself with writing a Latin Epigram upon such a Work as this of Orus Apollo? It is infinitely more probable, that the Joannes Carvinus, under which this Epigram appeared, was the true Name of its Author. Florimond de Remond tells us, that one of the Calvinist Apostles was called John Carvin, that he came from Artois, and taught School at Ville Neuve in Agnois, and acted the Part of a Minister, under the Gown of a Master (146); and he was very probably the same with Joannes Carvinus, a Physician of Montaubon, who caused seven Dialogues, de Sanguine, to be printed at Lyons, by Sebastian Gryphius, in 1562 (147). I am sure we can prove Garasse a Liar in the fourth Article: For how ridiculous is it to suppose, that Calvin, after the Year 1550, should desire to take the Name of Charles Happeville? What reason had he now for a Disguise? He lived in great Security at Geneva; he was universally known by his true Name; he placed it at the Head of his Works; and had rendered it venerable among all the Reformed. Garasse confounds Times very ignorantly: He ought to have pitched upon another Epoch, as Papyrius Masso has done, who says, that Calvin, going into Italy to visit the Dukes of Ferrara, called himself Hepeville (148). Garasse's fifth Article is the most absurd of all: it must be a monstrous Degree of Stupidity to venture to publish, that the last Name, this Minister took upon him, was that of John Calvin, after having been called Charles Happeville from the Year 1550. Spondanus charges him only with having taken the Name of Carolus Hepeville, in his Journey to Italy in 1535 (149). Observe that he accuses him likewise for giving himself the Name of Depercan at Angoulême in 1534 (150). Papyrius Masso's Brother says the same thing (151).

We have already seen (152), that Mr Moreri pretends Calvin put the Name of Alcuinus in the Title of his Books of Institution, printed at Basil 1534 (153). I cannot determine whether he is in the right or wrong: I have not been able any where to find a Copy of the first Edition of this Work of Calvin; but what makes me doubtful, is, that, according to Spondanus, the Anagram of Alcuinus was not made use of till the Strasbourg Edition, in 1539. 'Ipse ex paterno cognomine in Latinam formam mutato, ex Calvino aliquando transpositis literis Alcuinum sese nominavit, uti in Institutionis suae editione Argentorati 1539, nomen æmulatus magni illius Alcuini qui Caroli Magni præceptor fuit, & Parisensem Academiam instituit. Qui potius alia transpositione Lucianum se dicere debuisset (154). — Having turned his Family Name into Latin, from Calvinus, by a Transposition of the Letters, he called himself sometimes Alcuinus, as in the Strasbourg Edition of his Institution, in 1539, being ambitious of passing under the Name of the great Alcuinus, who was Preceptor to Charlemagne, and Founder of the University of Paris. But it had been much more just for him, by another Transposition, to have taken that of Lucianus.' This Latin is only a sort of Paraphrase on a Passage in Florimond de Remond: 'His Name was John Chauvin — but as Luther thought fit to alter his Name, so he was pleased to take that of Calvin. And, as if this Name was not glorious enough, or rather unlucky to him, since Lucian is an Anagram of Calvin, he gave himself the Name of Alcuin, the learned Tutor of the Emperor Charlemain, under which he published his first Institution at Strasbourg in 1539, (155). Garasse, as we observed before, is more precise in this Point; for he set down the very Printer's Name. I dare not undertake the Negative, because I never could meet with a Copy of this Strasbourg Edition, 1539, any more than with that of Basil, 1535. But I dare say, if ever this Work was published under the Name of Alcuin, it is more probable that it was in the first Edition than in that of Strasbourg 1539; for being than Professor and Minister at Strasbourg, he had not the same Reasons for a Disguise as in 1535. Observe, that he is accused of having fathered a Book upon Alcuin, Preceptor to Charlemain, that is, of writing it himself, and publishing it in Alcuin's Name. The Inquisition at Rome, and in Spain, condemned this Piece, as being Calvin's Work, falsely ascribed to Alcuin. Alcuinus seu potius, Calvinus. Ejus Commentarii in libros, de Trinitate, omnino prohibentur (156). They neither take notice of the Time nor the Place in which it was printed. Theophilus Raynaud (157) mentions this Matter in such general Terms, as to give room to believe there was no Foundation for this Proceeding of the Inquisition.

It has not been thought sufficient to criticize Calvin's Institution, as a pseudonymous Piece, but the very Cut, they pretend he ordered to be engraved for the Title-Page, has been commented on, and the Work itself affirmed to be nothing else but a Collection of Plagiarisms. This Cut, say they, was a Sword in the midst of Flames, with this Motto, Non veni mittere pacem, sed gladium (158). — I came not to send Peace, but a Sword. Many Authors have maintained, that this was his own Device. Mr Drelincourt says it is false, and that 'their Proofs are impertinent. For 'it is, continues he (159), as if any one should 'object to me the symbolical Figures, which are 'placed without my Knowledge on the Frontispiece of some of my Works, and pretend them to be my proper Device. We are not at all responsible for the Printers Actions, who on these Occasions think they have an equal Liberty with Painters or Poets. — But if we consider this Device more nearly, we shall find it neither Calvin's nor the Printer's, but JESUS CHRIST's himself, who says expressly, He was not come to send Peace into the World, but War, the Sword, and Fire. So that all the Strokes and Subtilties of the Jesuit (160) wound CHRIST himself, and arm the Atheists against his holy Doctrines (161). I believe, in Calvin's Life-time, they made a great Out-cry against this pretended Device: For I have observed, that Girard, who printed the Institution at Geneva, in 4to, left out the above-mentioned Motto about the flaming Sword, though it is on the Title-Page of his Tract against the fantastical and furious Sect of the Libertines, Anno 1545. As to his being a Plagiary, of which this great Author is accused, you need only read these Words of Spondanus: 'Secedens Angolismam ibi triennium — commoratus, pestilentem suam Institutionem fabricare cepit, ex locis communibus Melancthonis, Hyperii Sacerii, (162) & id genus quicquid illis magna parte confarcinatam: quamquam Westphalus Lutheranus scribens postea adversus eum, meram Oecolampadii doctrinam, sed immutatam paululum atque amplificatam, in ea contineri ait (163). This Annalist is here only the Translator of a Passage of another Writer: It was at Angoulême, where Calvin, to surprise Christianity, first contrived the Snare of his Institution, which may be called the Alcoran, or rather the Talmud, of Heresy, being a Collection of all the Errors which have been, or, I believe, ever will be, patched up in great Measure from the Common-Places of Melancthon, Hyperius, and Sarcier. The Lutheran Westphalus says, it is only Oecolampadius's Doctrine, a little disguised and augmented (164). It is certain the second Edition of this Work of Calvin was finished whilst Hyperius remained in Obscurity, and before he had made himself known by his Theological Writings. I do not say altogether so much of Erasmus Sarcier. I am not ignorant that he was Author of some Books before the Year 1539; but all, who are capable of judging, must readily own, upon comparing them with the Christian Institution, that Calvin lewd Behaviour of his Brother's Wife [CC]. They have made a mighty Noise of one of his Nephews returning into the Bosom of the Catholic Church [DD]. The Report spread at Augsburg, during the Imperial Diet, about the Year 1559, of Calvin's being reconciled to the Romish Communion (1), was too readily credited, even by some Protestant Princes. He complains of it as a piece of Ingratitude, from which his Constancy, so often experienced, ought to have protected him (m). Thuanus has observed, that Calvin, in some part of his Works, appears extremely displeased, that they had conferred upon the King of England, the Quality of the Head of the Church (n). Mr Ancillon has related this Passage, and does not disapprove of their Opinion, who think this was the Cause of publishing a defamatory Libel against Calvin [EE].

I shall

Calvin could never have occasion to steal from him, or think of turning Plagiary on such Terms as these. There appears such a masterly Hand, and Superiority of Genius, throughout the whole Work, that the Accusation of Plagiarism must be esteemed ridiculous by all good Judges. Time has not lessened the Esteem of Calvin's Institution: Many, who are not learned enough to read it in the Language of the Learned, lament the Barbarousness of the old French Translation. It is for their sake a Refugee Minister has undertaken a new Version: He has already translated the first and second Books into modern French (165), and is going on with the rest. Under favour, they shew themselves either over squeamish, or over ignorant. Calvin's French Style, which was very pure for that Age, is not yet unintelligible. I know several Men of a nice Taste, who read, with Pleasure, his own Translation of that Work, of which Conrad Badius's Edition at Geneva, in Folio, 1560, or rather that published in the same Place two Years after (166), seems to me to be the best. I shall make good one of the Things I have asserted, from a Passage of Paquier. Calvin was a good Writer both in Latin and French, and our French Tongue is highly obliged to him for enriching it with so great a Number of fine Expressions (167).

from Chamberi to Geneva to visit an Uncle of his, who was there become an Huguenot, embraced the Protestant Religion at Geneva, and married Rachel de St André, Anthony Calvin's Niece. From this Marriage came Stephen de la Faverge, 'who, after his Parents Death, was brought up in the Family of the Calvin, and sent to Heidelberg by Anthony Calvin, his Guardian --- his Studies being accomplished, he returned to Geneva, where, at thirty Years of Age, he was installed in the Council --- of Two hundred. Being to pay a Visit to a Relation in Savoy, he went to hear Francis de Sales preach, with whom he had even some Conferences touching some Points in Religion. He disputed likewise with two Capuchin Fathers.' He made a Journey to Rome in the Year 1600, to see the Ceremonies of the Jubilee. 'He was robbed upon the Road by his Companion, and seized with a continual Fever as soon as he set foot in Rome. He was visited by a Physician, who would not come to him any more, till, according to the Custom at Rome, it should be certified in writing, that he had been confessed.' The Patient sent to the Convent of Capuchins, and desired a Religious of Savoy would come and visit a Savoyard Gentleman. Faiber Cherubim, whom he had seen in Savoy --- came to him, and recommended him to Father Peter of the Mother of God, Commissary-General of the Barefooted Carmelites of the Italian Congregation. This Carmelite visited him, and got him some Alms from the Pope. This charitable Act softened the Patient's Heart. He proposed his Doubts to the Capuchins, and to the Carmelite, and resolved to turn Catholic. The Pope promised him a Pension of Eight hundred Crowns, and put him into the Hands of Cardinal Baronius to be instructed. The Father Carmelite gave him the Life of St Teresa to read. In short, though the Pope dissuaded him all he could, this Profelyte had a mind to be a Barefooted Carmelite, and, his Novitiate being expired, he was professed the fourteenth of July, 1602. He was called Clement of St Mary, and executed a great many Offices in the Order. He died in the Convent of Avignon, Anno 1643 (171).

[EE] Mr Ancillon has related this Passage, and does not disapprove their Opinion, who think this was the cause of publishing a defamatory Libel against Calvin.] For my Reader's Instruction, I must hear make some short Observations. 'The Place where Calvin complains of the Flatterers of Henry VIII, calling him The Supreme Head of the Church, is his Commentary upon the thirteenth Verse of the seventh Chapter of the Book of the Prophet Amos. These are his Words. 'Qui initio tantopere extulerunt Henricum Regem Angliæ, certe fuerunt inconsiderati homines, dederunt illi summam rerum omnium potestatem; & hoc me semper graviter vulneravit; Erant enim Blasphemi cum vocarent summum Caput Ecclesiæ sub Christo, hoc certe fuit nimium. --- They who at first so greatly extolled Henry, King of England, were certainly very inconsiderate; they complemented him with the Supreme Power over all Things: This has always given me a great deal of concern. For it was Blasphemy in them to call him Supreme Head of the Church under CHRIST, and certainly more than they could justify.' I do not know whether this might not be what vexed a certain Englishman, and, as some imagine, occasioned that Defamatory Libel against Calvin, in which this Englishman, who was John Brerely a Priest, charges Calvin with saying, in his Commentaries upon Daniel, that we ought sooner to spit in the Face

VOL. II.

I shall begin my Supplements with observing, that Theodore Beza has written the Life of Calvin in Latin and in French. That in French serves by way of Preface to the Commentary of Calvin on Job, and is also printed separately. The first Edition is less ample, and less exact, than the following. I have compared it with the Edition (o) of the Year 1565; and I have found in the latter many new Facts, and some others better unfolded, with the Circumstances of Time better distinguished. I shall give some Examples of all This [FF]. This Edition has almost all these same Advantages over the Life written in Latin; but, on the other side, there are some things in the Latin, which are not in the French (p). As for what relates to the Supplement which I have to give, concerning the Editions of the Institution, you will find it in the Remark [D], of the Article SCHULTINGIUS. I have already said (q), that Calvin was greatly exclaimed against, for accusing the Popes and Cardinals of making a Jest of the Christian Religion [GG]. I shall retouch this.

(o) Of Geneva, for Francis Perren, with the Commentary on Job, in Folio.

of a Catholic King than obey him: In answer to which Libel, a Letter was published, inserted in the first Collection of the most memorable Things which happened under the League, &c. intitled, A Letter from a French Gentleman, containing a brief Answer to the Calumnies of a pretended Englishman. By this Letter it appears, that Calvin's Commentary only concerns Nebuchadnezzar, who commanded his Golden Image to be worshipped, &c. (172). I affirm, in the first place, That the Libel, which was answered by the Letter from a French Gentleman, inserted in the first Volume of the Memoirs of the League, was not at all designed against Calvin: It was wrote against the Huguenot Party in general, and with a View to prevent Henry of Bourbon, King of Navarre, from succeeding to the Crown of France. It mentions Calvin only by accident, and in few Words. I say, II. The Author of it was no Englishman: No body doubts but it was writ by Lewis of Orleans. The Turn he gave it was, to give it as the Advice of the English Catholic to the French, not to permit a Heretic Prince to succeed to Henry III. Neither Brerely, nor any other English Papist, could be angry with Calvin, on account of his Remark on Henry VIII. Every Roman Catholic must have approved this Thought of Calvin, and might make advantage of it against Queen Elizabeth. Undoubtedly if all he writ had been of this Stamp, he had been less exposed to the Malice of the Papists, and still much less to the Libels of the English Priests, than of any other Nation. IV. I observe lastly, That the Answer, inserted in the first Tome of the Memoirs of the League, is that which Mr du Pleffis Mornai wrote to Lewis of Orleans's Libel (173), which I cited before (174).

[FF] His Life — in French — of the Edition of 1565 — contains new Facts — others better laid open, with the Circumstances of Time better mer'ed. I will give some examples of all this.] We do not find in the French Edition of 1564, in 12mo, what I have taken out of the Edition of 1565, in Folio, when I related, that a Grandson of a Bastard of the Duke of Burgundy, Philip the Good, forsook the Reformed Church (175). We do not find there, that, in the Month of March, 1599, Peter Viretus, for good reasons, with certain others, left the Place in which they were, (that is to say, Lausanne) and retired to Geneva: where he was intreated, as well by the Magistrates, as by Calvin, and the other Ministers, to discharge the Office of Pastor of the Church (176), and that 'the Magistrates and Governor of the City, by the Advice of Calvin, ventured at that time to establish something of a School, and a public Profession of the principal Languages, having recovered some excellent Persons, among those, who were retired to Geneva with Peter Viretus (177). This confirms my Conjectures, that Viretus retired from Lausanne for certain reasons, which it was not thought proper to declare (178). Hence also I partly discover the reason why Theodore Beza left Lausanne; for it cannot be doubted, that he was one of those, who retired from thence with Viretus, for good Reasons. The Circumstance of Time convinces me of it. It was in 1559, that he began to teach in the Academy of Geneva, and he informs us, that they made choice of Professors among those, who had taken refuge at Geneva, with Viretus. Now from his retiring with such a Person, and for the same Reasons, I conclude, it was not on account of some scandalous Action, as his Adversaries pretend (179); and I conjecture, that it was owing solely to Confissorial or Academic Factions. Observe, that the Passage, from whence I draw these Consequences, is not to be found in the Latin Life of John Calvin.

Neither do we find there, no more than in the French of 1564, in 12mo, what I am going to relate. Calvin, in 1546, composed a little Book in French, by way of Advertisement, that it would be greatly worth the while to make an Inventory of all the Relics, which the Papists value, in France, Italy, Germany, Spain, and other Countries. There he discovers not only the Abuse and Idolatry, committed in those Places, but also the manifest Lies of the Priests, when, in different Churches, Towns, and Countries, the one and the other pretend to have the same thing. Now, he has not comprised the whole, but only produced some examples, which however are pretty numerous, and such as cannot be denied. Nevertheless his Design was to enlarge the said Book, if he could get Information of the like matters in the said Countries, of which there are prodigious numbers, besides those he mentions. And indeed he often jestingly reproved his particular Friends, for not recovering more ample Memoirs of such things. As for France, we have nothing farther to fear, on that account, thank God. For War has had such opportunity of sweeping away, and destroying, so much of this Rubbish, that we have only to beg of God, that he would please, by some means more gentle for the People of the Earth, to take away the Remains of it both in France and other Countries (180).

There is, in this Edition of 1565, a more particular Account of the differences Calvin had with Bolsec, Capitio, and Gentilis, &c. than either in the Latin Life, or the first Edition of the French.

The Author had let fall some Mistakes, which he corrected afterwards. He had said, that Calvin published his Institution at Basil, in 1534 (181). This is not to be found in the Edition of 1565. He had said, that Calvin married the Widow of John Stordeur, called Idelette de Bure, with whom he lived peaceably, till our Lord called him to himself in 1548, without having had any Children (182); but, in the Edition of 1565, he says; 'and with this Woman he continued to live peaceably, till our Lord took her to himself, leaving behind her no Children; for she had brought him one Son (183), he died presently (184).' Some Pages after (185), he observes, that she died in the Month of March 1549.

He did not correct all that wanted correction; for, in the Edition of 1565, as well as in the preceding Edition, and in the Latin Life, he says, that Calvin, at Twenty four Years of Age, dedicated his Commentary on the Book of Seneca, de Clementia, to one of the Lords Mommor, in whose Company he had been entertained at Paris, in the Schools, though not always at their Expence (186). Now it is certain, that this Book was dedicated, the fourth of April, 1532, to Claudius de Hangeft, Abbot of St Eloi of Naien. Calvin was not then quite Twenty three Years of Age. See the Remark [B].

how the Jesuit John Hay reports the Terms of This Accusation. Spandanus reports them in the same manner; but he observes, that Calvin adds, 'that, though all are not of this Opinion, and that there are few, who talk in this manner, yet it is long since this Religion began to be the common Religion of the Popes, and that this is notorious to those, who are acquainted with Rome (188).'

'Did he not blush, pray, continues Spandanus, when he wrote these Blasphemies? Or rather did he at all grow pale, through fear that God should cause the Hand to wither, with which he wrote them? If it be true, and he really believed so, why has he not given us proofs of the thing? The Crimes were such, that it was worth while doing this good Office to Christianity, especially as he was so very zealous for our Salvation. The Minister Coladon, who published his Institution at Louanne, in 1576, being sensible that This Passage was difficult to be maintained, endeavoured to fortify it with the Authority of Erasmus, in an Epistle to one Steuchus †, in which he says: There may be, in Germany, Persons, who refrain not from blaspheming GOD; but such Persons are sure to be most severely punished: whereas I myself have heard, at Rome, Persons, who have thrown out abominable Blasphemies against JESUS CHRIST and his Apostles, and that in the Presence of many, who were Ear-witnesses with me, without being punished for it. I have not Erasmus's Book at present by me; but it is easy to judge, by what Coladon cites from it, that the Author speaks of common, dissolute, People, such as abound every where with regard to Blasphemy; and our Reformers know what numbers of such there are, among themselves, who know how to put it in practice. This may be the Case at Rome, and perhaps worse; but, that it is a Point of private Doctrine, Calvin will never be able to prove; and I desire no other Passage of all his Writings, to make it appear, that he was actuated by a Spirit of Indignation and Revenge.'

† Erasmi. Epist. ad Steuchum.

It is certain, that Erasmus does not speak of what the dissolute Vulgar might say: he mentions some Priests of the Pope's Palace. Let us produce his Words at full length, and let us observe, that he opposes them to the Accusation of Impiety, which Steuchus had brought against the Protestants of Germany. 'Interdum stilum odiosius stringis mea sententia, quam par est, in Germanos, veluti Deuteronomii capite sexto, quum is locus non porrigat ansam incandescendi: Neque enim, inquis, hoc dicimus, quorundam Germanorum imitati procacitatem, qui sibi omnibus & Diis & hominibus, & humanis & divinis rebus, maledicendi licentiam usurpant. Ita tu quidem. Fieri potest, ut in Germania sint, qui non temperent a blasphemis in Deum, sed in hos horrendis suppliciis animadvertitur. At ego Romæ his auribus audivi quosdam abominandis Blasphemis debacchantes in Christum & in illius Apostolos, idque multis mecum audientibus, & quidem impune. Ibidem multos novi, qui commemorabant, se dicta horrenda audisse a quibusdam sacerdotibus Aulæ Pontificiæ ministris, idque in ipsa Missa, tam clare, ut ea vox ad multorum aures pervenerit (189). — Sometimes you draw your Pen, with more venom, I think, than you ought, against the Germans; as, in the sixth Chapter of Deuteronomy, though that Place affords no handle for growing enraged. Nor do I say This (They are your own Words) in Imitation of the Sauciness of some Germans, who assume to themselves the Liberty of calumniating every thing, both God and Man, divine and humane Things. Thus you speak. It is true, there may be, in Germany, Persons, who refrain not from Blasphemies against GOD; but such Persons suffer the cruelest Punishments. Whereas, at Rome, I myself have heard Persons uttering abominable Blasphemies against CHRIST, and his Apostles, and that in the hearing of many besides myself, and yet have never been punished for it. I knew many there, who told me, they had heard shocking Expressions from certain Priests, belonging to the Pope's Palace, and that during the very Mass, and so loud, that many heard what they said.'

CAMALDOLI (AMBROSE de), Ambrosius Camaldulensis, so called because he was Abbot-General of the Order of Camaldoli, was a learned Man in the XVth Century. He was born near Florence, at Portico, a little Town of Romandiola (a), and learned Greek under Emanuel Chrysoloras, who taught at Venice (b). He entered into the Order of Camaldoli at fourteen Years of Age, and was made General in 1431 (c). He had already enjoyed some of their other Employments, and had lived among them for the space of thirty Years (d). Pope Eugenius IV, who had a great Value for him, sent him to the Council of Basil, and had great Reason to commend his Zeal, in maintaining the Authority of the Papal Chair. This General continued to testify the same Zeal in the Council of Ferrara, and that of Florence: where he disputed strongly against the Greeks. He harangued, in Greek at Ferrara, John (e) Paleologus, Emperor of Constantinople, in the Year 1437, and made the Greeks confess that he understood their Language the best of any of the Latins (f). It was he whom Pope Eugenius dispatched to the Florentines, to engage their Consent that the Council of Ferrara might be removed to their City. He obtained what the Pope desired, and was made choice of to draw up the Form of Union between the Latin and Greek Churches (g). He is accused by Sguropulus, not only of an extream Partiality for the Pope, but also of Hypocrisy and Knavery (b) [A].

[A] He is accused by Sguropulus — of Hypocrisy and Knavery.] There are not a few Writers, who have given us quite another Account of this Author: we find in his Works certain Characters, which confute this Calumny of Sguropulus. However it be, it is certain, that one of the most satirical Writers of his Time has given us an authentic Testimony of our Ambrose's Integrity. I mean Poggius Florentinus, who, in one of his Dialogues against Hypocrites, where he lashes, on all sides, a multitude of famous Men, has these Words: 'Quid, Carolus inquit, de nostro Ambrosio judicatis? rectane an tortuosa philosophabatur via? Nunquid vobis hypocrisis redolebat? Nequaquam, Hieronymus inquit; fuit enim vir optimus meo judicio ac probatissimus, qui in suo cœnobio literis deditus multa scripsit magna cum laude & doctrina. Summa certe fuit prædix humanitate ac virtute. Laudo vitam illius, Carolus inquit, & existimo extra hypocrisis fuisse, &c. — What, says Charles, do you think of our Ambrose? Is his Reasoning just or not? Does he appear a Hypocrite? By no means, says Jerom; for in my Opinion he was a most excellent and worthy Man, who gave himself up to Letters in his Convent, and wrote many Things with great Reputation and Learning. He was certainly endued with the greatest Virtue and Humanity. I admire his Life, says Charles, and believe it intirely free from Hypocrisy, &c.' Father Nicolas Bartolini quotes this Passage at the end of the Hodæporicon, and tells us this Dialogue of Poggius was to be sent to the Press at the Instance of some Frenchmen, whose Importunities Mr. Magliabacchi could not resist. Paul Jovius, who is sometimes more apt to commend than condemn, confesses that the General of Camaldoli was a Man, who, by an uncommon Piece of good Fortune, had joined Sanctity

Ambrose was the Distributer of the petty Sums assigned by the Pope for the Relief of the indigent Grecians. He collected a large Library in the Convent of St Mary of the Angels, where he resided (i), and translated, out of the Greek into Latin, several Books, as those of Dionysius the Areopagite, De Cælesti Hierarchia, those of Manuel Calecas, against the Errors of the Grecian Church, Palladius's Life of St Chrysostome, Aeneas Gazæus's Theophrastus [B], The Spiritual Meadow of John Moschus, St John Climacus, several of St Ephrem's Sermons, &c. Gerard Vossius, Provost of Tongres, is accused of a remarkable Plagiarism, in regard to this last Translation (k). Ambrose was not content to translate the Works of several Fathers of the Church, but had a mind to try his Strength on the Heathen Authors; he made choice of one who was not the most easy, I mean Diogenes Laërtius, and met with no extraordinary Success (l). As to his own Works they consist of a Chronicle of Mount Cassin, a History of his own Transactions while he was General of Camaldoli, some Lives of the Saints, some Orations, and a Treatise De Sacramento admirabili Corporis Christi, &c. To which some add a Treatise of the Procession of the Holy Ghost [C]. As he writ a great Number of Letters, Cosmo de Medicis, who had a very particular Esteem for him (m), ordered them to be collected into one Volume, by a Monk of Camaldoli. This Volume has never yet been published; but is in the Library of Florence: The World has been promised it, with the Notes of Nicolas Bartolini, who has already obliged us with Ambrose's Hodæporicon; a Work which equally proves the Author to have been a very honest Man, and to have lived in a very corrupt Age [D]. Those, who say he died in the Year 1490 (n),

Sanctity and Gayety together; and that he had a Soul so free from Envy, and the Spirit of Contradiction, that, in endeavouring to reconcile Poggius and Laurentius Valla, he told them they behaved themselves neither like Men of Learning, nor Christians, whilst they debated the Dignity of the Sciences by their satirical Writings. 'Fuit hic vir, quod raro evenit, sine oris tristitia sanctus, semper utique suavis atque serenus; ita procul à livore contentioneque, ut cum Vallæ Poggium reconciliare conaretur, eos neque planè literatos, neque item Christianos videri diceret, qui inducta simulate sacrosanctum literarum decus probro libellis importune defecderant (1).'

[B] He translated — Aeneas Gazæus's Theophrastus. My Remark on this Version is only to have an Opportunity of observing, that our Ambrose made a Voyage which very few have mentioned. He went to Constantinople with Guarin and Philippus, to perfect himself in the Greek Tongue; and returning from thence, passed by the Isle of Chios, where Andreas Justiniani, a Lover of Learning, and learned Men, received this little Troop of Travellers with all possible Friendship. Ambrose, to testify his Gratitude, dedicated to him his Translation of Aeneas Gazæus (2).

(2) See Augustin Justiniani, Andreas's Grandson's, Dedication, prefixed to this Translation, in the Venice Edition, 1513. See also the Dedication of the Translator.

[C] Some add to his Works, a Treatise of the Procession of the Holy Ghost [Vossius (3), after having observed, that Possavin, Tritheimius, and some others (4), attribute a Book concerning the Holy Ghost, to the General of Camaldoli, adds, that they seem to mistake that for a Work of this General, which was no other than a Translation. Mr Wharton, who writ a long time after Vossius, yet ascribes this Piece to Ambrose as an Original. He also attributes to him, in the same Nature, the Work contra Vituperatores Monastica vitæ, which is, says he (5), among the Manuscripts of St Juana's Library at Padua, of which neither Bellarmino nor Pocciandus have made any mention. However, I make no doubt but this Work was only a Translation of St Chrysostom's three Books, adversus vitæ monasticæ vituperatores, which Volaterranus has taken notice of in speaking of our Author. See also Father Labbe (6), in his Catalogue of the fourth Tome of St Chrysostom's Works, according to the Paris Edition 1614, and Gesner's Bibliotheca in the Catalogue of the Works of the same Father, printed at Basel, in the Year 1530. This Work, translated by our Ambrose, is quoted in both these Editions.

[D] His Hodæporicon — — — — — equally proves the Author to have been a very honest Man, and to have lived in a very corrupt Age.] This Book is a Relation of a Journey Ambrose made thro' several Places of Italy in 1431 and 1432. He set out from his Convent the eleventh of October, 1431, to be present at a general Chapter of the Order. This Chapter deposed their General, and advanced our Ambrose in his Place, who, after that, visited several Houses of his Order. He found a monstrous Degeneracy among them, and some Nunneries which were perfect Brothels. The Author ventured to relate it in Greek rather than Latin, deprehendi etævis in Monasterio commorari non Santimoniales (7). — I found the Convent consisted of Whores instead of Nuns. He thundered against this Disorder; and the Abbess at last confessed, that there was not a due Government in the House, but that neither she, nor some of the more aged, followed the Torrent. He was not so weak as to be satisfied with such an imperfect Confession; he discovered the whole Extent of the Mischief, forbade them to admit any Monks or Laymen for the future, and threatened to raze and burn their Cloyster, if those scandalous Reports continued. He seems not to have been so successful or industrious in his Visitation of another Convent. He had an ill Opinion of it, but believed, upon his Inquiries, that Things were better than he expected. But, after his Departure, he was informed that he had made but a very imperfect Scrutiny, that he had not discovered the Truth, and that almost all the Nuns in the House were Ladies of Pleasure, omnes ferme æbrias divas (8). He was very much concerned at it, tho' he did not believe he had been so deceived in his Informations; and, returning thither, he discovered that a Prior had debauched a Nun, who thereupon had made her Escape. The Abbess confessed her having had a Child, Ejus confessione simplici rixoræ coniugas eam comperimus (9): And then he says, in general, that he had found several Things worthy of Correction, Plurima ibi quæ correctione digna essent invenimus. He met with no less Disorders among the Monks. There was one Convent where they fought with Swords and Staves, and where the Prior was accused of so many foul Things, that it was not thought proper to bring him to a formal Trial. The Management of the Process and Conviction of the Criminal were carried on with all possible Secrecy, and after a gentle Sentence, and some Regulations in writing for the Future, he was, by Word of Mouth, and in the Presence of a few Witnesses, censured for his greatest Vice. He had too great a Regard to the Honour of the Society, to leave any thing in writing upon that Subject (11). Sometimes he ventures to speak out freely, without any Recourse to the Greek Language. 'Et ex matre Domini et ex plerisque aliis perceptor mus Prostitutum illud esse. Deprehendimus rem opinione etiam deterioiorem (12). — And I found that the Convent of our Lady, as well as most others, were direct Brothels. The Thing appeared even worse than I imagined.' On another Occasion, where he was to declare that the Prior of a Monastery had a Bastard, he chose rather to make use of the Greek Word σὺς than the Latin Word filius (13). The Abbot de la Roque commends our Ambrose's Prudence for expressing these grand Disorders in a Language less known than the Latin, to prevent making them so public (14). But the making this Reflexion must defeat Ambrose's Intention; for they, who are acquainted with this Precaution, will be more readily directed, than otherwise they would have been, to these ticklish Places; they need only cast their Eyes upon these Greek Words, to discover, in a Moment, where the Game lies. There are very few, who can read a Latin Book, but will make shift to find out a Word in a Greek Dictionary. The Example this General relates (15) of the Force of Jealousy, is very singular. An old Priest, who for a long time had been in love with an Abbess, seeing himself excluded, and supplanted by his Rival, was so far exasperated, that he became an Informer against her, and exposed several obscene Letters he had sent her. It did not appear by these Letters, that the Abbess had granted him the Favour; however Ambrose retained them, and produced them against her as a convincing Proof. She absolutely denied that she had forfeited her Honour, but confessed the Receipt of the lewd old Man's Letters. To conclude, this Hodeporicon was printed at Florence from a Manuscript, which the Famous Mr Magliabecchi communicated to Father Nicolas Bartholini, Clerk-Regular of the Congregation of the Mother of God. The Copy I make use of does not shew the Year in which it was printed, though it must be either 1680, 1681, or 1682. Mr Wharton, in all probability, had a Copy, whose Title was different from that of mine; for he quotes it thus (16): Hodeporicon, seu Descriptio itineris Eugenii Papæ auctoritate anno 1431 à se per Italiam suscepti, ut corruptos Monachorum & Virginum claustralium mores emendaret. There is nothing like this in mine. I do not know what Grounds the Abbot de la Roque has to believe that there was a former Edition of this Work, and that the Stile of it was fine. It must be confessed, Ambrose wrote very well for a Man of his Profession in those Times; but let us not say, with Mr Varillas, that he translated the Hierarchy, attributed to St Denis, with so much Eloquence and Elegancy, that no Body ever since could come near his Stile (17).

[E] Those, who say he died in the Year 1490, are mistaken.] In the 1st place, if he had lived to the Year 1490, he must have died One hundred and three Years old. Now, if he had attained to so extraordinary an Age, it must certainly have been taken notice of in some part of those many Books, which speak either of him, or those learned Men who lived to be very old. Since therefore no body has mentioned it, we may conclude it to be an Age he never arrived at (18). The Proof that he must have been One hundred and three Years old, is taken from his entering into the Order at fourteen, and having continued in it thirty Years, when, in 1431, he was deputed to the Chapter-General of his Order. This he informs us himself at the beginning of his Hodeporicon. In the 11d place, the Epistle dedicatory to his Letters speaks of him as not then living; and acquaints us, that Cosmo de Medicis had employed a Monk to make a Collection of these Letters: This Monk, having discharged his Commission, dedicated the Work to Cosmo de Medicis. All this supposes some Years to have passed betwixt the Author's Death, and the time of the Dedication of his Letters. Now this must have been before the Year 1464, in which Cosmo died. In the 111d place, it was Poggius Florentinus, according to Vossius (19), who made the General of Camaldoli's Funeral Oration. Now Poggius died in 1459; so that this General is far from having lived till 1490. What Vossius tells us of Poggius being Ambrose's Scholar seems to me a little suspicious; for Poggius must have made a Figure in the World before Ambrose was taken notice of, and was his Senior. He was made Secretary of the Briefs about the Year 1407. He was a Man of Note at the time of holding the Council of Constance, when he gave an Account of John Hus's Punishment in 1416; and since he died in 1459, and in the eightieth Year of his Age, it follows that he was born in 1379. Now Ambrose was a private Monk when the Council of Constance was held, and he was born about the Year 1386 or 1387. Sandius had reason to believe, that Poggius was rather Ambrose's Fellow-Student, when he learned Greek, than his Scholar (20); but he is wrong in refuting Vossius, as to the Funeral Oration, since he builds, tho' with an If, on the false Supposition of Ambrose's living till the Year 1490. I shall remark, by the by, a Fault of Moreri, who says, in a retrograde Order, that Ambrose was at the Councils of Basil, and of Constance. How will he prove this, in regard to the last Head? In the IVth place, Bartholini (21) tells us, that Eugenius IV, having heard of Ambrose's Death, was sensibly touched with it. 'Dum ejus primum inaudita morte subita videris abreptus in lacrymas & aliquandiu quoque ingemiscens, cum ex nomine vocare non cessaret, in has voces identidem erumpens, Ambrose, Fili, quis te mihi eripuit, quis Ecclesie lumen adeo intempestive extinxit? — Being surprized with the News of his Death, he burst into Tears with the suddenness of his Grief, and bewailing him also for some time, continued calling him by his Name, and broke out into this Expostulation, O Ambrose, my Son, who has taken you away from me, who has so unseasonably extinguished the Light of the Church?' This Pope departed this Life in 1447: and, if Ambrose died before him, what do so many Authors mean, who agree in remarking that he lived to a very great Age (22)? And what was Paulus Jovius dreaming of, when he said that Ambrose was admired by Eugenius IV, and Nicolas V (23)? Some will have it that both these Popes had Thoughts of making him Cardinal (24). However it be, they must be mistaken who suppose a strict Friendship betwixt him and Politian (25); for this last was not born 'till the Year 1454.

The Printer had proceeded thus far, when one of my Friends (26), whom I had desired to consult Augustinus Florentinus, informed me, I. That he found there, that our Ambrose died the twenty first of October 1439, at his return from the Council of Florence, to which he had subscribed (27), and that he entered into the Order, at the Age of fourteen Years and twenty two Days, in the Year 1400 (28). II. That Dom Thomas de Minis, a Florentine, who published at Florence, in 1606, a Catalogue of the Saints of the Order of Camaldoli, says, in his forty fifth Page, that Ambrose, the thirty fifth General, died in 1439. I am surprized that Mr Wharton, who had in his Hands Augustinus Florentinus, should make Ambrose flourish in 1440, and suppose him living a long time after. Vossius, who makes him flourish in the Year 1450, did not see clearly into this matter: nor has he justly quoted James de Bergamo, who makes mention of our Ambrose under the Year 1431, and not, as Vossius affirms, under 1449.

[F] His Body is deposited in the Oratory of Camaldoli, without Epitaph or Ornament.] Father Mabillon, out of indignation at such a sight, makes the following Reflexion, in his Voyage to Italy. 'In Oratorio, says he (29), sepultus est sine lapide & titulo magnus ille Ambrosius, Camaldulensium quondam summus Præpositus, tum cœnobitarum tum eremitarum qui sub Petro Delphino discessio- nem à cœnobitiis fecerunt. Subit indignatio, ut cum Plinio juniore loquamur, tanti viri post tot annos reliquias neglectumque cinerem sine titulo, sine nomine jacere, cujus memoria orbem terrarum gloria pervagata est. Sed potior Ambrosii apud Deum gloria est ac memoria. — In the Oratory, lies buried, without Stone or Inscription, the great Ambrosius, formerly General of the Order of Camaldoli, as well of Monks as Hermits, who, under

CAMDEN (WILLIAM), one of the most learned and illustrious Men of his Time, born at London, the second of May, 1551, of a Family not very considerable [A]. At the Age of fifteen he was sent to Oxford, where he studied five Years without taking any Degree [B], and from thence returned to London; where, among other Patrons, he met with Gabriel and Jeffrey Goodman. They were two Brothers; who, being acquainted with Camden's great Parts, took a pleasure in supplying him with the means to improve them. One of them (a), being Dean of Westminster, made him, in the Year 1575, Usher of the School, which Queen Elizabeth had founded in that Church (b). Camden, who had Classical Learning enough to acquit himself worthily of that Employ, compleatly discharged all the Duties of it, and continued, in the mean time, to apply himself to more exalted Studies. His natural Inclination led him principally to a search after the Antiquities of his own Country: and as the Excellency of his Genius, and Profoundness of his Judgment, quickly discovered to him the full Extent of his Design, and all the Assistance requisite for his Success therein; his Thoughts and Studies were entirely bent on preparing Materials for the Work he was meditating. It was a History of the ancient Britons: He proposed to trace to the Bottom their Original, their Manners, and their Laws. To which end it was necessary for him, not only to understand whatever the Romans or the Grecians have left us concerning Great Britain, but also the ancient Language of the Island, both British and Saxon. He was obliged to examine the old Itineraries, search into the Archives, and consult an infinite Number of old Papers. He omitted nothing of all this: his Diligence and Pains were extraordinary, and so likewise was his Success. And as his Reputation had reached even into foreign Parts, all who were Judges, found him particularly capable of executing so vast a Design, and encouraged and assisted him in it, every one according to his Abilities. He resolved to view, himself, the Situation of the Country, and there was not a Corner in all England which he did not carefully inspect. From all these Labours, at the end of ten Years, came out his Britannia, printed at London, in 1586 [C]. This Work answered the Expectation

[A] He was of a Family not very considerable.] His Father was born at Lichfield in Staffordshire, and came to settle in London, where he followed the business of a Painter. He left but little at his Death, so that his Son, who was young, was brought up in the Orphans Hospital. Camden, in the height of his Fortune, was so far from concealing the Obscurity of his Family, that he left by his Will, to the Company of Painters, a Vermilion Cup (1), with this Inscription, Gul. Camdenus Clarencius, filius Samsonis, Picloris Londinensis, dono dedit. It is one of the Cups the Company makes use of at their public Feasts. Camden, by his Mother's side, was related to an ancient (2) Family (3).

[B] He studied at Oxford, without taking any Degree.] I observe this, that I may have an opportunity of informing my Reader, that, in 1588, when his Reputation had raised him above the Title of Master of Arts, which the University of Oxford usually confers on those who have run through a Course of seven Years; he petitioned for that Degree. He was answered that he might have it, provided he would present himself at the next Congregation of the University, according to Custom. He had not then time to attend; but, in 1613, he appeared in the University, in order to assist at the Obsequies of Sir Thomas Bodley, and then went out Master of Arts. It was a great Honour for that famous University, to have a Man of his Years and Reputation ambitious of that Title (4).

Note, There are some Writers who affirm, the University made him an Offer of this Degree, which he then thought unnecessary; and that it is very probable he never accepted it. This is Dr Gibson's Opinion (5), which he founds upon the Authority of Mr Wood.

[C] His Britannia was printed at London in 1586.] The date of this Impression will serve for an Answer to those, who affirm that Camden was commanded by King James to write a Description of England. This Description was printed at London five times one after another, before Queen Elizabeth's Death. It does not where appear, that That Prince was any ways concerned in the Author's Undertaking: He was led on in these Studies by his own Taste or Genius, and employed all his Care and Pains in the execution of his Design, without any appearance, as I said before, that the Court gave him any Commission for it, or promised him any Reward (6). There must therefore be a Mistake in the Passage I am going to cite. I shall set it down somewhat at large, because it contains an Elogy not at all to be suspected. We cannot but remember the just Complaints which Sorbiere's Account has occasioned (7). 'England is a Country the best known of any in the World; for Camden, by Order of King James, wrote a Description of it, in order to which he spent several Years in travelling. He followed the Course of the Rivers, and described on each side whatever he met with. He coursed the Champains, penetrated the Forests, and traversed the Mountains. So that he discovered every thing remarkable, gave the exact Situation of the smallest Castles, and recounted, as he went along, the History, Genealogy, and Alliances of all the considerable Families. His Work makes one of the most curious parts of Blaeu's Atlas (8). Dr Smith observes, that Camden's Britannia makes the fourth part of Janfonius's Atlas, printed at Amsterdam in 1659; but, that it was very much altered: No regard is had to the Author's Method; the Quotations from him are imperfect; many things are here and there ascribed to him, which are the Observations of others; and no care is taken to distinguish what is borrowed from him, and what from other Writers. tion the Learned had conceived of it; and sold so well, that it was reprinted the Year following (c), and besides the German Editions, we may count those of England in the Years 1590, 1594, 1600, and 1607 (d). They, who are acquainted with the Nature of this sort of Writings, need not be informed that every new Edition excelled the former [D]. The great Success of this Book, and the Commendations it drew from all Parts on it's Author, abated nothing of Camden's innate Modesty, nor put any Notions into his Head of quitting the Fatigues of the School, where he had been a long time Usher. If his Friends had taken no greater Care of his Fortune than he himself, the Nation and Age he lived in might to this Day have lain under the Scandal of having neglected to great a Subject (e). But this was prevented; for the Bishop of Salisbury (f) conferred on him, in the Year 1588, the Prebend of Ilfarcombe. Camden enjoyed it all his Life without Residence, or entering into Orders. In 1593, he succeeded Edward Grant, who was Head-Master of Westminster School, and compiled a new Greek Grammar, which appeared in 1597; and has been received not only in that School, but throughout all England. He was removed the same Year from his Mastership, to succeed Richard Liege, who was Clarencieux King at Arms. This Dignity exposed him to the Fury of a Man, who, thinking he himself had deserved it, and not doubting but it would have been conferred on him, took it as an Affront that it was disposed of in Favour of another. To divert his Spleen, and revenge himself for the Wrong he pretended to have received, he attacked Camden's Work, and published (g) some Criticisms upon it, full of Passion and Bitterness [E]. Camden answered him with much Moderation, justified himself very learnedly, and proved his liorumque scriptis interpositis adjectisque ut quid ipse Camdenus, quidve illi scripserint, meritis ambigatur (9). If any one would undertake the reprinting this Work, he might be furnished with many Corrections and Additions from the Author (10). See the Remark [E] towards the end.

[D] — It was reprinted several times — every new Edition excelled the former.] There are some Subjects inexhaustible; one may be always making Additions to them, because there is no end of finding something or other not thought of before. This is the Fate of Dictionaries. There are other Subjects so difficult, so obscure, and embarrassed with so many Circumstances, that all we can do is to avoid being often mistaken in them. In a word, there are a great many Reasons why a Book should grow more perfect from several Impressions. Very often a Piece becomes good at last, which at first was very bad. This is always a Disadvantage to the Author; for it may be objected that he was a little too hasty, and that his first Production was no better than an untimely Birth. This was not Camden's Case. The last Edition of his Britannia is incomparably better than the first; but yet the first was very good. I quote Dr Smith's Words, and I am confident, the learned Reader will not condemn this Remark; it is very proper to point out the manner, in which we ought to judge of some sort of Writings. Now what can be more necessary than to inform the Judgment of the Reader, by setting before him certain Thoughts abstracted and collected out of other Books? This was the Motive, which induced me to insert such sort of Quotations in this Dictionary: which I desire to mention here once for all. This is my Quotation. 'Cum enim opus ejusmodi ex argumentorum, quae in illo tractantur, varietate continui incrementi capax sit, & tam ingenti rerum haecenus incognitarum, quarum origo aut obscura aut incerta, copia & apparatu referciatur, nemo, qui de hisce studiis recte, & prout par est, judicandi facultate pollet, errores, si qui in primis editionibus reperirentur, non ex levitate & inconstantia mentis, non ex praecipiti insulas & nulli fundamento innixas conjecturas venditandi audacia aut inani pruritu, sed ex defectu debita autoritatis aut mentis non semper attentae variisque cogitationibus distractae lassitudine admissos, qui vel vigilantissimo obrepere possint, exprobrare, aut illud omnibus numeris nondum fuisse absolutum mistis querelis mirari debet. In hoc secundi ingenii partu pulchra quidem lineamenta apparere, & nullo vitio distorta compages, quibus novos colores integrumque vigorem inducenda esset maturior aetas. Hoc nempe erat plurimum annorum & cumulatoris experientiae negotium, ut lucubrationes istae, saepe repetitis curis recognitae, limaque accuratiori perpolitae, novis auctariis in justam decoramque molem demum crescerent (11). — For as a Work of this Nature is capable of continual improvement, from the variety of the Subjects it treats of, and is filled with so great a number of Things, hitherto unknown, whose Origin is very uncertain, and difficult to trace, no good Judges of these Studies will upbraid the Author with it's Faults, if there should be any in the first Editions, occasioned not from a levity and inconstancy of Judgment, not from a rash Assurance, or vain itch of publishing absurd and groundless Conjectures, but from a want of good Authorities, and a natural Inattention of the Mind, when wearied, or distracted with various Objects; nor complain and wonder that it should not yet be absolutely complete. This ingenious Work discovered indeed, at it's Birth, beautiful Lineaments, and Parts unexceptionably proportioned; but it was to receive it's full Charms, and compleat Vigour, from maturer Years. For it required a long time, and continued Observations, to revise and new polish with repeated Pains, and still greater Exactness, these Lucubrations, that they might at last, by gradual Additions, reach their just and becoming Stature.' All this Quotation deserves to be considered.

[E] — An angry Man — attacked his Britannia, and published some Criticisms upon it, — full of Passion.] This was Ralph Brook York Herald at Arms. He having spent two Years in examining Camden's Britannia, published a Book in English called A discovery of certaine Errours, published in Print in the much commended Britannia, 1595; Injurious to the Families and Successions of the ancient Nobility of this Realm. He published it without Licence, and without naming either Book-seller or Printer. He was not content to attack Camden in Genealogical Points only, but accused him of Plagiarism, with respect to other Matters, as if he had pillaged the learned Leland's Works. Dr Smith complains that the Author of the English Ecclesiastical History has revived Brook's Accusation. 'Cujus solius autoritate sultus scriptor quidam ex nostratibus, utinam ob mentis solertiam & judicium pariter ac ob ingenium & industriam commendandus, eandem calumniam credule reque penitus inexplorata arripit (12). — Upon whose sole Authority, a certain Writer of our own Nation, whose Accuracy and Judgment I wish were as remarkable as his Wit and Industry, has credulously, and without any farther Examination, made use of the same Calumny.' And he tells us, that Camden's Answer served for an Appendix to the fifth Edition of his Britannia printed in 1600, and dedicated to Queen Elizabeth (13). Our Author at first treated only superficially on Genealogical Points; but, after he was made King at Arms, he studied them thoroughly (14). His Office required it, and by this means he was able, in his Answer, to clear judiciously a thousand Obscurities his Adversary guilty of many gross Errors. When this was done, he thought he could not employ his time better, than in an Enquiry after the ancient Historians of his own Nation: He collected a great many of them, and had them printed in Germany, in 1603. It is time to speak of his Annals of Queen Elizabeth, a Work which contributed as largely to his Reputation, as his Britannia. After Camden had been promoted to the Dignity of King at Arms, in the Year 1597, William Cecil desired him to undertake the History of this Queen, promising him the Assistance of all sorts of Memoirs. Camden undertook it; but Cecil's Death, which happened the Year following, very much abated the Eagerness with which he had, till then, pursued that Work. After the Queen's Death he became more remiss, and, by Degrees, gave it quite over, expecting some other, among so many ingenious Men, who had felt the Bounty of that Princess, would undertake it: But seeing no one enter the Lists to publish the History of so glorious a Reign, he vigorously renewed his first Design, consulted all sorts of good Authorities, and, in 1615, published his Annals of England and Ireland, from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign to the Year 1589. This Work, which was wrote in Latin, met with great Applause; and it must be allowed, that no one could manage the Subject with more Judgment, Gravity, Accuracy, or Clearness of Style. The Continuation of these Annals, which he finished about the Year 1617, did not appear till after his Death (b). He never would consent to the Publication of it in his Life-time; and, to prevent any Accident, he sent a Copy of it to Peter du Puy, at Paris (i). Some have been pleased to say, that many things were both suppressed and added in the first Part, by the Order of King James, in favour of the Queen his Mother [F]. This Report, true or false, encourages Historical Scepticism on that Head. He confessed his Errors as soon as he discovered them, and did not deny his having consulted those Authors, who had treated of Heraldry: but since he spoke of them with respect, what reason could there be to complain? By what I have said it appears, that the Edition in 1600 surpassed the foregoing; and yet even that was very much inferior to the Edition of 1607. Camden here outdid himself, and it was then that he principally merited the Character the World gave him of the British Varro, Strabo, and Pausanias. This last Edition was illustrated with Maps and Cuts (15). There is an Abridgment of this Work, and an English Translation. Reinier Vitellius, of Ziric-zie, is Author of the Abridgment; and Philemon Holland, an English Physician, of the Translation (16). A certain Author undertook to discover a multitude of Errors in Camden's Britannia, but has not hitherto been so good as his Word. 'Illud ditissimum & uberrimum Antiquitatum Britannicarum penu, non minore fide & judicio quam cura & methodo digellum ordinatumque, omnes harum rerum studiosi bonique judices agnoverunt, excepto unico D. Simondio Dewesio, qui nescio quo invidiæ cello percitus, se in Magnæ Britanniciæ, quam molitus est, historia, vix unam in ipsius Camdeni toties celebratâ Britanniciæ paginam suis carere erroribus, ostensurum contendit. Sed hoc decantatum opus historicum nec ipse nec alii post quinquaginta annos hauctenus in lucem produxerunt (17). — All who had a Taste for these Studies, and were good Judges, acknowledge that this rich and plentiful Collection of British Antiquities, was digested and composed with no less Fidelity and Judgment, than Care and Method; excepting only one Sir Simonds D'Ewes, who, from what envious Motive I know not, engaged to shew, in the History of Great Britain he was writing, that there was scarce a single Page in Camden's so much celebrated Britannia without it's Errors.' But this boasted Historical Work, neither he nor any one else, after fifty Years notice, has hitherto been pleased to bring to light.

(b) The whole Work was translated into French by Paul de Belligny, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. It was likewise done into English.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 45, 46, in the Margin are these Words, in Literis ad Jac. Uffer. 28 Sept. datis que extant in Ufferianarum Epistolarum Sylloge, pag. 496. It was therefore this Sir Simonds d'Ewes, who undertook to find so many Faults.

(16) It was done by several Hands.

Since the first Edition of this Dictionary, I have met with a Work in Folio, printed at London in 1695, and entitled Camden's Britannia, newly translated into English: with large Additions and Improvements, published by Edmund Gibson of Queens-College in Oxford. One of the Reasons given for this new English Translation (18) is, that Dr Holland, Author of the first, had added to it several things of his own. This Mixture, of which a great many Readers were not sensible, made several Writers cite Camden to prove what he never had asserted. They took that for the Original, which was nothing but what had been tacked to it by the Translator. Dr Gibson thought therefore, that, in order to prevent the like inconvenience for the future, another Translation ought to be given free from any foreign Additions: By which means, they, who hereafter shall have a Mind to cite Camden, will not run the risk of a false Citation. However, because Holland's Additions are sometimes very good, and the World thought he consulted Camden where he met with any Difficulties, Dr Gibson has preserved and placed them at the bottom of the Text in a smaller Character. There are several other things which extremely add to the Merit of this last Translation. There are Observations added at the end of each County, either to confirm what Camden had advanced, or to give a more particular account of some Places he had described, or a Description of others he had entirely omitted. Every part of the Text, which relates to these Additions, is distinguished by a Letter, which makes it's respective Comment easily found out. Dr Gibson has added a List of those Persons, who supplied him with Materials; which seems very sufficiently to recommend his Remarks, and to shew, that great Pains are taken in England, in the Illustration of the Antiquities of their Country, and in the most exact Topographies. He has presented us likewise with a Life of Camden, which is little more than an Abridgment of that published by Dr Smith. He has occasionally added three English Letters from Camden to Dr James, which are not in Dr Smith's Collection. Note, he observes, that, in three Years time, there were three Editions of Camden's Britannia, published in London.

[F] Some have been pleased to say, that many things were both suppressed and added, in the first Part of his Annals, by the Order of King James, in favour of the Queen his Mother. Lewis du Moulin, Cromwell's Creature, and a violent Independent, affirmed in a Speech at Oxford, that King James's Parasities had villainously corrupted Camden's History, by foisting in several things contrary to the Author's Sentiments. 'Criminantur alii, inter quos Ludovicus Molinæus, in rebus Angliæ turbandis a primis impii belli civilis incendiis occupatissimus, tyrannidis Cromwellianæ strenuus assertor, & post auspiciatissimum R. Caroli II. reditum adversus Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ ritus & disciplinam Scriptor male-dicentissimus, aliam manum accessisse, præter haud dubio mentem Authoris, unde opus fæde commaculatū fuit, hisce corruptelis in Aulæ Regiæ adulatores, ut ille pro solito candore & modestia loquitur, traductis derivatque (19). Dr Smith rejects this as a notorious Defamation, and maintains, that Camden, as an honest Man and faithful Historian, might give an Account of the Scottish Revolution, and the Adventures of the unfortunate Queen Mary, quite quite different from what Buchanan has done; and that therefore both Sincerity and Prudence obliged him to offer whatever tended to the Justification of that Prince. He adds, that it is to be presumed, if Camden submitted his Book to the Censure of the King his Master, it was only that, upon a Perusal of it, he might rectify whatsoever was not exactly conformable to the Truth. 'Neque alia de causa Serenissimi Regis Jacobi aut illius Nobilissimi Viri a Rege deputati, ad quem scripsit ----- censuræ Annalium supplementum, ut par est credere, subjecti, quam ut veritas magis magisque erueretur, & si quicquam ipsi minus intento aut non probe edocto subrepsisset, regis curis limitum emendaretur (20).' It is certain Lewis du Moulin was not the first, who said that Camden's Book had been patched; for in the Year 1620 there was a Scotch Gentleman, whose Father had a great Share in the Troubles of Scotland, who complained of Camden's Annals on that very account. 'Quinquennio post emissam in dii luminis auram Historiam D. Metallanus de patris sui Baronis Lidingtoniæ, qui turbatissimis Scotiæ rebus, R. R. Maria & Jacobo regnantibus, multum momenti & ponderis auctoritate sua & consiliis addiderat, fama sollicitus, Camdeno molestiam facessivit, ac si non motu proprio & ex se, sed ex aliorum invidia & in parentem malignitate clausulis insinuitis eam exagitant (21).'

AN Enquiry into to what is said of Camden, in relation to Thuanus.

Dr Smith (22) complains of a modern Author, who accuses Camden for having blown hot and cold; I mean, for having supplied Thuanus with Memoirs quite different from what he afterward published in his Annals. This modern Author pretends, that Thuanus was offended at it, and reproached Camden with some sort of Indignation for this Inconstancy. This regards principally the Troubles of Scotland; and it is only in this Article that Buchanan's Friends and Queen Mary's Enemies maintain, that Camden's Annals were altered. Dr Smith observes, in the first place, that this malicious Adversary of Camden does not offer any Reason, which may afford the least shadow of Truth to his Accusation; and then takes notice, that Mr Lisle having settled a Commerce of Friendship and Correspondence between Thuanus and Camden in 1606 (23), Camden sincerely answered Thuanus's Request. Thuanus desired Camden's Opinion of his History: Camden replied, that he found, among the Affairs relating to Scotland, several Relations, which had no Foundation at all, or a very weak one; and which he had borrowed from a Writer, who had employed all his Wit and Malice to blacken Queen Mary's Reputation. 'Pro amore veritatis & amicitiae jure, id quoque rogatus, monet quendam rerum Scoticarum narrationes aut nullo aut debili profusus fundamento niti, Buchananum que, a quo illas acceperat, omnes tum ingenii tum malitiæ nervos contendisse, ut Mariæ Reginæ famam spurcissimis convitiis læderet (24).' Dr Smith adds, I. That Thuanus expressed a great deal of Sorrow for having incurred King James's Censure and Displeasure, in depending too much upon Buchanan's Authority. II. That Camden, by order of the King his Master, drew up a List of the Errors in Thuanus's History, in relation to the Troubles of Scotland (25), and sent it to that great Historian. III. That if Thuanus had received this Advice time enough, he had been less partial against Queen Mary, and for the Earl of Murray, and would not have had recourse to those vain Excuses, to which he was afterwards driven. IV. That they, who consider these things rightly, will be convinced that Camden never sent Thuanus an Account of Things, different from what he afterwards published in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth. 'Hæc serio pensitanti non aliter Camden ad Thuanum, aut ab illis diversis quæ post in Annalibus posuit, olim scripsisse, quicquid in contrarium fingitur, vero verius esse videbitur (26).'

It must be owned, that these Considerations are of some force; for, I. Thuanus's Letter, written to Camden in February 1605, proves they were not then known to one another. 'Vix speraveram, ut rogatus à me faceres quod sola D. Insulani amicitissimi viri commendatione fecisti. Quid enim sum, ut seria tua studia tantisper remorer? Camdenum in meis legendis iacturam bonarum horarum fecisse? tanto hominem sibi ignotum beneficio devinxisse (27)? — I could not hope to obtain that Favour on my own asking it, which you have done me at the sole Instance of my particular Friend Mr Lisle. For what Pretensions have I to interrupt your serious Studies, and expect your throwing away your useful Hours in examining my Writings, and in so high a manner obliging one intirely unknown to you? Camden had read over Thuanus's History at Mr Lisle's Request: Thuanus, admiring that Camden should take so much pains with an Author unknown to him, and who had not himself requested it, was so much the more thankful to him. One may therefore be assured, that this was the first time he writ to him. Now at this very time, that part of his History, which treats of the Troubles of Scotland was already in the Press (28), and could not therefore be composed on Memoirs from Camden. II. He asks his Advice in the same Letter: He knew that King James was angry with Buchanan; he did not know whether Buchanan had been too sharp (29); he was unwilling to offend the English Court, but could not resolve with himself to suppress any Matters of Fact: and therefore prayed Camden to assist him with his Advice in so nice a Conjunction. He did not desire any Memoirs from him (30), but only one word of Advice; 'Scribe, & amico consilii inopituum ne denega. Innuere Verbo potes, nec opus est ut Distinctius scribas (31). — Write, and resolve not your Advice to your Friend who wants it. One Word will be sufficient, nor need you explain yourself more fully' III. We do not know the Particulars of Camden's Answer; but we know he advised him to observe a great deal of Moderation: for when, about the end of July 1606, Thuanus sent him the second Volume of his History, he tells Camden he was afraid he had not observed the Moderation he had advised (32); and thereupon draws up a specious Apology for the Earl of Murray, with an intent to shelter himself under it. IV. The Event shews, that his Fears were but too well grounded. King James was extremely angry with him, and commanded Camden to send him a Catalogue of his Errors concerning the Troubles of Scotland. V. It appears, by a Letter from Thuanus, the thirteenth of April 1608, that Camden had not as yet furnished him with any Memoirs, except what he had sent him concerning Ireland: for Thuanus tells him, he should have been glad to have received the Informations, as to England and Scotland; and in that Case doubts not but he should have taken such measures, as would have given content to the English Court. What can one desire more decisive against those, who have given out, that Camden communicated to Thuanus some Memoirs, which he did not think fit afterwards to insert in his own Annals? I am going to shew, that Thuanus laments his being obliged to follow Buchanan for want of Camden's Assistance. 'In Hibernicis jam multum profeci. --- Utinam quæ vestra sunt, & ad universam Britanniam spectant, pari compendio, & simplicitate scripsisses. Sic enim factum esset, ut temperamentum, quod in Scoticis a me quidam fortasse sunt desideraturi, tuis vestigiis insitens, facilius secutus essem, & in vestratum Magnatum offensionem, quam vitatam cupiebam, non incurrissem. Sed cum neminem haberem præter Buchananum, necesse mihi omnino fuit seriem illius tragicæ narrationis, per alios eoque Religioni Protestantium minime addictos antea adprobata, petere: cæterum omni insecutione omissa (33). — I have made great Progress in the Affairs of Ireland. --- I wish you would have communicated those relating to your own Country, and to Britain in general, with the same Bre- vity and Plainness. By this means, having your Steps to follow, I could more easily have observed that Moderation, which some perhaps will find a want of in the Scottish Affairs, and avoided falling under the Displeasure of your Court, which was very much my Desire. But as I had none but Buchanan, I was obliged to take his Account of that Tragical Transaction, which had been before approved by others, and those far from being inclined to Protestantism

'Protestantism; however I omitted all manner of 'Scurrilities.' VI. A Letter (34) written by Thuanus to Camden, in 1613, shews, indeed, that he had received some Memoirs of England, in which Cam- den had a good Part; but it was Mr Cotton who sent them to him by King James's Order. From whence we may conclude, that these Memoirs were conformable to those Camden followed in his Annals. What Cause therefore could there be for the Complaints which Thuanus is said to have made against him?
VII. In short, among all the Letters written to Cam- den, and published by Dr Smith, there is not one, either from Thuanus, du Puy, or any other, which makes mention of these Reproaches. See the Remark [H].

Dr Gibson has strongly opposed the Report which has been spread of these pretended Complaints of the French Historian. He narrowly examines the Circumstances, and draws from them very powerful Arguments. This is the Substance of his Dispute.
Thuanus, writing to Camden when he sent him the second Volume of his History, at first excused himself, and told him, he was afraid he had not exactly followed his Advice in his Account of the Occurrences in Scotland; and says, towards the end of that Letter, that he related those things as he had received them from some Scotchmen, who had been eyewitnesses, in whose Balance he had weighed Buchan- an's Writings. Is not this a Demonstration, either that he had received no Memoirs from Camden, or that he had made no use of those he had received? Add to this, that if he was fallen into an Error, and had offended the King of Great Britain, in following Camden's Informations; he might in justice have expected, that Camden would have made him some Apology. Camden would have been obliged, in Justice and Honour, to excuse himself to Thuanus, and to assure him he was then in an Error, but that his Conversation with the King, and a Perusal of the Public Acts, had undeceived him. This is, without doubt, what Camden ought to have done in some part of his Critical Remarks upon Thuanus's History;
but this is what he has not done: He contents himself with criticizing upon it; He uses some Tartness in his Censures, and very much blames Thuanus for having followed Buchanan more than he ought. Is it to be imagined, that Thuanus, provoked at this rate, would not have expressed his Repentment, and have replied to his Critic, If I am deceived, I may thank you for it: He ought, from that very time, to have vented those Reproaches against him, which they pretend he never expressed till he had read the first Tome of his Annals of Queen Elizabeth (35).
There are a thousand Traditions of this Nature, which prevail whole Ages in a Kingdoms, without any other Foundation than the Fancies of a prejudiced, distrustful, and artful Party. If you diligently examine them, and take the Pains to look for Proofs to the contrary, they will vanish away.

[G] ----- and this Story ----- encourages historical Pyrrhonism, in relation to the Adventures of Mary Stuart.] They who espouse the Scotch, produce Buchanan; and they who stand up for Queen Mary, cite Camden. In this Contest, the Presumptions will be against Buchanan: I. A rambling vagabond Life like his, and so many Verses, composed by him, both satirical and lascivious, can prepos-sess no Man in his Favour, but will at least postpone him to Camden, whose Wisdom, Virtue, and Integrity, was always without Reproach. II. Besides, Cam- den had no personal Interest in the Justification of Mary, as Buchanan had in her Defamation. Buchan- an was long before engaged in the Faction which dethroned and banished her: He was concerned therefore in a Scene, of all others, the most execrable, if this Queen was not most criminal: and nothing could excuse it, but making her appear such. I have considered this elsewhere (36). Dr Smith has not forgot it: 'Buchananum à quo illas acceperat, omnes tum ingenii & malitiæ nervos contendisse, ut Mariæ Reginæ famam spurcissimis convitiis læderet: qui non aliter sperare poterat, se perfidiam & flagitiosa rebellium subditorum, qui vindicandæ religionis & legum Scotiæ violatarum, specie & prætextu arma sumpissent, facinora posse tueri (37).

'taken, exerted his whole Wit and Malice, to
'blacken Queen Mary's Memory with the most infa'mous Calumnies; having no other way to vindicate
'the traitorous and abominable Practices of her re-
'bellious Subjects, who took up Arms under the Pre-
'tence of her having violated the Religion and Laws
'of Scotland.' III. Buchanan's Patron was Head of the Party which dethroned Queen Mary: on the contrary, Camden lay under a thousand Obligations to Queen Elizabeth. So that Buchanan's Charge against Queen Mary, is a Manifesto in behalf of his *Mæcenæ*s; but Camden's Concessions, in her Favour, are so many Blemishes upon Queen Elizabeth's Memory. IV. In short, Buchanan was an Enemy to the Catholics, and so was Camden. From this Conformity in Religion arises a great difference in their Authorities: Buchanan's is weakened by it, and Cam- den's corroborated. The Catholic Writers, Mary's most extravagant Panegyrists, have not failed observing to their Adversaries, that they justify her not, from the Writings of some Monk, or good Catholic,
but from the Testimony of an Heretic, Historiographer to Queen Elizabeth, his Benefactor.

If there were nothing to oppose in answer to this,
they who are determined by the greatest Probabilities would in one moment give up their historical Pyrrhonism: but it may be objected, that Camden writ under a Prince, who, as Queen Mary's Son, must rather wish to have Queen Elizabeth's Reign black-ned, than that of his own Mother; and that, in such a Case, it will be no wonder, if this Annalist should in some respects sacrifice the Honour of the late Queen, to the filial Affection of the reigning Prince.
Besides, though Camden was an Enemy to the Catholics, he was not less so to the Scotch Puritans. No one is ignorant at what rate the Episcopalians at this Day treat Buchanan's Maxims, and those of his Faction. 'Hinc, viz. from what was acted against 'Queen Mary in Scotland, ista impia dogmata, om-
'ne jus regnandi à populo, Reges in ordinem cogen-
'doi, si contra leges deliquerint, licere populo & in-'ferioribus Magistratibus vi & armis religionem &
'republicam, invitis qui summo imperio potiuntur
'reformare, & ejusmodi reliqua quæ ipsam religio-
'nem tollunt, certamque humano generi perniciem
'inferunt: hinc in rerum Scoticarum Historia, &
'potissimum in isto infami libello, qui Detestatio in-
'scribitur, calumniæ in R. Mariam enatæ. (38) —

Hence, those impious Doctrines, That all Right of Dominion is derived from the People; that Kings acting against the Laws are to be controuled; that it is lawful for the People and inferior Magistrates, to reform the Constitution, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, against the Will of the Sovereign; And such like others, which are destructive of all Religion, and of the very Being of Mankind. Hence arise those Calumnies against Queen Mary, in the Scotish History, and especially in that infamous Libel, intitled, the Discovery. This is what may be urged to weaken Camden's Authority, and what has been actually urged. It is reported, that Camden's Work was curtailed by King James's Order, and that the Blanks which arose from this Retrenchment made room for other Scraps more conformable to the Humour of that Prince. This Supposition destroys all the Advantages the Catholics pretend to draw from the Annals of Queen Elizabeth. But is this Supposition true? I cannot tell. Is it certain? If it were, Dr Smith, a Minister of the Church of England, would never dare to deny it. Is it a ground for Scepticism? Undoubtedly; since even in London some affirm, and others deny it. One thing we must observe renders it probable, which is, that Camden sent a Copy of his second Volume to Paris. Is not this a Sign he was afraid they would alter his Manuscript? And is not this Fear a Proof of what he had already experienced? If it is not a sufficient Proof, it is at least a Foundation for Contention and Dispute.

[H] His sending the second Part to du Puy, gives room for Suspicion.] This is the utmost that can reasonably be said, since there were many other Reasons which might induce him to it. Indeed Dr Smith mentions two or three, without so much as dreaming of that which others give for the only one; I mean, that he has not given

ting his Pen to the Service of the learned World, would also endow it with his Fortunes, by founding an Historical Lecturer in the University of Oxford. He fixed this new Foundation in 1622, and named Degory Wear for the first Professor. He died the ninth of November, 1623, at his Country-House (k), where he had spent all the Time he could be excused from London, ever since 1609. He gave Orders, in his Will, that he should be buried where he died; but his Executors did not follow his Direction in this Particular, for they buried him with great Pomp in Westminster Abbey. The University of Oxford paid him extraordinary Honours, which they still continue. Let us conclude with observing, that he was no less eminent for his Virtues, than for his Learning. He was steady in his Religion (l), and so modest, that he refused the Honour of Knighthood, he was sincere, steady, affable, and friendly: He hated all Reflexions either of the Tongue or Pen: He neither envied his Neighbour, nor was in the least revengful.

the least hint that the Experience of what had passed, made Camden believe, the King would order the second Part of his Annals to be corrected. I shall give Dr Smith's Words and Citations. 'Cum vero molestiam, invidiam, obreftationem, & odium à quibusdam malevolis, fato cum cæteris Historiarum Scriptoribus qui veritati litantur communi, inde sibi quoque ex vitio & malignitate sui sæculi creari offenderet, mentem contra alterius tomi, dum viveret, editionem nullis machinamentis expugnandam obfirmavit. Ut Posteritati tamen, quæ absque affectu solet judicare, integer servaretur, nec incendio, aut quocunque tristi casu deletus, aut malignorum hominum invidia suppressus intercederet, Apographum fidelissime exscriptum (Archetypo, quod in Bibliotheca Cottoniana conservatur, apud se recto) tanquam sacrum depositum Petri Puteani curæ & fidei concedidit, & eo quidam libentius, magni Thuanus exemplum sibi ob oculos ponens, cuius Historiarum reliqua pars ante mortem inedita, cum eam publicæ luci donare Curatoribus testamenti non liceret (39), forsitan perisset, nisi mens periculi præfaga exemplari à apud virum integerrimum nobilissimumque Georgium Michaellem Lingelshemum relicto, istud damnum prudentissime anteverisset (40). - - - But finding that, from the Corruption and Iniquity of the Times, be also, by a Fate common to other Writers of History, who adhere to Truth, had procured to himself a great deal of Trouble, Envy, Hatred, and Malice, he made a firm Resolution against the Publication of the other Volume, which no Contrivances should ever shake. And yet, that it might be preserved intire to Posterity, which is used to judge impartially, and should neither perish by Fire, or other unfortunate Accident, nor be suppressed by the Envy of malicious Men, he committed to the Care and Fidelity of Peter du Puy, as a sacred Deposit, an exact Copy (the Original being retained in his own Hands to be kept in the Cottonian Library), and this the rather, as he had the Example of Thuanus before his Eyes, the remaining Part of whose History, not published in his Life-time, as his Executors were not allowed to print it, would probably have perished, had he not, by a sort of Foresight of the Danger, left a Copy with that most faithful Nobleman, George Michael Lingelshem, and so prudently prevented the Loss.' It is also true, that the Annalist might fear least the Continuation of his Annals should be altered, though he had met with nothing like it, in respect to his first Volume; for a Book, after the Author's Death, is subject to more Accidents than during his Life. Now Camden was resolved not to have the remaining Part of his Annals printed in his Life-time. I add, that he had been alarmed at the Risque Thuanus's History had ran, and that he was exhorted by this Example to imitate the President's Precaution. This is what Mr de Peirese wrote to him in 1620. 'If Thuanus's History had been only found in his Study after his Death, it had been in great danger of being suppressed; for his Executors, Guardians to his Children, out of some private Interest, had a mind to burn it; but Mr Lingelshem, into whose Care Thuanus had committed a Copy, saved it. If Grotius had put the same Confidence in me six Months before his Misfortune, this Kingdom would have had a Copy of his History, which would no longer be at the Mercy of his Enemies, or Enviars. In the Name of God, take care of your own, and if you make a Difficulty of printing it in your Life-time, let us have more than one Copy, and let them not all be on your side the Water (41). It is very likely Camden did not so much apprehend a Retrenchment, or Addition of some Lines, as a Suppression of the whole, like to that Thuanus's would have suffered, if it had not been seasonably prevented. However it be, I shall mention a Controversy which made a Noise in 1687. The following Words were the Foundation of it. 'Camden writ this History with so much Judgment, and so little Partiality, that he won the Love and Esteem of Thuanus, who, after Camden's Death, printed the second Volume of his History, from a Manuscript Copy which had been sent to him by the Author (42). Which was thus answered by Mr Varillas. 'It is a Mistake to say Thuanus printed the second Part of Camden's History after his Death; for Camden, according to the Character given of him, was too discreet to give a President of a Sovereign Court the Trouble of publishing his Book. I have often heard the younger Mr du Puy say, that it was to him Camden applied for this Purpose, and that he himself had accordingly performed it. Besides, had Thuanus printed it, this would have been no Argument for the Impartiality of Camden's History, but rather the greatest Proof that could have been alledged to the contrary, because the whole World knows Thuanus has transcribed all his Accounts of the English and Scotch Affairs, to 1570, from Buchanan, who is allowed to be the most partial of all our modern Authors. The late Mr le Clerc, of St Martin's, has said several times, in my Presence, that going in the Holidays of the Year 1620, to wait on King James at Whitehall, with Thuanus's eldest Son, his Majesty reproached him so bitterly, for his Father's false Account relating to Mary Stuart, King James's Mother, that he fell sick upon it, and so continued for three Months (43). To which it was thus replied: 'I am obliged here to give a more particular Account of Camden's Manuscript than I at first thought necessary. Thuanus, when first he designed a General History, engaged a Correspondence throughout Europe, with those whom he thought capable of giving him the Informations he wanted. He held a very strict one with Camden; and when this Author's first Volume appeared abroad, Thuanus reproached him in a Letter, that his History did not agree with the Accounts he had sent him, particularly in that which concerned the Queen of Scotland. Upon this Camden told him the Truth, which was, that King James would needs peruse his History himself, and afterwards delivered it into my Lord Northampton's Hands, Brother to the Duke of Norfolk, who was beheaded on that Queen's Account, by which means several Things in his Book were expunged, and a great many others altered. This troubled Camden so extremely, that, for fear the second Volume should run the same Hazzard, he sent it into France to Thuanus, that it might be faithfully printed after his Death. This is a thing very well known in England; and the Care he took to commit the second Part into a Stranger's Hand beyond

It is therefore no wonder he had so many illustrious Friends both at Home and Abroad. He was so much addicted to his Studies, that he never travelled abroad, nor was he ever married (m) [L]. Several Letters, which he had either written or received, were published at London, in 1691, by Dr Smith, together with a Piece of his own, very curious and well penned, I mean Camden's Life. There are a great many remarkable Things in it; among which the Resentment of a certain Gentleman, on account of a Female Relation of his being dishonourably mentioned in the Writings of this learned Author [K], is none of the least. Dr Smith tells us likewise, that Camden did not always set his Name to the Books he published [L], and that the Loss of part of the Memoirs, he made use of in compiling his Annals [M], was a very sensible one to the Curious. They wrong him, I think

‘ beyond Sea, is a Proof of the Cause I have as- signed. I do not indeed believe that the President went to the Bookfeller's to make a Bargain for the Manuscript, or to correct the Press himself. If a Man of Mr du Puy's Quality and Learning took care of the Impression, Thuanus did nothing beneath his Dignity, in being the Trustee of so excellent a Piece, and he fully discharged his Trust, in committing it to his Cousin's Care. It is true, King James reproached Thuanus's Son, that his Father had copied Buchanan's Invectives against Queen Mary: but he must have been very tender hearted, if he lay sick upon it three Months after (44).’ The first of these three Passages is not

rightly criticized; and these two Errors seem justly chargeable upon the Critic, by reason of his Silence: The first is, That the Edition of Camden's Annals should gain him Thuanus's Friendship: The second, That Thuanus should survive him. I have shewn, in the Remark [F], that the Friendship and Correspondence between these two great Historians commenced in 1605, ten Years before the Annals of Queen Elizabeth came abroad. It is most certain Thuanus died May 17, 1617, above six Years before Camden. What this Critic would have said to the third Passage, in case of a Rejoinder, I cannot tell; but this I am sure of, that he would not have produced the true Proofs, which shew that Thuanus was neither concerned in the Edition of Camden's second Volume, nor intrusted with the Manuscript. The best Proofs of this do not occur in Peter du Puy's Life (45), but in Camden's Letters. The One hundred forty seventh was sent him by du Puy, a few Days after Thuanus's Death (46). At that time Peter du Puy had only heard, that the History of Queen Elizabeth's Reign was finished: He told the Author the World expected the second Part every Day; and writ to him the same thing some Months after (47). We have seen, above, what Mr de Peirsec writ to him, in 1620. Peter du Puy writ to him in November, the same Year. He had not then received the Manuscript, but expected it. ‘ Cum de Historia tua agis, & de me depositario cogitas, non male certe cogitas, fidelem enim & vere amicam hac in re experieris: tantum effice, ut tuto ad me perferatur (48).’ — Since you mention your History, and think of me for a Trustee, it is certainly no ill Thought, for you shall find me a faithful Friend in this Affair: do but take care that it be safely brought to me. I am of Opinion he sent it into Holland after the Author's Death: It was printed at Leyden in 1625.

[I] His Attachment to his Studies prevented his going to visit foreign Countries, and his engaging in Matrimony.] With regard to this last Point, these are Dr Smith's Words: ‘ Ut à literis nequam avocaretur, Ortelii, Josephi Scaligeri, Nicolai Fabri, aliorumque, quorum fama melius scriptis ex fecundissimo cerebro prognatis quam longa nepotum serie in omne ævum propagabitur, exempla æmulatus, opulentis matrimoniis, quæ multa studiorum impedimenta allatura prævidisset, vitam prætulit cœlibem, sancti propositi ulque & usque retinentissimus (49).’ — That he might not be interrupted in his Studies, he followed the Examples of Ortelius, Joseph Scaliger, Nicolas Faber, and others, whose Names are better transmitted to latest Posterity, in their Writings, the learned Offspring of a fruitful Brain, than in a long Succession of Heirs, he preferred a single Life to the most wealthy State of Marriage, and was constant in his Resolution to the last. As to his Travels, the Author of his Life observes, that Claudius Joubert had forgot himself, when he writ to Camden from Dijon, in 1612 (50), telling him that he remembered, with a deal of Satisfaction, the Time they had spent formerly together at Padua. ‘ Licet per negotiosam vitam patrio solo adfixus, ne pedem quidem unquam extra Angliam movisset: quod adnotari maxime oportuit, ne quispiam D. Jobertis, ex lapsu memoriæ alium pro alio substituentis, literis deceptus, illum olim Patavii studuisse crederet (51).’ A great many brag of a Familiarity in the University with such or such an one, who is grown into Reputation for his Writings; they brag of it, though the thing may be false (52); but sure scarce any one ever writ so to the Persons themselves, as Joubert did to Camden.

[K] We find --- in the Life of Camden, the Resentment of a certain Gentleman, on account of a Female Relation of his being dishonourably mentioned in the Writings of this Historian.] Camden mentions a young Lady, without naming her, who had been so complaisant to a certain Gentleman, as to grant him the last Favour; which was followed with those unhappy Consequences, which furnish both the Court and City with more Mirth than Scandal. The Gentleman became famous for his Valour and Learning, and did the Lady Justice by marrying her. One of her Relations pretended Camden had affronted his Family, and was so transported with Anger against our Historian, that he broke off the Nose of his Statue placed on his Tomb in Westminster Abbey (53). So dangerous a thing is it for Historians to speak Truth, and not flatter; which is the Reason there are so few Histories, where the Authors have dared to speak freely, either of the Living, or of those who have left any Children in Power behind them. Camden, for being a faithful unbiassed Writer, provoked so many Enemies against him, that this was the Reason why he would not have the second Part of his Annals printed in his Life-time; at least, he wished, that, if the King should lay his Commands on him to the contrary, no one should be suffered to translate them into English. He thought he should meet fewer candid Readers among the Vulgar than among the Learned. ‘ Crebra experientia didicerat, studium veritatis erudendæ in Annalibus ipsi odium & obtestationem peperisse; ideò de parte altera in lucem publicam edenda, quod supra monui, non sollicitus, vel potius ne ederetur, nisi post cineres conditos, maximè sollicitus, totum id Regiæ Majestatis arbitrio commisit, obnixè deprecans, ne, si ita statuisset Rex optimus, in vernaculum sermonem opus istud Historicum ipso vivente verteretur, satis gnarus, indoctos è vulgo Lectores iniquissimis censuris in Historiarum Scriptores, ut ut veritati ex integro litaverint, dum vita adhuc superest, pro fatuitate & malitiâ sua ferri fore lere (54).’

[L] He did not always set his Name to the Books he published.] He put only these two Letters M. N. to an English Book published in 1604, under the Title of Remains concerning Britain, &c. (55). He printed, in 1600, a Collection of the Inscriptions and Epitaphs in Westminster Abbey, &c. without his Name to it; but his Latin Translation of Father Garnet's Tryal came out under his Name, in 1607.

[M] Part of the Memoirs he made use of in composing his Annals were lost.] Jeffrey Goodman, Son and Nephew to those two, by whom Camden was so much obliged, and who was afterwards made made Bishop of Glocester, desired Camden to bequeath to him all his Papers of that sort, and writ to him upon that Subject. Camden answered him, that he would have left them to him with all his Heart, but that he had a long time since promised them to Richard Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury. After this Archbishop's Death, the Right of these Papers devolved upon George Abbot, his Successor, who, as they say, removed them to a Chamber in Lambeth Palace. It is not known where they are now: These were not the Memoirs that related to the Civil Affairs, for they are in the Cotton Library, but those touching the Ecclesiastical Matters. Dr Smith supposes they were lost when Archbishop Laud was imprisoned. For being, says he, accused of several pretended Crimes, William Prinn, a Man burned in the Hand for his seditious Libels, secured all that Prelate's Papers, with an Intent to see if any thing could be found in them to strengthen the Indictment they designed against him, or serve in it's Justification. After that Thomas Scott, one of the Demagogues of the Rebellion, and Hugh Peters, who were both executed for the Death of King Charles I. plundered Laud's Library. * Postea Thomas Scottus è Demagogis * Parlamentariis, lingua & manu promptus audax, & Hugo Petri infamis & impurus homuncio, * quorum uterque ob regicidium meritisimas suspensiones poenas vindicte iustitia post duodecennium lue-

They found a great many Papers in that Chamber where Camden's should have been; but the latter were not to be found, nor any Account of them to be met with (57).

[N] They wrong him, who imagine, from a Passage in Casaubon, that Camden only turned into Latin the Annals of Queen Elizabeth.] This Passage (58) is in one of Casaubon's Letters to Touanus. It is the Two hundred and ninety fourth, and these are his Words. * Scripsi aliquoties ad te Cottonium * ab urbe abesse, in contexenda historia occupatum. * Nuper cum mihi Ser. Rex indicasset ipsum esse * in urbe, memor mandatorum tuorum adi: respondit se totum in eo esse ut cœptam historiam absolvat quam ille Anglico Sermone composuit, * Cambdenus Latinam fecit. --- I wrote to you * more than once that Cotton was gone out of Town, * and was very busy in writing History. Being since * informed by the King that he was come to Town, * I waited on him, in obedience to your Commands, * and was assured by him that he was wisely taken * up in finishing the History he had begun, which * he composed in English, and Camden turned into * Latin.

(58) Of this Mr Hill, a learned Minister of the English Church at Rotterdam, gave me Intimation.

CAMERON (JOHN) one of the greatest Divines among the Protestants of France in the XVIIth Century. He was born at Glasgow in Scotland, where he taught Greek, after he had finished his Humanity Studies, and his Course in Philosophy. After having spent a Year in this Employment, he had a Mind to travel into foreign Parts, and went to Bordeaux in 1600, being then a little more than twenty Years of Age. The Ministers of the Place (a) were so charmed with his Parts, his Learning, and Behaviour, that they made him Master of the Greek and Latin Languages, in a College founded at Bergerac. It was justly to be admired, that one of his Age should speak Greek extempore, and with the same Purity that others spoke Latin. The Duke of Bouillon removed him from Bergerac, to make him Professor of Philosophy at Sedan. Cameron, having continued two Years in this Office, took his leave of the Duke, and went to Paris, and from Paris to Bordeaux, where he arrived towards the end of the Year 1604. The Church there resolved to maintain him four Years, in what Place soever he would chuse to study Divinity, and he engaged to serve in the Ministry of that Church, after that Time should be expired. During these four Years, he was Tutor to the Chancellor of Navarre's Sons (b), the first Year at their Father's House at Paris, the two following at Geneva, and the last at Heidelberg. The Church of Bordeaux re-called him in the Year 1608, to supply the Place of a Minister they had lost (c). He executed this Charge for ten Years, with so great Reputation, that the Academy of Saumur thought him worthy of the Divinity Chair, which the Departure of Gomar had left vacant. He accepted of it, and discharged all the Duties of it with admirable Success, till the Academy was in a manner totally dispersed in the Year 1621, by the Disturbances in Religion [A]. He removed himself, with all his Family, into England, and obtained the Liberty of teaching Divinity in his own House at London: But this lasted not long; for King James made him Head of a College, and

(a) There were two of them, one named Renaud, a Frenchman, the other Prime-rose, a Scotchman.

(c) Viz. the Sieur Renaud.

[A] He accepted the Divinity Chair at Saumur, and discharged the Duties of it, till the Academy was — dispersed by the Disturbances in Religion.] He commenced his Lectures June the thirteenth, 1618 (1), but was not inaugurated till two Months after (2). The Synod of Poitou formed some Opposition, under a Pretence that Cameron was of Piscator's Sentiment, in regard to the Imputation of the Justice of JESUS CHRIST. This Opposition was declared null by the National Synod of Alex, in the Year 1620. Observe what follows. When the Government of Saumur was taken from Du Plestis in 1621 (3), Cameron retired to Paris, and was carried to L'Isle near Orleans, where he conferred with Tilenus, who had declared for the Arminians. The Acts of this Conference were immediately printed at Leyden, and received with incredible Applause. Cameron represented to the National Synod of Charenton, in 1623, that he was without Employment, and unable to provide for his Family, since the King would not consent, for the present, that he should resume the Charge either of Minister or Professor. Upon this they appointed him the sum of One thousand Livres (4). Some time after the King gave him leave to officiate as before. Blondel gives these Accounts, but his vast Memory was not here so very exact. Cameron, after he had left Saumur, in 1621, went indeed to Paris, but he made no stay there, but presently retired to London; and it was not from Paris he was brought to confer with Tilenus at L'Isle; nor was this Conference after the Dispersion of the Academy of Saumur. This is the Fact. Cameron being informed, that Daniel Tilenus desired to confer with him about Grace and Free-will, appointed a Day and Place of Conference, and, according to this Appointment, he went from Saumur to Orleans the eighteenth of April 1620. Tilenus came not till five Days after: The Disputation was held at L'Isle, a Country-House of Mr Grosset's near Orleans, and continued from the twenty fourth to the twenty eighth of April (5). The Account of it, which we find among Cameron's Works, is called Amica collatio de gratia & voluntatis humanæ concursu in vocatione, & quibusdam and Divinity Professor, in Glasgow [B]. This Promotion did not agree with Cameron, nor did he hold it above a Year; he had a Desire to see France again, and therefore returned with his Family to Saumur, where he read private Lectures; for the Court had forbidden him to teach in public. Having thus spent one Year at Saumur, he went from thence to Montaubon towards the End of the Year 1624. He was called thither to be made Divinity Professor. He did not stay there long: He could not side with the prevailing Party; but was continually involved in Troubles, which ended with his Life in 1625 [C]. He was about Forty six Years of Age, and had been twice married. The Churches took care of his Family [D]. He was a Man of great Wit and Judgment, of an excellent Memory,

Et quibusdam annexis, instituta inter Cl. V. Danielum Tilenum, & Johannem Cameronem. It was printed at Leyden in the Year 1621, without the Approbation of the Faculty of Divinity, who, on the contrary, disapproved several Things in it (6).

[B] King James made him Head of a College — at Glasgow.] They say Cameron was well received by the Bishop of Ely, and the other Bishops at Court, because, in expounding the famous Passages Thou art Peter, and tell it to the Church, he approved of the Hierarchy. For this reason they recommended him to King James, who, by the Advice of the Bishop of Ely, sent him into Scotland, and conferred on him Trecholegius's Employment, he being a Man ill approved by the Prelates. They were glad therefore to get him from Glasgow, where he taught Divinity, and to give that place, together with the Mastership of the College, to Cameron (7). By this means Cameron became obnoxious to the Puritans; so that, finding himself a Stranger in his own Country, he soon thought of returning into France. The Author I had this from quotes a Scotchman, who, in a Book published in 1637, against Episcopal Ceremonies, censures, and refutes Cameron more than once. The same Author observes, that King James, as liberal as he was, gave Cameron nothing but fine Words, which was the Reason he boasted of his King's Friendship: This I can say, said he to his Friends, our King is my Friend (8).

[C] His Troubles ended with his Life in 1625.] The Author of the Icon Johannis Cameronis has thought fit to suppress the tragical Circumstances of his Death, which it is likely proceeds from a Principle of Charity for the City of Montauban, and indeed for the whole Party: For it is indeed a Shame, that a Man of his Merit should be used as he was; and the Villain, who would have massacred him, never, for ought I can learn, received the just Punishment of his Crime. I would willingly leave this Accident in the Obscurity in which the Author of the Icon thought fit to bury it; but that it would be to no purpose, since Peter du Moulin has published it to the whole World, and it is to be met with in Rivet's Works. We must know, then that Cameron, having declared himself too openly against the Party, who preached up the Civil War, raised himself a great many Enemies, amongst whom one was so brutal, as to beat him to that degree, that he left him almost dead. Cameron retired to Moissac; but, finding the Change of Air had neither restored his Health, nor dispelled his Melancholy, he returned to Montauban, where he died some time after thro' Weakness and Chagrin. These are my Author's Words. 'Cum ibi incurfaret obvios, & popularis æstus torrenti obniteretur, increpans eos in quos incidebat, tantum odium populi in se contraxit, ut à cive quodam homine cerebroso pugniss & fustibus horrendum in modum cæsus pœne animam efflaverit. Dicebat autem verberanti, Feri miser, pectus nudum diloricator thorace objiciens. Sic male acceptus cessit Montalbano, & se recepit Moissacum, quod est oppidum in proximo, ut corpus male affectum refocillaret. Inde paulo post rediit Montalbano, ubi paucis post diebus ex animi agitudine diem clausit, & tranquillè obdormivit in Domino (9).' According to Rivet (10), it was not whilst they were beating him, that Cameron opened his Breast, and cried, Strike Wretch, strike, but when he was threatened with Death. The Fellow who threatened him would not be commanded twice; he immediately threw him down, and had killed him, had not a Woman interposed, Eorum uni qui mortem interminatus esset, laxatis continuo thoracis fibulis, pectus renudatum objiciens, dixerit, Feri miser. Quo dicto à misero illo violenter in terram dejectus, interfectus fuisset, ni mulier occurrens Cameroni jacenti innixa, corpus ejus corpore suo contegens ab ictibus prohibuisset.' This was all Cameron got by preaching up the Spirit of Moderation, in a Place where the Duke of Roban's Emiffaries were encouraging People to take up Arms. Who could ever believe that a Scotchman would be beaten for Passive Obedience? They were but little acquainted with him, who would have him looked upon as one tainted with Maxims he had received from his Country, in consequence of which he made no Distinction between Absolute Power and Tyranny (11). Du Moulin does not assign the Time in which Cameron was thus handled; tho' one may give a near Guess at it, if we remember that he died either in 1625, according to the Author of his Icon; or in the beginning of 1626, according to Blondel (12). Tho' he always professed a Reverence and Esteem for Monarchy, yet Tilenus publicly accused him for being of a Seditious Spirit, and an Enemy to Royalty, and for having preached up Republican Principles at Charenton, which, adds Tilenus, obliged him to fly. 'Pro certo habeo tum sacris edoctus literis, tum recta ratione adductus, & ipsa admonitus experientia & rerum usu, Regum autoritate illa summa, quæ nullius hominum solius Dei judicio obnoxia est, semel contempta, neque Deum rite coli, neque Ecclesie pacem reipublice otium constare ulla ratione posse. Sed nec aliter sensi unquam. Nam ex pueris Postquam verò ad Pastoris munus primum, tum deinde Professoris Sacrarum literarum sum vocatus, publice privatimque pro concione, in scholis, in congressibus, ubi res & occasio poscebat, eam professus sum, & pro virili parte defendi (13). — I am fully convinced, as well from the Scriptures, as from Reason and Experience, that if the Regal Authority, which is accountable only to GOD, be once treated with Contempt, there is an end of all Religion and Peace in the Church. Nor did I ever think otherwise. For ever since I was a Child. — And since my first taking upon myself the Ministry, and afterwards becoming Divinity Professor, I have declared and defended this Doctrine to the utmost of my Power, in my Sermons, Lectures, and Disputations, on all occasions. Upon this Cameron writ a handsome Letter to King James, wherein he denies Tilenus's Accusation: He owns the Mob at Paris would have murdered him, and that he saved himself by retiring at the importunate Solicitation of his Friends; But he insists that he met with no Trouble from the Magistracy, and that he obtained a Passport, which he shewed to the proper Officers at Diep. He produces Witnesses of all this.

[C] The Churches took care of his Family.] His first Wife was of Tonneins: He married her in 1611; and had by her Four Daughters, and a Son who lived but two Years. She died at Saumur in March 1624. He married his second Wife at Montauban, and had no Children by her. He left, by his first Wife, three Daughters, on whose account, as well as on that of his Writings, there was an Act made in the National Synod of Castres in 1626, importing, 'That, in Honour to the Memory of the deceased, the Sum of Seven hundred Livres was allotted to his Children, with a Pension to be yearly paid them by the Sieur du Candal till the next National Synod, and that the Assembly exhorted the Province of Anjou to print the last Tome of Cameron's Theological Works, with a Promise that the Charges attending the said Impression should

'should be taken care of (14).' I have already observed, that, in 1623, the National Synod appointed Cameron a Thousand Livres (15).

[E] He was Liberal, not only of his Learning, but also of his Purse. Few learned Men care to communicate, in Conversation, their principal Acquirements in Knowledge; and there are some Professors, who reserve the Solutions of the greatest Difficulties for those Scholars, who can pay the purchase of them. Cameron was not of this Character. He discovered all he knew to the first who desired his Instruction. Doctrinæ suæ non minus quam tōv χρημάτων καὶ βιωτικῶν κοινωτικὸς, & liberalis largitor, volentes a se discere nil celabat: quin facile quidquid singulare aut reconditum habuit, iis communicabat (16). This is more usual than to find a learned Man open his Purse to those who stand in need of it. And yet Cameron was so easy in this Point, that he gave with Prodigality: A φιλαργυρία & μακρολογία alienissimus, imo vero pecuniæ mirus & pro fortunæ suæ conditione nimis contemptor, & in erogando supra modum facilis, ne profugum dicam (17). Some Divines, who did not love him, blamed him for his want of Oeconomy. They said, he threw about his Money like Dirt, and thought it beneath him to haggle for any thing in the Shops or Inns; he gave whatever was asked, and never said one Word to beat down the Price of any Thing. They from hence took occasion to remind him of his having formerly subsisted in Scotland at the public Charge, by some very mean Services, to which Scholars of his Rank were subject. 'Exigua hæc ei summa fuit (18). Nam suæ Originis oblitus, & ejus temporis immemor quo in eorum numerum cooptatus, qui 25 Marcarum annuâ pensione pauperum aliquot civium filiis destinata (for poor Citizens) Sont, ut habet formula concessionis) frueretur, eâ conditione ut, inter se distributis temporibus, tintinnabulum pulsarent, præceptoribusque famularentur in libris deferendis quum ad templum irent; vel iis diebus quibus ludebatur, arma ut vocabant campestria, hoc est arcus, Pharetras, & Sclophas, &c. portarent: ejus temporis, inquam immemor, regius amicus (19), de imperio & regno Theologico, cujus altas in animis discipulorum fixerat radices, tantum cogitans, pecuniam ut a quam profundeabat. Et de taberna si quid emerit aut si hospitii expensâ numeraret, de postulo pretio quicquam demere, aut vel verbulo intercedere, se indignum censebat (20).

[F]—A great Talker, a long winded Preacher. He who tells us this (21), adds, that Cameron would never suffer himself to be interrupted. 'Nunquam erat fessus loquendo, indefatigabilis sermociuator, qui vel Bollandum enecaret tædio. Nam si nactus esset hominem qui ei præberet aures attentas, à summo mane usque ad vespæram sermonem sine intermissione prosecutus fuisset. Cum essem Lutetiae, me sæpe invisebat, habens semper Militearium individuum comitem, affixum ejus lateri & admiratorem. Mihi assidens ordiebatur sermonem infinitæ longitudinis. Ego vero summo cum silentio aures ei accommodabam. Nam interloquentem non patiebatur. Cumque mihi semel contigisset pauca verba interfari, ille corrugans frontem ex indignatione dixit, Ne me obturba; do not interrupt me. Demitto aurículas &c. Loquebatur autem de suis dictis aut factis. Narrabat quos sermones habuisset, cum illo mercatore, aut caudico, aut Theologo, & quâ occasione: Et quomodo ab eo digressus ad eum misisset carmina à se raptim conscripta, quæ memoriter recitabat non sine audientium tædio (22). ----- He was never weary with speaking, but would tire even the patience of Bollandus with his long Discourses. For if he got but a Man who would listen to him, he would hold forth, without Intermission, from Morning till Night. When I was at Paris, he frequently visited me, always bringing along with him Militeire bis constat Companion and Admirer. After sitting down by me, he would enter into a Discourse without end. I always gave him the utmost Attention. For he would not bear any Interruption. And I did but once happen to put in a word or two, when he frowned upon me very angrily and cried, Do not interrupt me. I hung my Ears &c. His discourse was all about himself. He related what Conferences he had held with this or that Merchant, Lawyer, or Divine, and on what Occasion: And how, after parting with them, he had sent them some extempore Verses, which he would repeat by heart, even till he became tedious to his Hearers. Du Moulin adds, that the English Divines, who went to see Cameron, were stunned with his eternal Clack. 'Eos dissonantes & adversos expertus est. Nam præter novitatem dogmatum, non ferebant illud Cameronis ἀμετροπείας & ἀβυσσολογίας, & incredibilem loquendi libidinem (23). ----- He met with their Dislike and Aversion. For besides the Novelty of his Doctrines, they could not bear Cameron's endless Talk, and unaccountable Itch of speaking.

His manner of preaching was displeasing in several respects; for, besides that his Sermons were usually two Hours long, he would make random digressions to Subjects which no Body understood, and seem to deliver them as an Enthusiast; he would unbutton himself, as he was preaching, and spread his Handkerchief before him like a Napkin, and every now and then uncover his Head. 'Cause cur ejus conciones non essent acceptæ in vulgus, hæ erant. Quod suas conciones ad duas horas extenderet, quod in longas & intricatas digressiones excurreret, quasi Enthusiastico abreptus, diceret non intelligibilia; quod aliquando mediâ in concione solveret fibulas thoracis, & præ se sudarium quasi mappam extenderet. Quandoque etiam inter concionandum caput nudaret, & pileum poneret super suggestu (24). He was not sensible how he tired his Auditory; on the contrary, he imagined they were charmed with his Eloquence; but having pressed a Tradesman truly and ingeniously to tell him, what the World said of his Sermons, the Man told him a piece of News which prodigiously mortified him: Would you really, Sir, said the honest Fellow, have me tell you what your Flock think and say of you? To be plain with you then, Sir, Your Sermons are not at all relished, they tire out Peoples Patience (25). Cameron, who expected a quite different Answer, retired very much dejected. This Reply touched him to the quick: It lay upon his Spirits for several Days after; He grew pale and melancholy, nor did he conceal the cause of his Grief from his Colleague. His Colleague (26), being his intimate Friend, appeased him with these seasonable Consolations. How can you unman yourself, said he? What, do you regard the Judgment of an Idiot? Can so small a Matter discompose you? Be assured, the gentle Part of your Church, who are Judges, hear you with a great deal of Pleasure, as well as Profit. This Plaster greatly alleviated the Pain, but did not altogether heal the Wound. Cameron's uneasiness returned, and he had recourse to a second Trial: He put the same Question to an Advocate, as he had done before to the Artisan, and received from him the same Answer. Upon which, giving himself quite over, he resolved to quit Bourdeaux, and do his best to become more agreeable in another Place (27).

[G]—inflexible in his Sentiments. This appeared in the National Synod of Tonnesins in 1614, where he refused to subscribe the Article of Justification. A great many were for executing Ecclesiastical Discipline against him; but, not to proceed rashly, they concluded to send Andrew Rivet, their Secretary, and another Minister called Bouchereau, to him. These exhorted him to conform to the Decisions of the Synod; but his Answer was, 'That he would sooner die than change his Opinion: All they could obtain from him was, a Promise not to spread it either by his Tongue or Pen. Rivet's Remonstrances induced the Synod to wave their Right, and sit down satisfied found many things in the Reformed Church, which wanted a farther Reformation [H]. He took a pleasure in venting particular Opinions, and in going out of the common Road. He gave some Instances of this while he was a Lad, in the Theses De tribus Fæderibus, which he published and maintained at Heidelberg, being then only a Student. He never treated a Theological Question without advancing some Novelty; and whenever, in his Interpretations of some Passage in Scripture, he met with any Difficulties, he took Occasions to contradict other Divines, and principally Beza (f); for he pretended that they never penetrated to the bottom of that Science (g). It was from him Mr Amyraut had the Doctrine of Universal Grace [I], which made so much noise in France. He loved to think satisfied with this Promise, in Consideration of the Services a Man of Cameron's Talents might do the Church (28). It is thought this Stubbornness proceeded from his Attachment in his Youth to the Sect of the Ramists (29).

[H] He found many Things in the Reformed Church, which wanted a farther Reformation. These are the great du Moulin's own Words. 'Fuit ingenio inquieto, semperque aliquid novi animo volutabat & ruminabat, nec dissimulabat inter amicos (quorum ego unus eram) multa esse in Religione nostrâ quæ egeret immutata (30). — He was of a restless Temper, and always studying and musing on some new Subject; nor did he disown to his Friends, (among whom I was one,) that there were many Things in our Religion which he could wish to see Reformed.'

We must take notice, that he thought the proper time for this Reformation was not yet come. 'Id ipse proficitur Epistolâ ad Ludovicum Capellum, ubi ait multa sibi occurrere, quæ promere, & chartæ committere nec animus ejus, nec temporis ratio patiebatur (31). This he declares in a Letter to Lewis Capel, wherein he says, Many things occurred to him, which, to divulge and commit to writing, was neither agreeable to his Inclination, or to the Times.' He believed St Peter to be the Foundation of the Church, and could not bear those who affirmed, that Salvation was impossible in the Romish Communion. He was concerned to find it unsafe to declare himself more freely, and to see the Ministers of greatest Power and Credit awe the Innovators. 'Conquerens quod paucos haberet sympathetas, & approbatores suæ sententiæ. Non est (inquit) qui tantam vim sustineat. Et paulo post: Nos in ea tempora incidimus quibus ne in doctrinæ quidem methodo ἀπὸ τῶν δοκῶν εἶναι εὐλόγως fas est discedere. Non obsecure sugillans, & naso suspendens optimos quosque Pastores Ecclesiæ nostrarum (32). — Complaining that few thought in his way, and approved his Opinion. There is no body (says he) who can bear such a Load. And a little after: We live in such Times, as do not allow us to recede, even in the Form of Doctrines, from those who are esteemed Pillars. Plainly reflecting upon, and ridiculing all the most eminent Ministers of our Churches.' It has been given out, that Cameron thought his Character, as a Minister, the Honour of which he had very much at heart, was an Obstacle to those Services he might have done to the Truth. He imagined, that, if he had not been in Orders, he might have declared his Sentiments more freely, as well as more usefully; but the fear of being excommunicated and degraded was a Restraint both upon his Tongue and Pen. The Author of this Report has very much wronged his Memory; for, as he had been very intimate with this Divine, and approached so near to the Romish Faith, that he was at last excommunicated by the Protestants, and became a professed Catholic, it was thought, the first occasion of his being perverted was the Confidence with which Cameron communicated his Thoughts to him. 'Postquam vir præstans rebus humanis exemptus est, res accidit quæ Cameronis famæ magnam labem inussit. Nam paulo post Cameronis obitum, Militerius ejus Achates & individuus comes, semper pendens narrantis ab ore, peperit monstra, quæ sub Cameronis disciplina conceperat. Edidit enim librum in Molinæum nihil tale expectantem, quo defendit merita, & justificationem per opera, & de sacramento Eucharistiæ sic loquitur, ut qui in Transubstantiationem esset priorior, & de Ecclesiâ Romana honorifice loquitur, dicens eam omnia fidei Christianæ capita pura & illibata conservasse, et si in quibusdam a recto tramite aberret. Profitebatur autem se hæc omnia habere a Camerone viro incomparabili. — Verba ejus sunt p. 26, & 27. Quod appellat Cameronismum, est elucidatio solida plurimarum difficultatum, quam nobis reliquit summum illud ingenium non minus raræ pietatis quam doctrinæ. Fateor cum laude quam ei debeo, cum mihi viam delineasse, & me ejus vestigiis insitisse. Et paulo post. Scio cum ad eundem scopum, quem mihi propono, collineasse, eumque suscepturum fuisse id quod animo conceperat, si Minister non fuisset. Sed experientia similis zeiti, quo post obitum suum condemnatur, efficebat ut prævideret, si tale quid suscepisset, mox sequenturam exaltationem cum Anathemate super caput ipsius. O quoties cum ea de re ageremus, mihi in aures dixit tanquam amicorum intimo, se utilius talento, quod a Deo acceperat, nisi Minister fuisset, usurum fuisse. Non quod professionem illam animatus non prosequeretur honore, sed ob consequentiam eorum, quæ credebatur a se utilius fieri posse si liberior fuisset. Nempe hæc eadem sunt, quæ ipse Cameron scripsit Capello, ante a nobis citata, ubi ait, se multa habere, quæ promere & chartæ committere, temporis ratio non patiebatur (33). — After the great Cameron departed this Life, an Accident happened which reflected very much upon his Memory. For soon after his Death, Militerius, his Achates, and inseparable Companion, and constant Auditor, brought forth the monstrous Opinions he had conceived from Cameron's Instructions: Having published a Book against Molinæus, who expelled no such Thing, wherein he defends the Merits, and Justification by Works, and seems, in treating of the Sacrament of the Eucharist, to favour Transubstantiation, and speaks honourably of the Church of Rome, affirming, that she had preserved pure, and uncorrupted, all the Essentials of the Christian Faith, though in some Things she had erred. And all these Opinions he declared he had received from that incomparable Man Cameron. His Words are in pag. 26 and 27. What he calls Cameronism, is a solid Explanation of several Difficulties, left us by that great Genius of uncommon Piety, as well as Learning. I confess, to give him his due Praise, he chalked out the way for me, and I have followed his Steps. And a little after. To my Knowledge, he had the same thing in view, which I have attempted, and would have executed the Scheme he had formed, had he not been in Orders. But his Experience of the same sort of Zeal, which is now used in condemning him since his Death, made him foresee, that the Undertaking would have been attended with Degradation and Anathematization. O how often, when we were upon this Subject, has he told me, as his particular Friend, that he could have employed the Talent, God had lent him, to much greater Advantage, had he not been a Minister! Not that he was wanting in heartily honouring his Profession, but because he thought he might have been more useful, had he been more at Liberty. This is no more than what Cameron himself wrote to Capel, in the Words before cited, where he says, that he had many Things, which to publish or commit to writing was not agreeable to the Times.' The following Character was given of him by a London Divine to a Minister of Nerac; 'We have seen Mr Cameron in his Passage this way: he seems to me to be a Man profoundly melancholy, and capable of maintaining an Heresy (34).'

[I] It was from him Mr Amyraut had the Doctrine of Universal Grace. Never was Scholar filled with a greater Veneration for his Master, than think, but not to write down his Thoughts; so that, had he not been in some measure obliged to it, he had never committed any thing to the Press, or writ any thing fit for Publication (b). This had been a Loss to the World; for we are indebted to him for some very good Pieces [K]. Whilst he was Minister at Bourdeaux, he printed a Letter, which was sentenced to be burnt by an Arrêt of Parliament [L].

Mr Amyraut was for Cameron. It is said he imitated him even to the Tone of his Voice, and a certain Motion of his Head; and that, when he harangued Lewis XIII, that Prince thought he had a foreign Pronunciation. 'Is totum imbibit Cameronem; & supra omnes alios eum exacte imitari sedulo annifus est, imo vel etiam in gestu demittendi capitis (35), & in pronuntiatione adeo, seu vocis tono & modulatione quadam, sic perfecte imitari didicit, ut homo Gallus a gloriosissima memoria Rege Ludovico XIII, judicii magni & admirandæ imaginationis Principe, extraneus habitus sit. Cum enim anno 1631, a Synodo Nationali, cum aliis, ad Regem delegatus esset, & apud Majestatem ejus verba fecisset, Rex, qui vultu indicavit viri facundiam brevem orationem sibi gratam fuisse, ad magnatam pone stantem conversus, submissiore voce dixit, extraneus est. Illo vero respondente Gallum esse, in tractu Salmuriensi natum; atque (replicavit Regia Majestas) peregrini aliquid in ejus pronuntiatione observavi. Quod ex collegatis unum qui audierat, quum Carentonum rediisset, narrare meminimus (36).'

[K] We are indebted to him for some very good Pieces.] His Theological Lectures, on some very important Subjects, were printed at Saumur, in three Volumes in 4to; the first in 1626, and the two others in 1628. Lewis Cappel, his Disciple, had the Care of this Edition. It was he who composed the Ion Johannis Cameronis (37), which I quoted before. Some Years after, these three Volumes were reprinted at Geneva, with an Addition of all the miscellaneous Pieces that could be met with of the same Author, whereof some, which had been published in French (as his seven Sermons upon the sixth Chapter of St John) were translated into Latin. All these together made one Volume in Folio. Frederic Spanheim, at that time Divinity Professor at Geneva, supervised this Impression, and added to it a Preface. Cameron's Answer to a Letter of Episcopius was not forgotten (38). The same Cappel published in 1632 Cameron's Myrobecium Evangelicum.

[L] He printed a Letter, which was sentenced to be burnt by an Arrêt of Parliament.] In the Year 1617, the Parliament of Bourdeaux passed Sentence of Death on two Captains accused of Piracy: They were Protestants, and demanded their Right to a Judicature of half Protestants and half Catholics; but the Parliament rejected their Claim 'under a pretence that the Privilege of the Edict extended not to Pirates (39).' They went to the Place of Execution 'with such a Constancy, and so many Marks of a Christian Resignation, that Cameron thought it his Duty to honour their Memories with a short account of what passed at their Death. Writing a Panegyric upon People condemned to a shameful Death, was obliquely arraigning the Parliament. Nay, there were some Strokes in it, which were aimed at it directly, because the Protestants thought the Parliament had violated their Privileges. That Court therefore revenged itself on the Work, expecting some Opportunity of being revenged on the Author, and condemned the Book to be burnt openly by the common Hangman.' The French Mercury relates this Fact with several Circumstances. These two Captains 'were broke alive upon the Wheel June 20, having each a Paper Crown upon his Head, with this Inscription, Captains of the Pirates, Traitors, and Rebels to the King; and their Heads were set upon Towers along the Port of Bourdeaux. — The Court gave leave to Cameron, the Minister, to attend them in the Prison, and at the Place of Execution, but not in their Way thither; This Minister some time after printed a Libel in form of a Letter (40), which he intitled, the Constancy, Faith, and Resolution, shewn by the Captains Minquet and Gaillard at their Deaths. This coming to the Knowledge of the Parliament of Bourdeaux; the said Libel or Letter was diligently examined, and, by an Arrêt then passed, was burnt by the Hands of the common Executioner. The Arrêt prohibited Cameron from writing or printing any such Letters for the future, as tending only to Sedition, and to vilify the Acts of the Court, to prepossess the King's Subject against his sovereign Justice, and to reflect on his Officers; on pain of exemplary Punishment, and being proceeded against as a Disturber of the public Tranquillity (41). You will find, in the History of the Edict of Nantz (42), the Proceedings of the same Parliament against Cameron, and his Colleague Primerose in 1615.

CAMILLUS (MARCUS FURIUS), was the first who rendered illustrious the Furian Family. He triumphed four times, was five times Dictator, and had the Complement of being Rome's second Founder: In a Word, he obtained all the Honours his Country could give him. Whilst he was Censor, he obliged such, as were unmarried, to marry the Widows of those who had been slain in the Wars. To this end he used gentle Exhortations, and, where they failed, the Terror of a Fine. He was made Dictator in the tenth Year of the Siege of Veii (a), and had the Honour to finish it by taking that City, Rome's ancient Rival. What he said upon viewing the Ruins of Veii, is very remarkable [A]. He returned triumphant home:

[A] What he said upon viewing the Ruins of Veii is very remarkable.] It appears from a Multitude of Passages in ancient Authors, that the Heathens believed there were Divinities jealous of the Prosperity of Mankind, and who never failed, sooner or later, to check, with some sensible Misfortune, those who had obtained any great Advantages. Camillus, full of this Thought, could not behold Rome's Happiness in the Pillage of Veii, without apprehending some Mixture of Adversity from these sort of Deities, who delighted in distributing good and evil. For which reason he prayed, that, if the present Prosperity of the Romans must be tempered with some Disgrace, it might fall on himself in particular, and not on his Country. What could be more heroic! What a Greatness of Soul was this? 'Dictator Camillus, capta Veiorum urbe, præcones edicere jubet, ut ab inermi turba abstineatur: is finis sanguinis fuit, dedit inde inermes cepti, & ad prædam miles permissu Dictatoris discurrit, quæ cum ante oculos ejus aliquanto spe atque opinione major majorisque pretii rerum ferretur, dicitur manus ad cælum tollens precatus esse Dictator, ut si cui hominum Deorumque nimia sua fortuna populique Romani videretur, ut eam invidiam lenire suo privato incommodo, quam minimo publico populique Romani liceret (1). Plutarch observes, that Camillus, upon viewing the Desolation of this once flourishing City, fell into Tears before the making his Prayer. Ἀλόνος δὲ τῆς πόλεως καὶ ἀπὸ κράτος, καὶ τῶν Ρωμαίων ἀγρόνων καὶ φερύλων ἀπερὸν τινα πλεῖτον, ἐφορῶν ὁ Κάμιλλος ἀπὸ τῆς ἀκρας τὰ πρὸ τῶν οὐρανῶν, πρῶτον μὲν ἐπὶ τὴν ἐδαρμένην, εἰτα μακαρίσθεις ὑπὸ τῶν παρόντων, ἀνέσχε τὰς χεῖρας τοῖς θεοῖς καὶ προσευχόμενος εἶπε. home : But his triumphal Chariot, drawn by four white Horses, was looked upon as too presumptuous an Innovation [B]. And some little time after, upon his opposing the Instances of the People, who were for having part of their Inhabitants transported to Veii, he became odious. They soon found an Opportunity of expressing their Resentments. He had devoted to Apollo a tenth part of the Spoils of Veii, but had quite forgot to set it apart. The Senate, being informed by the Augurs that the Gods were angry, commanded every Soldier to return a tenth part of his Portion of the Booty. This raised great murmuring against Camillus. The Roman Ladies, on this occasion, did a very remarkable thing [C]. The War with the Falisci broke out some time after (b) ; and it was then Camillus performed that generous Action which Mr Moreri mentions (c). The Enemies were so charmed with it, that they voluntarily submitted to the Romans. The Soldiers were by this means baulked in their Expectations of the Plunder ; and this was a new matter of Complaint against Camillus. In short, the People's Hatred lost all Patience, when Camillus had procured the Proposal of sending some Citizens to Veii to be absolutely rejected. Lucius Apuleius, one of the Tribunes, called him to an account for the spoils of that Place : but Camillus prevented his Condemnation by a voluntary Exile (d). Upon which he was very highly fined. It was during his Exile he did the greatest Action of his Life ; for instead of being pleased with the Gauls ravaging Rome, or joining them to revenge the Injury his Country had done him, he employed all his Prudence and Courage to expel the Enemy ; and that with so exact a Regard to the sacred Laws of Rome, that he declined the Command which several particular Persons offered him (e). He waited for the Orders of the People, who were represented by the Citizens, who held out still in the Capitol. But before this he had raised some Troops in the place of his Exile (f), and gained some Advantages over the Enemy. The Romans, besieged in the Capitol, made him Dictator in the Year 366 ; and he signalized himself so remarkably, that he drove all the Gauls out of the Territories of the Commonwealth. This great Service, and the many other Victories he afterwards obtained, could not exempt him from the Affronts of the Tribunes ; for even whilst he was Dictator, in the Year 389, they sent him a Summons by an Officer, who would have seized him. He appeared, attended by the Senate ; and because, after a great many Disputes, the Affair in question was determined in favour of the People (g), Camillus was conducted to his Lodgings with an universal Applause. He died of the Plague the Year following (h). There was a very handsome thing said of him, that Rome was only to be found where Camillus resided. The Latin Words, which I cite (i), express this more emphatically. He left Sons, who shared in the Dignities of the Commonwealth [D] ; but afterwards his Descendants lived in Obscurity till the time of Tiberius [E]. Tacitus is found not to have been very exact in making this Observation.

[B] His triumphal Chariot, drawn by four white Horses, was looked upon as too presumptuous an Innovation. According to Plutarch, no General, either before or after him, ever triumphed in the like manner ; so firmly were they persuaded, that such a Chariot was peculiarly sacred to the Sovereign of Gods and Men. Τὰ τε ἅλλα σοβαρῶς ἐθεαμύεν, καὶ τὴν ἐπιπλέον ὑποζεύξαντες λευκοτάλον ἐπίβη, καὶ διεξήλασε τῆς Πάρις, ἡδυνὸς τὸ τοιοῦτον ἡγεμὸν πρῶτον ἔδ' ἕσπερον. ἔπειν γὰρ ἠγύοντο τὸ τοιοῦτον ὄχημα, τῷ βασιλεὶ καὶ πᾶσι τῶν δυνάμεων ἐπιπεφροσμένον. Triumphum duxit cum aliis superbum, tum quod curru quatuor juncto equis albis sit invehens, & per Romam transierit nullo exemplo vel priorum vel insequentium imperatorum. Sacrum enim currum habent deorum regi & Patri dicatum (3).

[C] The Roman Ladies, on this occasion, did a very remarkable Thing. Notwithstanding all their Murmurings, every body was obliged to disburse his Portion, in order to fulfil Camillus's Vow : but as the Senate had resolved to send a Vessel of Gold to Delphos, and there was no Gold in all the City, they were at a loss how to get one made. The Ladies extricated them out of this Difficulty : for, assembling together, they dedicated to this purpose their Jewels. In consideration of which, the Senate allowed them the Honour of Funeral Orations, till then appropriated to the Men (4).

[D] He left Sons, who shared in the Dignities of the Commonwealth. Spurius Furius CAMILLUS, one of them, was created Praetor the very Year That Office was instituted in Rome, viz. in the Year 389, when the Consulship began to be shared between the Patricians and Plebeians (5). His Brother Lucius Furius CAMILUS made a yet greater figure in History. He was created Dictator, in the Year of Rome 403 ; and because he restored the Consulship to the Patricians, he got so much into their Favour, that they chose him Consul the Year following. He subdued the Gauls ; and it was in his Consulship that Marcus Valerius, fighting a Duel with a Gaul, gained the Victory by the Assistance (6) of a Raven (7). Glandorp pretends, that this Lucius Furius CAMILLUS was Consul eleven Years after, in the Year of Rome 417 (8) ; but Sigonius proves this to be a Mistake from the Tables of the Capitol, where the Consul L. Furius CAMILLUS, who triumphed in the Year 415, is said to be Spurius's Son, and Marcus's Grandson. That Camillus, who was Consul in the Year 415, had Gaius Muentius for his Colleague : They triumphed both of them, and obtained a Privilege at that time very rare, which was, to have their Statues placed in the Forum (9). I omit the other Actions of this L. Furius Camillus, Grandson to the Great Camillus : They who would be informed of them may consult Livy.

[E] - - - - - Afterwards his Descendants lived in Obscurity. We learn from Tacitus, that Furius Camillus, Proconsul in Africa, under Tiberius, obtained the Honour of a Triumph, for having vanquished the Numidians. Upon which this Historian observes, that from the time of the famous Camillus, the Restorer of his Country, to this Proconsul of Africa, none of the Family had commanded any Armies except the Son of the Restorer. He adds, That this Proconsul was not esteemed a Soldier, and that it was for this very Reason Tiberius extolled him so mightily to the Senate. Fusi Numidae, multoque post annos Furio nomini partum decus militie. Nam post illum recuperatorem urbis, filiumque ejus Camillum, penes alias familias imperatoria laus fuerat.

(6) For which reason he was surnamed Corvinus.

Observation (k). The Glory of this Family descended to the Females, and continued in that respect till the Time of St Jerom [F].

(k) See Remark [E].

* fuerat. Atque hic, quem memoravimus, bellorum
* expers habebatur. Eo prior Tiberius res gestas
* apud Senatum celebravit: & decrevere patres tri-
* umphalia insignia. Quod Camillo ob modestiam
* vitæ impune fuit (10). Lippus pretends, that there * were two Triumphs in the Furian Family more than
* Tacitus was aware of. P. Furius, says he (11), tri* umphed over the Gauls, in the Year 530, and L. Fu* rius Purpureo also triumphed over the Gauls, in
* the Year 553. Father Strada objects these same * Triumphs to Tacitus; and that he might not be a * bare Copier of Lippus, he quotes Polybius and Oro-
* sius as to the Victory of P. Furius; and Plutarch,
* as to the Triumph of the same Furius; and Livy,
* and the Capitoline Tables, as to the Triumph in * 553 (12). It is certain, according to Polybius, the
* Romans gained an important Victory over the Gauls,
* under the Consulate of P. Furius and C. Flaminius.
* It is certain, he observes that the Consuls entered * with an Army into the Enemy's Country (13); but
* when he describes the Battle, he speaks only of the * Consul Flaminius: nor does he say one Word that * either of them triumphed. So that it is wrong to * pretend that Polybius is a good Evidence of
* P. Furius's Victory. The other Historians cited by
* Strada are still more insufficient; for Orosius attri* butes the whole Victory to Flaminius (14), with* out saying one Word of Furius. As for Plutarch,
* he says, that the Consuls Flaminius and Furius led
* an Army into the Country of the Insubrian Gauls,
* and that the Senate understanding they had been
* irregularly elected, wrote to them to return im* mediately, and lay down their Office; but that
* Flaminius did not open the Letter till after he had
* routed the Enemy; and that this Disrespect to * their Message had like to have hindered his Tri-
* umphal Entry (15). Plutarch adds, that, im* mediately after Flaminius's Triumph, he and his Col* league were deposed from their Consulate. All this
* intimates, that Furius commanded some separate
* Body, which had no share in the Victory; however,
* there is nothing in Plutarch which proves, that
* Furius triumphed. Father Strada has succeeded * better in his Citations relating to the Triumph of
* L. Furius Purpureo.

But, in my Opinion, to form a just Criticism on Tacitus, we ought to understand two things;
one, what he means by Furium nomen; the other,
what he means by Imperatoria laus: If his Meaning is, that, from the Son of the Great Camillus down to Tiberius, none of the Furian Family commanded the Roman Armies; both Lippus and Famius Strada have been too sparing of their Criticisms;
they might have objected to him Caius Furius Pacilus, Consul in the Year of Rome 502, who commanded some time in Sicily (16); but if he designed to speak only of Camillus's Descendants, the Censure of both those Authors is to no purpose;

for neither the Consul in the Year 530, nor he who triumphed in 553, were of Camillus's Branch:
the Surname of the one was Pbilo, and of the other Purpureo. They had done well if they had objected to him the Grandson of the Great Camillus.

[F] The Glory of his Family descended to the Females, and continued in this respect till the time of St Jerom.] I do not pretend that the Ladies, descended from the Great Camillus, signalized themselves in Arms; I speak only of the Glory proper to their Sex. Chastity and Continency were so remarkably preferred by the Ladies of this Family, that we scarce meet with one of them who contracted a second Marriage. St Jerom is my Author, in a Letter to a Lady of Camillus's Race, who asked his Advice concerning a Resolution she had taken to continue a Widow all her Life. 'Ob-servas literis & suppliciter deprecari ut tibi referi-bam, imo scribam quomodo vivere debeas, & viduitatis coronam illas pudicitiae nomine conservare (17). --- You take notice in your Letters, & express an earnest Desire of my Answer, and I will give you my Thoughts how you ought to live and preserve the Honour of your Widowhood by an 'inviolable Chastity.' She was the Daughter of a Lady who had lived continent although she was married. 'Gaudet animus, exultant viscera, gessit
'affectus, hoc te cupere esse post virum, quod sanctae
'memoriae mater tua Titiana multo tempore fuit
'sub marito. Exaudita sunt preces, & orationes
'eius: impetravit in unica filia quod vivens ipsa
'possederat. Habes praeterea generis tui grande
'privilegium, quod exinde à Camillo vel nulla,
'vel rara vestrae familiae scribitur secundos nosse
'concupitus: ut non tam laudanda sis, si vidua per-
'severes, quam execranda, si id Christiana non ser'ves, quod per tanta saecula gentiles feminae cus-
'dierunt. Taceo de Paula, Eustochio, stirpis vestrae
'floribus: ne per occasionem exhortationis tuae
'illas laudare videar (18). --- I am extremely
'glad to find you resolve to be, now you are a 'Widow, what your Mother Titiana, of pious Me'mory, was for some considerable Time even whilst
'a Wife. Her Prayers are now heard: she begged
'her only Daughter might imitate her Continence.
'You have also before you the glorious Distinction of 'your Family, which from it's Original in Camillus
'has known few or none of it's Females engaged in 'second Marriages: So that you will not be so 'much commended for continuing a Widow, as you 'will be condemned for not preserving that under 'Christianity, which your female Relations always 'did for so many Centuries under Paganism. I 'shall say nothing of Paula and Eustochium,
'the Ornaments of your Family, lest I should 'seem on your Account to undertake their Pa'negyric.'

CAMPANUS (JOHN ANTONY), one of the most learned Prelates of Italy in the XVth Century, was the Son of a Country-woman, who finding herself in Labour, while she was at work in the Fields, was delivered of him under a Laurel (a), near Capua (b). He was designed for a Shepherd [A]; but appearing to have a considerable Genius, he was placed in the Service of a Country Curate, who taught him a little Latin (c). Others say he was only Servant to the Sexton (d). He was afterwards Tutor in a good Family at Naples (e), and made a great Progress by his close Application to his Studies. He had, among other Masters, the renowned Laurentius Valla (f). After he had continued five Years at Naples (g), he went to study the Law at Perugia (h), and there publicly taught polite Learning, with so great Applause, that he was made a Freeman of that City, by a Decree of the Senate. Some say he never understood Greek (i), whilst others affirm he studied it perfectly under Demetrius Chalcondylas, at Padua (k). Being returned to Perugia, he writ the History of the valiant Andrew Braccio. This Book was very much esteemed for it's Stile; but there appeared in it too much Flattery [B]. The Reputation of Campanus became so great, that he was sent for to Rome by Pope Calixtus III., to be his Secretary: He was scarce arrived there, when the Death of that Pope put an End to his Expectations. He insinuated himself into the Favour of Pius II., and was made Steward to Cardinal Saxoferrate. Some time after he was promoted to the Bishopric of Crotone, by Pius II., and afterwards to that of Teramo [C]. Paul II. made him Arch-Priest of St Eustachius, which is a very good Benefice. He attended Francis Piccolomini, Cardinal Legate, into Germany, and made several Speeches in the Imperial Diets. At his Return into Italy, he obtained from the same Pope the Government of Tuderti. Sixtus IV. gave him that of Fulgino, and Citta di Castello: But he lost both his Post, and the Friendship of this Pope, by being believed an Accomplice in the Rebellion which broke out in his Government. Sixtus was so incensed against him, that he banished him out of the Ecclesiastical State, and rejected all Intercessions made in his behalf. Campanus, extremely affected with this Disgrace, spent the rest of his Life in Melancholy, sometimes at the Court of Naples, and sometimes at Siena. In vain he implored the Succour of the Muses and Literature, I mean that he endeavoured to dissipate his Chagrin by writing; he no sooner made a beginning, but he found it return upon him: Upon this he lost all Courage, and, being besides subject to an Epilepsy, he sunk intirely under his Misfortunes. He died at Siena the fifteenth of July, 1477, in the fiftieth Year of his Age (l), and was buried in the Cathedral Church (m). He had a great Desire to have settled in his own Country [D], as appears by his Letters. He left several Works.

[B] He wrote the History of Andrew Braccio. This Work was very much esteemed for it's Stile; but there appeared in it too much Flattery.] These are Jovius's Words: 'Inter multa orationum, & multiplicitis styli opera quæ extant, avidissime Bracii inclyti ducis Vita perlegitur, digna posteritate nisi rerum gestarum fidem adulatione poetica corrupisset (3). ----- Among the many Discourses, and Works composed with Elegancy of Stile, the Life of Braccius, the famous Captain, is thought most entertaining, and would be worthy to be perused, if the Facts had not been misrepresented through poetical Flattery.' This Andrew Braccio was a very great Captain. He was a Native of Montone in the Perugino (4). The Inhabitants of Perugia chose him for their Prince by reason of his Valour, and the Services he had done them (5). He died in 1424 (6). His Life, writ in Latin by our Campanus, was translated into Italian by Pompey Pellini: This Translation was printed at Venice, in 1572, 4to (7).

[C] He was promoted to the Bishopric of Teramo.] They who say he was Bishop of Arezzo, Aretinus Episcopus, are mistaken. Gesner has been guilty of this Mistake (8): and so have Peter Opmeer (9), and Vossius (10), as Leonard Nicodemus observes, who adds, that it is probable the Term Aprutinus led them into this Error (11). Campanus is called Episcopus Aprutinus, in the Title Page of Andrew Braccio's Life, printed at Basil, in 1545; And he called himself Aprutinus, because his Bishopric was in the Abruzzo. Vossius observes, that Paulus Jovius styles him Interamnatum Episcopum, — Bishop of the Teramians; and Gyraldus, Prælatinorum sive Prætutianorum Episcopus (12), — Bishop of the Abruzzians. He reconciles these Differences very well, by saying, 'Nempe sedes episcopalis fuit Interamnii Prætutianorum oppidi, quod vulgo à circumfluo Nare fluvio Terami vel Terani vocatur. --- For his Episcopal See was at Teramo, or Terano, a Town of the Abruzzians, which is so called for it's being surrounded by the River 'Nar.' This ought to have prevented his calling him Aretinus Episcopus. König is one of those who have given him the same Title (13).

[D] He had a great Desire to have settled in his own Country.] This appears from a Passage in his Letters, which acquaints us with some Circumstances of his Life: 'Dicere de tuis (he is speaking to the Duke of Calabria, Alphonso of Arragon, Son of Ferdinand King of Naples) divinis & præstantissimis laudibus non est epistolæ, in qua nihil æque quam brevitas & castigatio laudatur. Hoc tantum de me addiderim, natum esse hac ætate, in qua tu es, & natum tibi, patri ac Regno tuo, & ad illum & ad te pertinere, haberi rationem de vestris. Ego sextumdecimum annum Romana in Cur. dego. Sub Pio pontifice vixi non sine aliqua gratia & opinione. Qua de re habuit me

odio Paulus, ut habuit cæteros qui Pii memoria afficerentur. Sixtum vero, quo sum usus in philosophia præceptore, aliquanto habui propensiorum. Sed fortuna mea omnis à Regno est: quam mihi tu & pater tuus dabitis spem, ad hanc erigar, huic insitiam. Quare te oro & obtestor, dignissime & sanguinis altissime Princeps, errantem me tot annos redde jam Patriæ, redde meis, & tandem Campanum Campaniæ redde (14). --- To attempt your divine and most excellent Praises is not the Business of a Letter, in which nothing is so commendable as Brevity and Correctness. I will only add one Word about myself, that I was born in the same Age with yourself, and born a Subject to your and your Father's Dominions, and therefore belong to him and you, and account myself your's. I have now lived sixteen Years in the Court of Rome. Under Pope Pius I was in no small Favour and Esteem. For which reason I was hated by Paul, as were a great many others, who revered the Memory of Pius. But Sixtus, whose Disciple I had formerly been in Philosophy, was more favourable to me. But all my Expectations are grounded on the Favour of my Sovereigns; the Hopes you and your Father shall give me, to these I will trust. Therefore I implore and beseech you, most worthy and illustrious Prince, restore me, from this long vagabond Life, to my Country, restore me to my Friends, and restore at last Campanus to Campania.

[E] He left several Works.] Leonard Nicodemus (15) has given us an exact Account of all the Pieces contained in the Collection of our Campanus's Works. There are, among them, several Moral Treatises, as, de Ingratitudine fugienda: de Dignitate Matrimonii, &c. several Speeches, particularly those which he made at Perugia, when first he taught there, in 1455; his Funeral Orations on a Duke of Urbino, on Cardinal Saxoferrate, on Pius II., &c. Nine Books of Letters, some of which were reprinted in Germany, by the Care of Daumius, with those of Textor (16); the Life of Pius II.: Eight Books of Elegies and Epigrams, and some Sermons. Panigarola very much commends that which he preached upon an Ashwednesday; these are his Words: 'Il Campano nell'Orazione Cinerizia amplifica in tanti modi questa proposizione, che bisogna morire, che è cosa di maraviglia il considerarlo: è Monsignor Cornelio non cede punto nell'imitazione (17). — Campanus, in his Sermon on Ashwednesday, so fully discusses this Subject, of the Necessity of Dying, that the Consideration of it is very surprizing: And Monsignor Cornelio has imitated him very closely.' This Monsignor Cornelio is the Bishop of Bisonte, a great Preacher, and one who made a great Figure in the Council of Trent. His Family-name was Muffs. He copied our Campanus almost word for word in his Necessity of Dying (18). Observe these

We must not forget that he was Corrector of the Press [F], and very ugly in his Person (p). They are mistaken who speak of him and Antony Campanus as two distinct Persons [G]. Observe, there have been some other Authors named Campanus: The Bibliographers, who who reckon them up, very often forget Francis CAMPANUS, an Italian Humanist (q) of good Repute, whose Quæstio Virgiliana I have seen printed by Henry Stephens, in 1567 (r), together with Parrhasius's Book De Rebus per Epistolam quæstis. The Author dedicated it to Hercules de Gonzago, Bishop of Mantua, in 1536. He was then at Bologna.

I must add a Remark on the Passage where I have mentioned his writing Love-Verfes [H].

these Words of Mr Menage, 'Campanus ---- writ a great many Love Verfes. This he tells us himself. Scripti Versus, quorum pars est amatoria: pars amore non vacat ad tria millia. 'Rome was one of the first Places where the Press was set up, by the means of one Uldaricus Gallus, who gave occasion to Bishop John Antony Campanus, Corrector of it, to complement him with the following Epigram, mentioned by Faernus, and inserted at the end of Tully's Philippics, printed by the said Uldaricus, without the Date of the Year, though in all probability before 1470.

Mr Chevallier quotes part of these Words, and also those of Mr Mentel, where he observes, that two Bishops were at the same time Correctors of the Press at Rome, John Andrew, Bishop of Aleria, and Antony Campanus Bishop of Teramo (21). There are two Mistakes to be corrected in what he quotes from Mr Mentel (22): In my opinion, continues he, they ought rather to be called Authors than Correctors, as one may easily judge from the following Account. Upon which he tells us, that under the Pontificate of Paul II, about the Year 1466, two Germans, Conrade Swaynheim and Arnold Pannarts, came to Rome to set up the first Printing-Office. He gives us the order of the Books printed till May 1472, with the Number of the Copies of each Author. He says, It was the Bishop of Aleria, the Pope's Library-Keeper, who prepared the Manuscripts of most of the Authors, and writ the Dedications and Prefaces to some Editions, and was Corrector of the Press. He adds, that another Printer, called Udalricus (23), came much about the same time to Rome, to erect another Printing-Office (24). The Bishop of Teramo corrected this Press, as the Bishop of Aleria did the other. Udalricus went on with so much Diligence, that Campanus, who had undertaken to keep the Press at work in furnishing Copies and correcting the Proofs, could never be at rest: Cum interquiescere illum affiduis emendationibus non permetteret, says Michael Fernus in Campanus's Life. Observe this Conclusion: 'We may gather easily from the Account now given, that these two Bishops were Authors of the first Editions published at Rome, by these Germans, and that they corrected only their own Works (25). For my part, I cannot conceive how the Reader can conclude any thing like it from this Account; for it plainly proves, that these two Bishops performed all the Duties of Correctors of the Press.

[G] They are mistaken who speak of him, and Antony Campanus, as two distinct Persons. Toppi has committed this Error in two or three places of his Neapolitan Bibliotheca, as Leonard Nicodemus objects to him. Gesner's Abbreviators have mentioned Antony Campanus and John Antony Campanus as two Authors. Konig has made the same Mistake (26).

[H] I must add a Remark on the Passage where I have mentioned his writing Love Verfes (27). He is very much censured on account of a very obscene Epigram, inasmuch that he is joined with John de la Casa. 'Quæ tamen non deterruerunt in Italia (ô tempora, ô mores!) Episcopum quendam Nucerinum Job. de la Casa, quin Sodomizæ laudes nefario Libro fuerit complexus, uti Conrad. Ritterhusius conqueritur in Novell. lection. part. 12. c. 9. n. 7. Parem quoque Castimoniam, & Episcopali felicitat dignitatem convenientem gravitatem sapit Episcopi Imbranenensis ad Gravanolum mostu-patorem (28) Epigramma, quod longè sædius & putidius puto, quam ut Commentariis hinc sit inferendum. Ideoque in id merito infurget Georg. Erhardus in Symbolis ad Petronium, pag. 96 (29). Which yet did not deter, even in Italy, a certain Bishop of Nocera, John de la Casa, from writing a wicked Book in the Praise of Sodomy, as Ritterhusius complains in his Novell. Lection. part. 12. c. 9. n. 7. Of the same modest stamp is the Epigram of the Bishop of Teramo, on the self-polluter Gravanolus, which is too filthy and obscene to be inserted in these Commentaries. For which reason it is deservedly censured by George Erhardus in Symbolis ad Petronium pag. 96. It would be difficult to conjecture who this Episcopus Imbranenensis should be, if we did not otherwise know, that John Antony Campanus, Bishop of Teramo, (in Latin, according to some undoubtedly, Interamnensis) was Author of the Epigram in question. George Erhardus, cited by Salmuthus as we have seen, expresses it thus: Joannes Antonius Campanus Epigrammate ad Gravanolum Mastupratorem,

Non damnosa mihi gratis manus ipsa placebit,
Inque meis digitis Hermaphroditus erit.

O pudicum virum! At lufit, inquit, in nequam illum fututorem. At non decebat, inquit, illum, cujus est officii severitatem in castigando adhibere, non risum jocumque facere (30). Saldenus makes use of this Passage of Salmuthus, without correcting it's Faults; may he has even added some of his own. 'Parem quoque castimoniam, Episcopali gravitati convenientem Episcopo Imbranenensi adscribit Salmuthus, ob Epigramma (inquit) ad Gravanolum Mostupratorem mislum, longè sædius & putidius, quam ut Commentariis suis infereret (31).

CANICEUS (JAMES), Author of some Love-Letters. I mention this only upon Agrippa's Authority (a), and to encourage the Curious to find out this Writer, whose Name I have not met with in any Bibliographer, any more than that of James Calandrus, an Author of the same Class, according to Agrippa (b) (§. a).

[§ a. Mr Bayle falls into two Mistakes here concerning this Author, who, by the way, was born at Parma. First, he calls him Caniceus instead of Caviceus, and that on the Authority of his Edition of Agrippa de Vanitate Scientiarum, chap. 64; whereas in the good Editions of this Book, particularly in those of 1531 and 1539, we read Caviceus. In the next place Mr Bayle supposes, that the Book, there ascribed to Caviceus by Agrippa, is a Book of Love-Letters, whereas it is an Italian Romance in three Books, entitled Il Peregrino, wherein the Author gives us the History of his own Amours with his Mistress, whom he names Geneva. 'Jacobus Caviceus, (says Benedictus Curtius on the 14th of the Arrêts d'Amour) ob Genevram ærumnas, diversarum regionum lustrationes, & ægrolabores, doloresque, infernorum aditus, ut recte peregrinus vocatus sit, uno opere perperit. — Caviceus wrote a Book of his Sufferings for Geneva his Mistress, of his Wanderings thro' diverse Nations, his Labours, Distresses, and visiting the infernal Regions, so that he was rightly styled The Pilgrim.' This is the very same Romance, which Agrippa in the said sixty fourth Chapter places among the Modern Gallant Histories, under the Title of the History of the Amours of the Pilgrim. The following Words of Agrippa in the same Chapter gave occasion to Mr Bayle's Mistake: 'Nam huic (lenocinio) in primis Grammatica scribendi & loquendi disciplina amatorias largitur epistolas, illas que efficit amoris salutatunculis, precatunculis, lamentatunculis, allectatunculis dictare docet: quarum exempla pleraque ex recentioribus Aeneas Sylvius, & Jacobus Caviceus, & plerique alii reliquerunt. — To this Courtship, Rhetoric furnishes Love-Letters, and teaches to fill them with amorous Salutations, Requests, Complaints, Allurements; Examples of which we find among the Moderns, in the Writings of Aeneas Sylvius, James Caviceus, and many others.' The Romance above-mentioned contains indeed many Love-Letters, as does likewise the Romance composed by Aeneas Sylvius; but this is not the Title of these Books, particularly of that of Caviceus, concerning which I shall observe, by the way, that the Edition printed at Venice in 8vo, 1526, February the fifth, by Nicolo Zoppino, is neither the first, nor the last, for the Title says correcto & novamente stampato & bistoriato; and the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library mentions another of the Year 1547, likewise in 8vo, and printed also at Venice. George Anselme, who wrote the Life of the Author in Italian, and joined it to Caviceus's Romance, says, he was born on the first of May 1443, and died aged sixty eight Years, one Month, and two Days, not long after the publication of his Book, which consequently must have been first published about the Year 1510. He had put out some other Works: and some of his pieces, partly finished, and partly only begun, fell into the Hands of his Heirs. It is not known what they have done with them. I had almost forgotten to observe, that our Author was a Priest, and that, among other slips of his Youth, he got a Nun with Child, and was even guilty of Murder, which obliged him, after having broke out of the Bishop's Prison, where he was detained, to turn Pirate, and to rove for three Years, sometimes in the Channel, and sometimes in the Archipelago; but that, upon his return, the Disorders of his Youth being either forgotten or pardoned, he reformed his Conduct, and gave such great proofs of an excellent Genius, that, upon these two Accounts, his Historian freely forgives him his former Course of Life. REM. CRIT.]

CANINIUS (ANGELUS), was one of the most learned Grammarians in the XVIth Century. He was born in a small Town of Tuscany, called in Latin Anglara [A], and in Italian Angbiari; which is the reason of the Epithet Anglarensis being added to his Name, in the Title-Page of his Works. Thuanus places his Death in the Year 1557 (a) [B], and affirms, that he was well skilled in the Greek and Oriental Languages; that he taught them at Venice, Padua, Bologna, Rome, and in Spain; that he was Tutor to Andrew Dudithius [C], and taught at Paris; and

(a) Thuan. Histor. lib. xix, p. 346.

[A] He was born in a small Town in Tuscany, called in Latin Anglara. Thuanus did not know that this Town was in Tuscany; he has confounded it with one in the Milanese, called in Latin Anglaria or Anglaria; for having observed, that Magius was born at Anglaria, a Town in the Dutchy of Milan, he adds, that the same Place had before given Birth to Angelus Caninius (1). Others (2), by a like Mistake, have affirmed, that Caninius, Magius, and Peter Martyr, Counsellor to Ferdinand and Isabella, were born at Anglaria, a Town of the Insularians, that is, in the Milanese. This is only true as to Peter Martyr. We have shown, in its proper Place, that Magius was of Anglara in Tuscany; now Magius tells us, that Caninius was his Countryman (3): Caninius therefore could not be a Milanese, as Dom Lancelot affirms in his Preface to the Metode Greque. Nicolas Antonio, having firnamed him Anglarensis, explains it thus, 'Oppidum Mediolanensis Ducatus Anghiera est, ad oram lacus Verbanii five majoris (4). — Anglara is a Town in the Dutchy of Milan, at the Mouth of the Lake Maggior.'

[B] Thuanus places his Death in the Year 1557. He placed it in the Year 1554, in the first Editions. See the last Page of the first Tome of the Paris Edition in 8vo, 1604: There you will find how it happened that Mr Baillet, who made use of this Edition in 8vo, has said, in speaking of Caninius, that he died in 1557, or rather in 1554 (5). We shall see, in the Remark [F], a Citation, which shews that Thuanus knew very little of this great Grammarian.

[C] He affirms, he was Tutor to Andrew Dudithius. Du Ryer has very ill translated these Words of Thuanus: Demum Andrea Dudithii Pannonii adolescentia adnotus Lutetia Parisiorum docuit, which he thus renders: After he had been sent for to Andrew Dudithius in Hungary — he taught at Paris (6). This Translation falsely ascribes to Caninius a Journey into Hungary, and makes Thuanus contradict himself; for in another Place he says, Dudithius studied under Caninius at Paris, after his Voyage into England, and before his Return to Hungary. 'Demum ex Anglia Lutetiam venit, & illic sub optimo Doctore Angelo Caninio Anglarensi non solum Græcæ Linguae, & Hebraicæ, sed etiam Orientalium peritissimo, denuo intermissis per illas peregrinationes studiis operam dedit (7).' Which is thus translated: From England he went to Paris, where he renewed his Studies, which his Travels had interrupted, under Angelo Canimo, that excellent Man, so well skilled in the Greek, Hebrew, and Oriental Languages (8). This false printing of Canimo instead of Caninio, may one Day chance to enlarge the Catalogue of learned Men, and present us with one Angelus Canimus different from Angelus Caninius, but, like him, well skilled in the Languages. I make no question but that Caninius was Professor at Paris, whilst Dudithius studied there: And therefore I cannot think that these Words of Thuanus, Andrea Dudithii Pannonii adolescentia adnotus Lutetia Parisiorum docuit, — being made Tutor to Andrew Dudithius, the young Hungarian, he taught at Paris, are so true historically, as they are good grammatically; for it is not at all probable that Caninius and that at last, being received into the Family of William Duprat, Bishop of Clermont (b) [D], he died in Auvergne [E]. There are some who say, that he was Professor in the University of Paris, residing there in the College of Cambray, and that his Book of the Greek Language may be pronounced one of the most learned Performances we have on that Subject (c). The Character, Scaliger has given of him, appears at first very much in his Favour, but amounts to very little in the Conclusion. He allows him to be a very learned young Man [F], who had composed a valuable Discourse on the Greek Language, but that he had borrowed the best part of it from Vergara, and others, and had also added something of his own (d). Mr le Fèvre of Saumur, who prefers Caninius to all other Greek Grammarians, absolutely rejects this Accusation. He says this Work deserves to be called the Treasure of the Greek Language, and that it was printed at Paris, in the Year 1555, in Quarto (e). Several other learned Men have given as great a Character of Caninius's Greek Grammar [G]. His other Works are not very numerous [H]. It is very probable that Jerom Caninius of Angiari, who translated Tacitus into Italian, and printed it at Venice, with Alamos's Aphorisms (f), in 1620, was of the same Family.

was at one and the same time Professor in the University at Paris, and Tutor to this young Hungarian Traveller. And yet that he was the latter, is implied by these Words, Andreae Dudithii adolescentie adnotus. But I do not believe he had any other hand in teaching Dudithius, than only by his public and private Lectures as Professor; which is far different from being said to be a young Gentleman's Tutor, and in Latin alicujus adolescentie adnotari. Moreri has translated this Passage of Thuanus a little better than Teissier; for he does not send Caninius into Hungary, but is content with sending him to Dudithius the Hungarian. However here is a very great Mistake; for to affirm with Thuanus, in Moreri's Dictionary, that Caninius, after becoming Tutor to Dudithius the Hungarian, taught at Paris, is to suppose, that he was Tutor to this young Hungarian before he was Professor at Paris; whereas he should have said, that this young Hungarian coming to Paris, and there meeting with that excellent Master Caninius, studied under him.

[D] — received into the Family of William Duprat, Bishop of Clermont.] The Words of Thuanus are not particular enough; therefore I think it proper to observe, that Caninius, in his Dedication of a Book to this William Duprat, in 1553 (g), informs us, that he was then at Paris, in the Italian College. He says, that, returning from Spain into France with a Monk, whose Name was Simon Guichard, they both stopped in the Diocese of Clermont, and that he received a great many Favours from the Bishop, to whom he dedicates that Work; that, going to Paris, he fell sick by the way, and had almost spent all his Money; that at last he came to Paris, where he knew no body, but that the Recommendatory Letters from that Prelate procured him Lodgings and other Necessaries. We find by this, that he was under the liberal Protection of this Prelate before he taught at Paris, and we may judge pretty nearly at what time he began to teach there. He dates the Epistle Dedicatory to his Hellenismus from the College of Cambray in Paris, the Twenty ninth of August, 1555. I would not say, that Thuanus is mistaken; but it is not improbable, that Caninius left his public Lectures, to retire to the Bishop of Clermont, and there ended his Life.

[E] He died in Auvergne.] Others say he died at Seville in Spain. It is upon this Foot Don Nicholas Antonio speaks of him (10); for he has given us a Catalogue of all foreign Authors, who resided a long time in Spain, or died there. He quotes Francis Forerius the Jacobin, who confesses, in the Preface to his Commentaries upon Isaiab, that he was Caninius's Scholar. Antonio knew very little of Caninius; he ascribes to him no other Work but, Disquisitiones in locos aliquot Novi Testamenti obscuriores ex Hebraica & Ethiopica linguarum Originibus, which, says he, was printed at Antwerp with the Quinquagena of Antonius Nebrissenfis.

[F] Scaliger — allows him to be a very learned young Man.] This Expression at first seems very surprising, when we consider that Scaliger uses it a long time after Caninius's Death, and that Thuanus does not speak of him as of one who died young: For he makes him travel a long time through Italy and Spain, teaching the Oriental Languages (11), before his settling at Paris. But it appears from another Passage in the Scaligerana, that, according to Scaliger, he died when he was but Thirty six Years old (12). I do not very much rely on this, because Scaliger said just before, that Clenard died at the Age of Thirty two, which is utterly false (13). I have not yet been able to find how long Caninius lived: it is not easy to clear his History. Thuanus, who found the Difficulty of it, had recourse to Scaliger. *In compiling my History, says he (14), I mention, with great Pleasure, Men, who have been famous for their Learning, under the Year of their Deaths: among these I was very unwilling to omit Angelus Caninius, whose Name I think worth recording; but I meet with no body who can give me any Account of him. In the first place, his Country seems uncertain. He called himself Anglarenfis; I cannot tell whether that was from some Place upon the Lake of Como (15), or elsewhere. He was still living in France in 1553; and had spent his whole Life, residing sometimes in Spain, and sometimes in France. If you know any thing of him, or of the Year he died in, I beg your Information.

[G] The Learned have given a great Character of Caninius's Greek Grammar.] These are the Words of a German Writer: *In Grammatica Græca quicquid vetustissimi Scriptores de Græcæ lingue ratione præcipiunt, atque adeo omnia quæ ad dialectos intelligendas, & Poetas penitus cognoscendos pertinent facili methodo exponuntur (16). — His Greek Grammar explains, in a very easy manner, all the Rules laid down by the ancient Writers concerning the Greek Language, and consequently every Thing necessary to understand the Dialects, and Poetical Licences.

[H] His other Works are not very numerous.] There is a Latin Translation of his of Simplicius's Commentary upon Epicetus, printed at Venice in 1546, in Folio, *Et Institutiones Lingue Syriacæ, Assyriacæ, atque Thalmudicæ, una cum Ethiopicæ atque Arabicæ collatione, quibus addita est ad calcem Novi Testamenti multorum locorum Historica Enarratio, Parisiis apud Carol. CAPET (HUGH), King of France, the first of the third Race. Many things might be said upon this Subject; but I shall content myself with observing, that the Poet Dante published a ridiculous Falsehood, in saying that the Father of Hugh Capet was a Butcher [A]. Francis I. is said to have fallen into a violent Passion, when he understood that Dante had expressed himself in that manner [B].

[A] The Poet Dante published a ridiculous Falsehood, in saying that the Father of Hugh Capet was a Butcher. The refuting this Man would only be trespassing on the Reader's Time and Patience. It is sufficient to relate the usual Conjecture of Authors, who have mentioned this Matter; which is, that Dante published this Imposture on purpose to revenge himself for the Treatment he had received from Charles de Valois, who was descended from Hugh Capet. Pope Boniface the VIIIth, being solicited by one of the Parties which divided the Commonwealth of Florence, prevailed with Charles de Valois, Brother to Philip the Fair of France, to go and compose the Confusions of that City. The Party, Dante had embraced, was, at that time, the weakest: He, with several others, was banished Florence, and his Estate confiscated. He revenged himself the best way he could, with his Pen, in defaming the Kings of France, who had favoured the contrary Faction, and, among other things, he attacked them on the Subject of their Extraction. He makes Hugh Capet confess that his Father was a Butcher, figliuol fui d'un Beccaiu di Parigi (1), and own himself the Root of a Plant which had done much Mischief to Christendom.

(1) In his Purgatory, Canto 20, pag. 282.

I fui radice de la mala pianta,
Che la terra Christiana tutta aduggia,
Si che buon frutto rado se ne schianta (2).

(2) Ibid.

These wicked Stems proceed from me their Root,
Which over Christendom redundant shoot,
And every where produce their deadly Fruit.

A Canon of Paris, called Balthezar Grangier, dedicating his French Translation of Dante's Hell, Paradise, and Purgatory, to Henry the IVth, tells that Prince, that the Word Butcher ought not to be taken in a literal Sense; 'For Dante, who during his Exile resided a long time in Paris, could not be ignorant of our manner of speaking. When a Prince is a little more rigorous than ordinary in executing Justice upon Malefactors, we say he has made une grande boucherie. — A great piece of Butchery; and to our Poet calls Hugh the Great, Earl of Paris, Father of the forefaid Hugh Capet, the great Justiciary of his Time upon all Gentlemen, Criminals, and Rebels, the Butcher of Paris, as I prove more fully in the Annotations, and as some of our Chronologers, quoting this Passage, have rightly observed.' This Explication is altogether as ridiculous as Dante's Fiction. Without doubt, he took the Word Butcher literally. I am not certain whether any Lampooner led him the way, or he himself was the first Author of this silly Story; however, it is certain several have propagated it: So true is it that there is no Falsehood, how absurd soever, but will be handed down from Book to Book, and from Age to Age. 'Lie boldly, print all the Extravagances you can think of, may one say to the paltriest News-writer in Europe, and you will find Fools enough to copy from you: And if you are discountenanced at one time, Conjectures will happen, when some will find an Interest in reviving your Credit (3).' Papyrus Maso has a Passage in his Annals, which proves that other Authors were of the same Opinion with Dante. 'Itali quidam Hugonem humili genere natum scribere, seu ignorantia, seu odio. Dantes poeta illum Parisiensis Beccai filium fuisse canit, quæ vox lanium sonat. Is Florentia à Carolo Valefio pulsus Philippum pulchrum & Francos oderat, ut recte in mentem venerit Volaterrano, Dantis opinionem refellere, etsi Ricordanus & Villaneus in Hetruscis Annalibus id quoque à Pluribus literis mandatum affirmant (4). — Some Italian Writers have affirmed, either ignorantly or maliciously, that Hugh was meanly born. Dante the Poet calls him the Son of a Butcher in Paris. But this Author, as Volaterranus rightly observes, in refuting this Opinion of his,

had been expelled Florence by Charles de Valois, and so was bigbly incensed against Philip the Fair and the French. Although Ricordanus and Villani in their Annals of Tuscany affirm, that the same thing has been published by a great many others. See the following Remark.

[B] Francis the first is said to have fallen into a violent Passion, when he understood Dante had expressed himself in that manner. This Passage in Dante being read and explained to Francis the First of that Name, by Lewis Alleman, an Italian, he was so provoked at the Imposture, that he commanded the Book to be taken away, and was even thinking of prohibiting the reading it throughout his Dominions. Pasquier, after having said this, advances a Conjecture as insignificant as that before recited. 'To excuse this Author, says he (5), I would say, that, by the Word Butcher, he would be understood, that Capet's Father was a very valiant Soldier. — In the same manner I have read that Oliver de Clisson was called Butcher, by the French, because he gave no Quarter to any of the English, but put every Man of them to the Sword.' He adds, that the Protestants called Francis de Lorraine, Duke of Guise, a Butcher. If Pasquier had considered what followed, and preceded, this Passage of Dante, he would never have imagined, that this Poet intended to say Capet was the Son of a great and valiant Soldier; for this could never be thought a Reflexion, as it is plain Dante intended it, on Hugh Capet. Upon some Occasions a simple Narration would be sufficient. If Pasquier had been content to say, that Francis the First was angry at Dante, and that this Poet's whimsical Abuse, though he writ it by the way, as minding something else, served for a Foundation to other Authors, he had been justly commended. He quotes Francis de Villon, 'more conversant in Taverns and tippling Houles than in good Books (6), who has said in some part of his Works,

Si feusse des hoirs de Capet

Qui fut extrait de boucherie.

If I was the great Capet's Heir,
Who had a Butcher for his Sire.

He adds, that Agrippa — upon this fundamental Mistake, has declaimed very impudently against our Capet's Genealogy (7). And yet, how unreasonable soever Pasquier's Conjecture may appear, it has been espoused by Mr Bullart. Stephen Pasquier, said he (8), 'having fixed a juster Sense and more reasonable Explication on this grand Poet's Expression, is of Opinion that he used the Word metaphorically, and that by the Word Butcher he meant that Capet was the Son of a famous Warrior. Mr Bullart says just before, that Francis the First was displeased with Dante to that Degree, that he commanded the Book to be taken away from him, and was thinking to prohibit it in his Kingdom. I know a Person, who affirms, that this is misunderstanding Pasquier's French: For, says he, that Author means by those Words, that Francis the First gave order to have this Passage concerning Hugh Capet struck out of Dante's Book. It is very strange Francis the First should order a Book he did not like to be taken away from him. Why did he not throw it away? He must have been more effeminate than a Sybarite (9), to have charged another Person with the easing him of such a Burthen as this: he might as well have commanded one to beat a Flie from his Face which had stung him, and to put the Meat into his Mouth at his Meals, to save the Trouble of using his own Hands. But, with Submission to this Gentleman, the Bluntness, Bravery, and martial Spirit of That Prince, might very well move him to command another to remove out of his Sight a Book which offended him. Nor was it himself who held the Book, but, in all probability, an Italian Master, who was reading it. The Truth of the matter is, that he had ordered this Poet to be read to him by an ingenious Italian Refugee (10). This clears up the whole Difficulty.

CAPYCIUS (SCIPIO), in Italian Capece, descended from an ancient Family in Naples (a), rendered himself famous in the XVIth Century by his Writings [A]. He was very much esteemed by Isabella Villamarini, Princess of Salerno, on whom he bestowed great Commendations [B]: The chief of his Poems is that wherein he philosophizes on the Principles of Nature; it was printed at Venice, with another Poem of the same Author, upon St John Baptist, by Paulus Manutius, in the Year 1546 (b). Gyraldus has been very much blamed for mentioning Capycius as an indifferent Poet [C].

[A] He rendered himself famous by his Writings. They chiefly consisted of Poetry. The following was in Prose: Magistratum regni Neapolitani cum Romanorum Magistratibus comparatio. Of four Elogies he published, the first was addressed to Cardinal Antony Perrenot, Vice-Roy of Naples; the second to Cardinal Sacripante; the third to John Baptista Castaldi, Marquis of Cassano; the fourth had for its Subject the Misfortunes of the Author, and those of the Age he lived in (1). Some of his Epigrams are of his own Invention; others are Imitations of the Antologia. His Poem upon the Life of JESUS CHRIST was never printed, which was owing to the Negligence of a Friend, who had the Manuscript after the Author's Death, and did not care to publish it (2). You will find in the following Remark what relates to his two best Poems.

[B] He was very much esteemed by Isabella Villamarini, --- on whom he bestowed great Commendations. Paulus Manutius is my Author for this, who says, that this Lady, having preferred the Study of Letters to all other Pursuits, surpassed her Sex as much in Learning as she did in Birth and Beauty, and that, for this Reason, several Poets, and Capycius in particular, had made choice of her for the principal Subject of their Elogies. And it is upon this Account Manutius believed, that, in dedicating Capycius's Poems to her, he should make her a very acceptable Present, and thereby procure her Esteem. His Latin is fine enough to deserve a Quotation in this Place. 'Effecisti studio tu quidem, sed ingenio magis, ut cum esset omnium nobilissima, omniumque pulcherrima (quorum alterum majorem tuorum, maximeque Viri tui, Principis omni laude cumulat, magnis rebus testata virtus, alterum benignissima tibi natura dedit) eadem & sis, & habeas omium doctissima. Hinc illa ad te commendam singularis omnium propensio, hinc multorum Poetarum, quibus gravissima Regum bella magni operis argumentum suppeditare poterant, ad te canendum traducta ingenia: Hinc Capycius ille tuus, tuarum laudum laudatissimus Praeco, qui te admiratur unam, qui observat, qui cum de te multa, & vera praedicavit, ita concludit, unam habere quae notabilia sint omnia. --- Hoc opus, & quia scriptum est a tui studiosissimo, & quia veribus te dignis, id est, luculentissimis, non hercle dubito, quin a me missum avidè accipias, sic inquam, ut de isto me munere ames plurimum' (3). --- Such are the Effects of your Studies, or rather of your Genius, that you, who are the most noble, and most beautiful (the first of which is owing to the great Virtue and heroic Achievements of your Ancestors, and particularly of the Prince your Consort, who has received the highest commendations, the last is the gift of indulgent Nature) are also become the most learned of your Sex. Hence it is that you are so particularly adored by all the World; Hence it is that so many Poets neglected the great Theme of the Wars of Kings, and chose to sing your Praises: Hence it is that your Capycius, the celebrated Publisher of your Excellencies, who admires and adores you only, and who, after having truly said a great many fine Things of you, thus concludes, that in you only appears every valuable Qualification. --- I make no doubt but my presenting this Work to you, whose Author was the greatest Admirer of you, and whose Verses are very worthy of you, will be extremely agreeable, and intitle me to your Esteem. This we find at the Head of the Poem de Principiis Rerum, printed at Venice in 1546, with another Poem under the Title De Vate maximo libri tres (4), and which had been printed before; for Gesner mentions it in a Book he published in 1545. Scipionis Cypicii Viri doctissimi de Vate maximo libri tres erudito carmine conscripti, quod cum veterum etiam Majestate conferri queat, ut habet inscriptio. Joan. Oporinus excudit nuper (5). Basilæ cum aliis quibusdam Christianis Poematibus (6). Nicodemo therefore is mistaken, when he says in regard to these two Poems, that this Edition of Manutius was the first (7); which holds true only in that De Rerum Principiis. He finds fault with Father Oldoini, for saying that Cardinal Pompey Colonna (8) had highly commended Isabella Filomarini, the Prince of Salerno's Wife. His Reason is, because that Prince's Wife was called Isabella Villamarini. That is the Name Manutius has given her. Niphus has also mentioned her under the same Name, upon an Occasion well worth the Reader's Knowledge. He says this Lady loved her Husband so tenderly, that she had a mind to accompany him to the Army, but could not obtain his Permission. Finding her self therefore separated from her dear Lord, she spent her Days in Sorrow, but her Nights in Pleasure; for her Dreams represented him as present to her, for which Reason she wished the Sun might never rise again. This will read better in the Original. 'Id quod in Isabella Villamarina Salerni Principe, quæ flos redolentissimus nostri ævi est puellarum, corporisque & animi formæ singulare exemplum, est videre. Hæc cum Ferrandum Sanseverinum conjugem flagrantissimè deperiret, unaque in militiam proficisci arderet, quia ab eo ob pericula & labores fuit denegatum, nullam testatur Heroïnæ religiosissimæ, aut raram esse noctem, qua cum dulcissimo viro in somnis non conjunctissimè vivat, fabuletur ac delictetur, ut omnibus votis exoptaret perpetuas esse noctes, (cum illum totos dies suspiret) & in Epimenidem transformari, quæ de Alceste & Laodamia fabulata est ventus (9). The Book, from whence this Passage is taken, was finished November the third, 1529. This, without doubt, was the Lady so much praised by Cardinal Colonna, and therefore Father Oldoini was only mistaken in that he took Filomarini and Villamarini to be at the bottom the same thing. Jerom Ruscelli, who has praised this Princess very much, calls her Isabella Villamarina. Here is a part of his Elogy. She possesses, says he, so many more than humane Beauties both of Body and Mind, that, if Nature were to exert her utmost Efforts (10), she might perhaps form a Woman who might equal her, in the whole, or in some part, but she could not make one who would surpass her in the least. Sanseverino also calls her Isabella Villamarina (11).

As to the rest, Capycius makes the Air the Principle of all Things, and refutes the Atomists, and those who admit four Elements, as also those who hold, with Thales, that all Bodies proceed from Water, or with Heraclitus, that they proceed from Fire (12).

[C] Gyraldus has been very much blamed for mentioning him as an indifferent Poet. He deserves, said he, some Place among the Poets (13). Nicodemo thinks this too cold a Commendation (14), to which he opposes what Bembus and Manutius have wrote in Favour of Capycius, though he allows this to be in the other extreme (15). He quotes Gaddi who takes Gyraldus's Judgment to be too severe (16). See Mr Baillet in the third Tome of the Judgments on the Poets, numero 1277, and the two Letters (17) before Donatus's Virgil, published in 1535.

CAPILUPUS (CAMILLUS), a Native of Mantua, lived in the XVth Century. He composed a Book intituled The Stratagem (a), wherein he relates, not only what happened at Paris during St Bartholomew's Massacre, but also the artificial Preparations, which preceded that horrible Execution, and which, by a long Train of Intrigues, ensnared the Huguenots. This Work, published at Rome, in the Year 1572 (b), was soon after translated into French. It contains a great many Falsities (c). The Court of France ought not to have been pleased with it, because they endeavoured to make it believed that this Massacre was not premeditated (d). Capilupus is reckoned among the Latin Poets. He had two Brothers, one of which, named Hippolytus, was Bishop of Fano (e); the other, named Lelius, signalized himself by the Centos of Virgil. You will find this in Thuanus, quoted by Moreri. I shall also say something of this in the Remark [A]. Observe that Mr Moreri has very wrongly quoted the Twenty second Book of Thuanus, and Miræus, in regard to Camillus Capilupus.

[A] I shall say something of LELIUS CAPILUPUS in the Remark.] The Manner of his applying Virgil's Expressions, to represent things That Poet never dreamt of, can never be sufficiently admired. Thuanus (1), Possévin (2), Ghilini (3), and others, have happily observed his Address. He died at Mantua (4), January the third, 1560, aged sixty two Years and fifteen Days (5). The Cento he composed against the Monks is inimitable; it is to be met with at the end of Nægeorgus's Regnum Papisticum. It was omitted in the Edition of his Centos at Rome, in 1590. They had been prohibited, but were suffered to be printed after a Retrenchment of what they thought inconvenient (6). Julius CAPILUPUS, his Nephew, added to them several Centos of his own: He had a particular Talent this way, which excelled even that of his Uncle, if Possévin may be credited (7), who adds, that Julius Roscius Hortinus, having illustrated Ausonius's Rules by some Examples, added them to this Edition. Miræus (8), and Moreri after him, pretend that this Edition was procured by Roscius; but Possévin induces us to believe the contrary. I cannot tell whether Lelius Capilupus's Cento against the Female Sex be among them; it is a very ingenious Piece, but too satirical: It is inserted in the Collection intituled Baudii Amores, and printed at Leyden in 1638. Observe that Camillus, Hippolytus, Lelius, and Julius Capilupus, were not all Brethren, as some affirm (9). Their Latin Poems are to be met with in the Deliciae Poetarum Italorum. Mr Teissier says, that Hippolytus Capilupus excelled in Satiric Poetry (10); though others say that He, as well as Julius, and Camillus, excelled in the Elegiac. Alia atque alio carminum genere famam suam propagarunt, floridiores tamen elegiaci (11). These are Borrichius's Words: But he is chargeable with a considerable Omission; he knew not that Julius Capilupus had signalized himself by his Centos; he mentions only those of Lelius.

CAPISTRAN (JOHN), a Monk of the Order of St Francis (a), lived in the XVth Century. He was born in the Village of Capistran in Italy, in the Year 1385 (b). He gained a wonderful Reputation by his Zeal, Eloquence, and Manners. He was sent into Bohemia to undertake the Conversion of the Hussites [A], and preached up the Crusade against the Turks, in Germany, Hungary [B], and Poland (c). He so effectually seconded, with his Tongue, the Great Hunniades's Sword, that he had a great share in those Victories the Christians obtained against Mabomet, especially in that famous Battle of Belgrade, in the Year 1456. They were so evidently Partners in the Glory of those great Successes, that they were thought to entertain some sort of Jealousy of each other. For Capistran's Relation of this Victory at Belgrade made no mention of Hunniades; nor did Hunniades's Account say one Word of Capistran. Aeneas Sylvius's Conjecture, or Reflexions hereupon, are very judicious [C]. Capistran died soon after obtaining this Battle (d), and

[A] He was sent into Bohemia, to undertake the Conversion of the Hussites. He is said to have been successful in his Undertaking, and to have required of them, in order to 'justify the Sincerity of their Abjuration, and do penance for their Errors, to take up Arms against Mabomet. It is on this Occasion Chalcondylas', speaking of Capistran and of the Bohemians, affirms, from very bad authority, that these People worshipped the God Apollo, and that Capistran delivered them out of this Idolatry (1).
 [B] He preached up the Crusade against the Turks - in Hungary.] The French Author, I quoted in the preceding Note, observes, that 'Capistran being a Picentine born, his Italian had gained him the Admiration of his own Country, but was of no Service to him in Hungary, where he was not understood, inasmuch that he preached up the Crusade there with very little Success, not being able to lift under the Banner of the Cross above Five hundred Men (2).' For the same Reason, I think he must have been very unfit to preach in Germany, and Poland, and convert the Hussites. See the last Remark.
 [C] Aeneas Sylvius's Conjecture - - is very judicious.] He makes no doubt but that a secret Thirst of Glory obliged them to this Silence; and from thence observes that it is much easier for humane Nature to renounce Riches and Pleasures, than Praise and Honour. Each of them ascribed the Glory to God, and acknowledged him to be the Author of the Victory; but then each appropriated to himself the Glory of being God's Instrument. Ambition and Vanity does not hinder Men from allowing God to have been the Cause of all; they apprehend nothing from such a Rival: It is with other Men they avoid entering into Partnership, and decline all Competition. These are Aeneas Sylvius's Words, who was afterwards Pope under the Name of Pius II. 'Auctores victoriae tres Joannes habiti, legatus Cardinalis, cujus auspicio res gesta est, Huniades, & Capistranus, qui prælio interfuerunt. Verum neque Capistranus Huniades, neque idem Capistrani Huniades mentionem fecere in eis Literis, quas ambo obtenta victoria, sive ad Romanum Pontificem, sive ad amicos scribere; per suum quicumque ministerium Deum dedisse Christianis victoriam affirmavit. Avarissima honoris humana mens, facilius Regnum, & opes, quam gloriam parturit. Potuit Capistranus patrimonium contemnere, voluptates calcare, libidinem subigere, gloriam verò spernere non potuit, &c (3).' He says much the same thing in another Book. 'Huniades & Capistranus huic bello interfuerunt, uterque rem gestam scripsit, neque alterius mentionem fecit, alteruter solidam sibi rei gestæ laudem usurpavit. Ingens dulcedo gloriae, facilius contemnenda dicitur, quam costemnitur. Spreverat Capistranus seculi pompas, fugerat delicias, calcaverat avaritiam, libidinem subegerat; contemnere gloriam non potuit. Qui and was buried at Willak, in Hungary. It is reported that there were a great many Miracles wrought at his Tomb, and that he for a time suspended the Miracles wrought by a Lay-Brother (e). He was canonized by Pope Alexander VIII. in the Month of October, 1690. He had been already beatified by Gregory XV. He is the Author of some Books [D]. They relate very surprizing Effects of his Eloquence [E]. His Body, about an Hundred Years after, when the Turks became Masters of Sirmischo, was removed into another Monastery; but it was torn to pieces by the Protestants, and thrown into a Well, upon their sacking that Monastery (f).

Nemo est tam sanctus, qui dulcedine gloriæ non capiatur. Facilius Regna Viri excellentes, quam gloriam contemnant, &c. (4). Mr Guillet is to be praised for the Pains he has been at to excuse these two great Men; but we are not obliged to think his Justification effectual. Some, says he (5), have attributed this mutual Silence to a secret Jealousy of each other; which made them say of Capistran, that of all worldly Vanities, the desire of Praise was the only one he had not subdued: Though in Justification of these great Men, it may be alledged, that they were both willing to ascribe the Triumph to God alone, without furnishing each other with a Subject for Vanity, so contrary to the Modesty and Humility of a Christian. This is ascribing to them a very preposterous Charity: Each owned himself to be God's Instrument (6); and consequently made no Scruple of furnishing himself with a Subject for Vanity; or rather chose to expose himself to a Crime than his Friend, or lastly distrustful his Friend's Modesty, but not his own: and that very thing would be an Act of Vanity. They who would apologize for these two great Men's reciprocal Silence, by saying one was not the other's Historiographer, and that each was content to relate what he himself had executed (7), make use of a very weak Argument. If the Marshals de Brezé and Chatillon had sent Lewis the XIIIth an Account of the Battle of Avon, in which neither had made the least mention of the other, might not one safely affirm Jealousy was the Cause of this Silence?

[D] He is Author of some Books. Of a Speculum Clericorum; of a Treatise de Potestate Papæ & Concilii; of a Book de Pænis Inferni & Purgatorii; of another against the Hussites, and in particular against John de Roquesane, their Bishop (8), &c.

[E] They relate surprizing Effects of his Eloquence. He went to Nuremberg, in 1452, and was received in great Pomp by the whole Clergy. He had a Pulpit erected in the middle of an open Place, where he preached against Vice, for some Days, with so much Eloquence, that he obliged the Inhabitants to throw their Cards and Dice on a Heap, and set fire to them (9), and afterwards exhorted them to the War against the Turks. The Year following he went to Breslau in Silesia, where he afterwards inveighed vehemently against all Instruments for Gaming, and ordered them to be brought to him and burnt. The Power of his Eloquence was not confined to these remarkable Executions upon inanimate Subjects; the Jews felt the Effects of it in a terrible manner, of whom he caused a great number to be burnt in Silesia, under pretence that they had been guilty of Irreverence towards the consecrated Bread. He used to preach two Hours in Latin; after which, another was two Hours explaining this Latin Sermon in the vulgar Tongue (10).

You will find some Particulars in the following Latin Passage: 'Johannes Capistranus in Germaniam descendit prædicans magno zelo verbum Dei, in Austria, Bavaria, Suevia, Thuringia, & Saxonia. Nam in Civitate Magdeburgensi, in novo foro, maxima ad illum confluentem multitudine, cum esset Germanicæ Linguae non ignarus, Latino sermone prædicabat Latinis in tertiam horam, populo solis gestibus ejus, quos ante non viderat, satis vehementer permotus. Aderat ex Germanis sui ordinis Fratribus vir æque doctus, qui post illum non minore tempore dicens interpretabatur populo, quæ ille dixisset: moti sunt omnes, & usque adeo permoti, ut feminæ abusum in ornatu, viri ludos, quibus tempora perdunt, Sccorum alearumque, in unum contulerint, & in eodem loco igne subito concremarent. Fertur idem aliquot sanitatis signa fecisse, ut vulgo est creditum. Sed est in ea re sæpe loquacior fama. Hoc constat virum fuisse incredibilis in vita & moribus austeritatis & sanctitatis. Sed est spiritus ille torrens, quo tum commotus populus illa quæ diximus fecit, ut non diu perseveraret. Facile redit res in abusum, ut est hodie cernere per omnes terras & urbes (11). — John Capistran went into Germany, preaching the Word of GOD with great Zeal in Austria, Bavaria, Schwaben, Düringen, and Saxony. For in the City of Magdeburg, a great Multitude resorting to him in the new Market-place; although he was not ignorant of the German Language, he preached to the learned Part of his Audience in Latin for above two Hours, the People in the mean time being extremely moved at the sole sight of his Gestures, which were intirely new to them. There was present a German of the same Order and Fraternity, and equally learned, who, speaking after him, in the same length of time interpreted to the People what he had been saying. So great an Impression was made upon all, that the Women brought their superfluous Ornaments, and the Men their gaming Tables and Dice, which wasted so much of their Time, and piled them up together in the same place and burnt them. He is also reported to have performed some miraculous Cures, which are commonly credited. But in these, Fame often speaks too largely. It is certain he was a Man of incredible Sanctity and Austerity in his Life and Manners. But that Spirit, which then moved the People to do all these Things, like a Torrent was but of short Continuance. Things of this Nature easily return to their former Abuse, as may every Day be seen in all Cities and Countries. You will observe, I. That, according to this Author's Account, it was not at Nuremberg but at Magdeburg, that Capistran's Eloquence made the People reform. II. That this Reformation did not last long. III. That common Report is not much to be trusted in respect to Capistran's Miracles. IV. That as to the Austerity of his Life, there is no room to doubt, that being unquestionable. He had no occasion to fear those jests which are applicable to fat and overgrown Pastors, who preach up Fasting and Mortification; for he was a little Man, so lean and meagre that he was nothing but Skin and Bones. Hertmannus Scheydel, who had seen him, says thus of him (12): 'Capistranum pusillum corpore Nurembergæ vidi, ætate senecta, annos quinque & sexaginta natum, siccum, aridum, exhaustum, sola cute nervisque & ossibus compactum: lætum tamen & in laborem fortem sine intermissione singulis diebus prædicantem, altas ac profundas materias absolventem.'

I must not forget to tell you, that his Prayers were as efficacious as his Sermons. These were so prevalent as to interrupt the Miracles which were done at the Tomb of one Thomas of Florence (13), who had been a Lay-brother in a Monastery of Franciscans. There was reason to fear, that, whilst they were endeavouring to get St. Bernardin canonized, the Miracles of this Lay-brother might retard the Affair. For this reason Capistran addressed a very fervent Prayer to him, to obtain that Interruption. He was heard: Thomas of Florence, that he might not divert the Design, or give occasion to any Accidents or Obstacles, suspended his miraculous Virtue, and did not renew it till after the Canonization of St. Bernardin. Spondanus relates this Matter thus: 'Memoria dignum est, says he (14), quod Chronicon refert Minorum, cum eo tempore quo de Canonizatione Bernardi ageretur, Reate defunctus quidam Thomas Florentinus ejusdem ordinis Laicus, miracu-

This is not the only Proof that can be produced of the Respect which the Saints have for one another: We may venture to say, that St Germain had a Complaisance for St Martin, which has all the Air of human Politeness. 'St Martin's Relics, being carried all over France, were brought to Auxerre, and deposited in the Church of St Germain, where they wrought a great many Miracles. The Religious of Auxerre, looking on St Germain to be as great a Saint as St Martin, demanded one half of the Offerings, which were very confiderable: but St Martin's Priests pretended, that he alone performing all the Miracles which they saw, all the Alms belonged to him alone. To justify the Truth of what they had advanced, they desired that a sick Body might be placed between the Shrines of St Martin and St Germain, and then they should see which of the two did the Miracle. They made tryal on a Leper, who was healed on that side which was next to St Martin, but not on that next to St Germain; after which the side, which still remained unaffected, being turned next to St Martin, was also healed. This was not, says Cardinal Baronius, because St Germain was not as great a Saint as St Martin, or could not work as many Miracles; but, because St Martin had done him the Favour of a Visit, he suspended the Power he had with GOD, in order the better to receive his Guest (15).'

CAPISUCCHI, a Family in Rome, which has produced, within these latter Centuries, several Persons of Worth, as will be seen in the following Articles, and as appears more fully demonstrated in the History of this Family, published by Vincent Armannus; and in the Genealogy of it, composed by Ugbeili. See also Father Tarquin Gallucci, in his first Book de Bello Belgico.

CAPISUCCHI (BLASIUS), Marquis of Monterio, General of the Pope's Forces at Avignon, towards the end of the XVIth Century, rendered himself famous by his Courage and Knowledge in the Art of War. He performed a very remarkable Action, during the Siege of Poitiers, in 1569 [A]. Pope Pius V has expressly mentioned it in a Bull (a). Others speak of it a little too rhetorically [B]. This Roman Gentleman then served in a Company of Arquebusers, under Paul Sforza, Brother to the Marquis de Santa-Fiore (b). After that he served in the Low-Countries, under the Duke of Parma (c), who sent him to the Relief of Cologne, in 1584, during the War with Gebhard Truchses, an Elector, who was a Protestant, and married. Capisucchi made a great Noise in that Country [C]. He was afterwards Lieutenant-General of the Duke of Florence's Forces, and commanded those of the Pope at Avignon, and in the Venaisin County (d). (1) Davila, lib. v.

[A] He performed a very remarkable Action during the Siege of Poitiers, in 1569. The Protestants were besieging Poitiers, and had already thrown a Bridge over the River in order to an Assault. Capisucchi, accompanied by two other expert Swimmers, threw himself into the River, and getting under the Bridge, cut in several places the Ties which joined the Pieces of it together (1). By this means the Bridge was immediately carried away with the Stream, to the great Advantage of the Besieged.

[B] Others speak of it a little too rhetorically. This Action is represented as much more glorious by Strada than by Davila. The last tells us, that, whilst Capisucchi and his Companions swam under the Bridge, in the Night-time, in order to disjoint it, several Alarms were given to the Enemy by a Sally under the Command of Ferraques, and a great Fire of the Artillery; by which means the Besiegers were so taken up, as not to observe the Ruin of their Bridge. They, who supplied Father Strada with his Memoirs, thought there was nothing extraordinary in such an Action as this: they esteemed it more proper to expose Capisucchi to a terrible Shower of Musket-shot, and to place him above Horatius Cocles, one of the three Heroes of ancient Rome, in the War with Porfenna. Let us hear this eloquent Historian: 'Ob iteratas Colonienfium ac Septemviri literas, addiderat Blasium Capisuccum, quem paulo ante sclopetariorum equitum, mox & lanceariorum turmae praefecerat, commendatum à famâ praeclari facinoris, quo in Pictaviensi obfidione, quum Hugoneti ad invadendam urbem fluminis pontem injecissent, ipse aquis immerfus crebra inter hostium missilia grandi cultro pontem intercidit, atque aditum subeuntibus interrupit. Veteris illius Romani patriâ non indignus, nisi quod ille post sectum aliorum opera pontem tum fluminis periculum subiit urbis suae ab hostibus jam securus; hic à discrimine in aquis exorsus suis pontem manibus perfregit, hostibus à patria submotis aliena, meritis ut facti memoriam Romanus Pontifex sanctioribus literis inferuerit (2).'

of Cologne, and of the Elector, he sent them Blasius Capisucchi, to whom he had a little before given the Command of a Troop of Horse-Musketeers, and since also of another of Pikemen, and who was famed for his heroic Exploit at the Siege of Poitiers, when he threw himself into the River, and, amidst the repeated Volleys of the Enemy, cut away the Bridge the Huguenots had laid over the River in order to assault the Town, and interrupted the Passage of those who were going over it. An Action which will make him worthy to be compared with his Countryman, that famous old Roman, with only this Difference, that Cocles did not plunge himself into the Waves, till the Bridge had been broke down behind him by others, and his own City secured from the Enemy; but Capisucchi braved the Danger of the Stream from the first, and broke away the Bridge with his own Hand, and all this to save a Place belonging to a foreign Nation; an Action which has had the Honour to be recorded in the Pope's Bulls. He quotes, in the Margin, a Bull of Pius V, dated May 10, 1567. He is mistaken in the Year, since the Siege did not happen till two Years after: But this is not his greatest Fault. He pretends the Bridge was broken in spite of the Assaults Fire, whilst they were upon it in order to throw themselves into the Town. This favours more of the Orator than of the Historian, since Davila affirms the contrary.

[C] The Duke of Parma sent him to the Relief of Cologne, ----- he made a great Noise in that Country. Blasius Capisucchi mandavit ut cum sua lanceariorum turma ----- per Agrippinensem Provinciam ac praecipue per Bonnenfem agrum infestis signis excurreret, ----- quod ille praevia sui famâ quae multa per eos Rheni tractus, strenue ac feliciter peregit, &c (3). ----- He commanded Blasius Capisucchi to commit Hostilities with his Troop of Pikemen through the Territories of Cologne, and especially through those of Bon, ----- which he bravely and successfully performed by the great Fame he had already acquired in that Country.'

[D] He had a Brother named Camillus.] This Camillus CAPISUCCHI, Marquis of Puy-Catin, was a famous Soldier in the XVIth Century. He gave a great many Proofs of his Valour in the Battle of Lepanto, which occasioned John of Austria to give him the Command of Four hundred Gentlemen on board his own Ship, in his Expedition to Tunis, two Years after (4). He signalized himself often in the Low-Country Wars, where the Duke of Parma made him Colonel of a Regiment of Foot, in 1584 (5). After several Campaigns under so great a Master, he was thought fit to command the Pope's Troops in Hungary, which he discharged with a great deal of Reputation. He died there in the beginning of Novem- ber, 1597, of a Sickness contracted by the great Fatigue he went through, to prevent the fatal Consequences apprehended from the breaking a Bridge built over the Danube. He was then in his sixtieth Year. He was a great Master in the Mathematics, and in Fortification, and writ a Book De Officio Præfetti Castrorum, which remains in the Closet of his Heirs. Several of his Letters, written to Cardinal Aldobrandini, Clement the VIIIth's Nephew, are deposited in the Archives of the Vatican. His Tomb and Epitaph are to be seen in the Church of the Holy Cross, at Vienna (6). His Exploits in France, under the Duke of Parma, are particularly described by William Dondini, the Jesuit, in the History of that Duke's Expeditions in order to succour the League.

CAPISUCCHI (JOHN ANTONY), Cardinal by the Title of St Pancrace, afterwards of the Holy Cross of Jerusalem, and last of all of St Clement; raised himself by degrees to the Purple. He was Canon of the Vatican, and afterwards Auditor of the Rota, under Pope Paul III. He was made Cardinal and Bishop of Lando by Paul IV, who likewise placed him on the Bench of the Inquisition. He was made Prefect of the Signature of Grace under Pius V, and Governor of Gualdo, with the Character of Apostolical Legat. He died the Twenty ninth of January, 1569, in his Fifty fourth Year. He published some Constitutions for his Diocese, and a Synod (a).

CAPISUCCHI (PAUL), rendered himself famous in the XVIth Century, by Employments and Negotiations. He was Canon of the Vatican, Referendary of both the Signatures, Auditor of the Rota, Bishop of Neocastro, Vicar-General to Clement VII, and Paul III, Prefect of the Signature of Grace, and Vice-Legat of Umbria. He composed the Disturbances which were raised in Perugia, and brought that City again under Obedience to the Pope. He was no less successful at Avignon, under the Pontificat of Paul III; for, by his Prudence and Authority, he dispersed the Faction which divided that State, and re-established universal Peace and Loyalty. He was made choice of by Clement VII, to examine into, and report, that nice Affair of Henry VIII's Divorce. He was then Dean of the Rota (a), and it appears by the Volume of his Decisions, that he was no Friend to the King of England's Design; for in two of his Decisions he makes it appear, that this Prince had incurred the Censures in divorcing Katherine of Arragon, and marrying another Woman in spite of the Prohibitions of the Holy See, and that Queen Katherine ought to be restored to her former Dignity. He published several very useful Constitutions relating to the Troubles of Perugia and Avignon, the Government wherein he was Vice-Legat, and the Clergy of his Diocese. He died at Rome in 1539, aged sixty Years, and was interred in the Vault belonging to his Family, by John Antony Capisucchi, his Nephew, Cardinal of St Pancrace, a Title already mentioned (b).

CAPISUCCHI (RAIMOND), raised to the Cardinalship by Innocent XI, the first of September, 1681, was Son of Paul Capisucchi, Marquis of Puy-Catin. He entered into the Order of the Dominicans at fourteen Years of Age. He taught Philosophy publicly at Rome. Innocent X made him Secretary to the Congregation of the Index, and afterwards made him Member of that for the Examination of Bishops. He made him Master of the Sacred Palace in 1654 (a). We have several of Raimond Capisucchi's Works [A].

The Office of Master of the Sacred Palace was taken from him by Alexander VII, as I have observed elsewhere (b), and it was thought this Disgrace would have drawn on other more troublesome Consequences; but this Storm blew over: The Pope was convinced of his Innocence (c), and offered him a Bishopric; but finding him resolved to prefer the private Life of a Monk to that of a Bishop, he gave him the second Degree of Honour and Authority among the Dominicans.

These are the Titles: Controversiæ Theologicæ, Scholasticæ, Morales, Dogmaticæ, Scripturales, ad mentem Divi Thomæ Aquinatis resolutæ; of which there is a second Edition revised and augmented by the Author. *Appendices ad controversias supradictas. Mandosius's Bibliotheca Romana, from whence this is taken, gives us a Catalogue of several Pieces of this Author which were ready for the Press. One of them is intitled, De Contritione & Attritione; another, De Opinione Probabili. It has been observed, that Father Capisucchi approved the Bishop of Condom's Exposition, though it contained several Opinions contrary to his own. CAPPADOCIA, a Country in Asia, bounded by Cilicia, Armenia, Colchis, the Euxine Sea, Paphlagonia, Galatia, &c. (a), was divided successively in different manners. Ariarathes, who was the first King of it [A], united the Cataonians with the Cappadocians. The Persians divided this Kingdom into two Satrapies. The Macedonians continued this Division [B], and, partly by Force, partly by Consent, permitted them to be converted into two Kingdoms, the one called simply Cappadocia, or Cappadocia the Great, the other Pontus, or the Pontic Cappadocia (b). Cappadocia the Great was divided into ten Provinces, and so it continued in Strabo's Time, and under the Reign of Archelaus, after whose Death it was reduced to a Roman Province (c). This Country abounded in Horses, Asses, and Mules (d); and it is said also, that the she Mules here were not barren (e). From hence were brought the Horses designed peculiarly for the Person of the Roman Emperors, the Consuls themselves being interdicted the use of them (f). It furnished also a great Number of Slaves [C], false Witnesses, and transparent Stones [D]; but that Cappadocia was one of those Parts of Asia, which neither Alexander nor his Successors had ever attacked (10). However it be, let us resume the Thread of Diodorus Siculus's Narration.

After Alexander's Death, his Successors would not suffer Cappadocia to be free from the Macedonian yoke. Perdiccas entered it with a great Army, and found Ariarathes disposed to defend himself at the Head of Thirty thousand Foot, and Fifteen thousand Horse. He gave Perdiccas Battle, lost it, was taken Prisoner, and crucified among several others; and Eumenes was constituted Governor of Cappadocia. We must here observe a Slip of Justin: He says, that this Victory of Perdiccas over Ariarathes, was of no advantage to the Conqueror, because the vanquished retired into the Town, put their Wives and Children to the Sword, set Fire to their Houses, and threw themselves into the midst of the Flames (11). He confounds Things. What he relates happened in Pisidia, at the Siege of Isaurus, after the Reduction of Cappadocia, upon the Defeat and Punishment of Ariarathes (12). We shall see below (13), that the Macedonian Government continued but a very little time in this Country.

[C] This Country — furnished — a great number of Slaves:] This appears from these words of Tully; Cappadocem modo abreptum de grege venaliū diceret (14); — You would have thought him a Cappadocian, just purchased out of a String of Slaves; and from this Passage in Persius,

Vende animam lucro, mercare, atque excute solers
Omne latus mundi, ne sit præstantior alter
Cappadoces rigida pingues plauisse catasta (15).

Go Miser, go; for Lucre sell thy Soul;
Truck Wares for Wares, and trudge from Pole to Pole:

That Men may say, when thou art dead and gone,
See what a vast Estate he left his Son!
How large a Family of brawny Knaves,
Well fed, and fat as Cappadocian Slaves.

We may add to this what Horace observes, that the King of Cappadocia, though destitute of Money, was rich in Slaves.

Mancipiis locuples eget æris Cappadocum Rex (16).

Mr Dacier observes, that, whilst Lucullus was in Cappadocia, an Ox was sold but — for six Pence, and a Man for Twenty four Pence (17). It is remarkable, that the Slaves of this Country, and of Cilicia and Crete, were esteemed very wicked, and gave occasion for the Proverb, Tria cappa pessima. See Famiarius Strada's Prologiones (18).

[D] — and of false Witnesses, and transparent Stones.] The Cappadocians are said from their Infancy to accustom themselves to suffer Torments, and that they tortured one another to harden themselves against those Punishments, to which their false Testimonies might one Day expose them, and to set a greater Price upon their Perjuries, in Proportion to the Hardness they had acquired. This is my Construction of these words of Persius's Scholiast: 'Vel quia Cappadoces dicerentur habere studium naturale ad falsa testimonia proferenda: qui nutriti in but was very bare of Money [E]: The Bread of this Country was excellent (g), and the Bakers the best in the World (b). The Romans, on granting their Friendship to the Kings of Cappadocia, comprehended also the Inhabitants [F]; I mean, they received into their Alliance, King and People jointly. They did not use the same Method with the Kings of other Nations; for they declared them their Friends, without making any mention of the People (i). This might make it believed that the Cappadocians lived under a Government partly Monarchical, and partly Aristocratical; but I cannot easily come into that Opinion. This is certain, that they could not be without a King [G]. They had a great Number of in tormentis a pueritia equuleum sibi facere dicuntur, ut in eo se invicem torqueant, & cum in pœna perdurant ad falsa testimonia se bene venundarent (19). These People outdid the very Grecians, though they had carried this Vice to a very great excess, if we may believe Tully, who attributes to them the occasion of this Expression, Lend me your Evidence, and I will return it you. He has so elegantly expressed the wicked Dispositions of the Grecian Witnesses, that I cannot forbear reciting here his beautiful Description. Hoc dico de toto genere Græcorum: tribuo illis literas, do multarum artium disciplinam, non adimo sermonis leporem, ingeniorum acumen, dicendi copiam; denique etiam, siqua sibi alia sumunt non repugno. Testimoniorum religionem, & fidem, nunquam ista natio coluit: totiusque huius rei quæ sit vis, quæ autoritas, quod pondus ignorant. Unde illud est, Da mihi testimonium mutuum. Num Gallorum, num Hispanorum putatur? totum istud Græcorum est: ut etiam qui Græce nesciunt, hoc quibus verbis a Græcis dici soleat, fiant. Itaque videte quo vultu, qua confidentia dicant: tum intelligetis qua religione dicant. Nunquam nobis ad rogatum respondent, semper accusatori plusquam ad rogatum: nunquam laborant, quemadmodum probent quod dicunt, sed quemadmodum se explacent dicendo. Græcus testis cum ea voluntate processit ut lædat: non jurisjurandi, sed lædendi verba meditatur. Vinci, refelli, coargui putat esse turpissimum, ad id se parat, nihil aliud curat. Itaque non optimus quisque nec gravissimus, sed impudentissimus, loquacissimusque deligitur (20). — I say this of the whole Grecian Nation: I allow them Learning, I grant them the Knowledge of many Arts, I do not deny their Eloquence, Wit, and Oratory: in short if they lay claim to any other Excellencies, I shall not oppose it. But they are a People who never regarded the Faith and Sacredness of Testimonies: they are ignorant of the great Importance of this Matter. Whence comes this Saying, Lend me your Testimony? Do we owe it to the Gauls, or to the Spaniards? It is intirely Greek, and so well known, that they who are ignorant of that Language, yet understand this Greek Expression. Observe, therefore, with what Face and Confidence they speak: and then you will understand with what Confidence they speak. They are always ready to answer more than the Prosecutor asks of them, and as backward in satisfying the Questions of the other side: they do not concern themselves so much how they may prove what they say, as how they may express what they are to say. — A Greek Witness undertakes to do an Injury: and therefore considers not how to swear true, but how to effect his injurious Purpose. To be defeated, confuted, and disproved, is with them esteemed the most ignominious: against this they guard themselves, and consider nothing farther. For this reason those of them are made choice of, not who are the best and most reputable, but who are most hardened and loquacious. This puts me in mind of a Story I have heard a hundred times, that there is a Province in France (21), where this is a usual Request among the Gentlemen, Pray lend me your Witnesses for a few Days; and where there are People, who, if you ask what Business they follow, will answer, Sir, I am a Witness at your Service.

As for the transparent Stones found in Cappadocia, I shall only quote Pliny. Hispaniam hunc (specularem lapidem) olim ceterior tantum dabat, nec tota, sed intra centum millia passuum circa Segobricam urbem: jam et Cyprus, & Cappadocia, & Sicilia, & nuper inventum Africa: Post-ferendos omnes tamen Hispaniæ, & Cappadociæ, mollissimis, & amplissimæ magnitudinis, sed obscuris (22). — This (transparent Stone) was formerly found only in the nearer Spain, nor in every place of that, but within a hundred Miles round the City Sigüenza: but now it is to be met with in Cyprus, Cappadocia, and Sicily, and lately in Africa: But the worst of all are those of Spain and Cappadocia, being the softest, and largest, but not the clearest. He adds, that in Nero's Time there was discovered, in Cappadocia, a sort of Stone as hard as Marble, white, and transparent (23), called Phengites. Nero made a great use of them in his Buildings (24); Domitian, who lived in fear of Conspiracies, and was willing to observe what passed behind him, ordered the Galleries, in which he used to walk, to be cased with this Stone (25).

[E] It was very bare of Money. The Verse, before quoted from Horace (26), is a Proof of this. Mr Dacier confirms it by the Cheapness of Oxen, and of Men, and by observing that the Cappadocians paid their Tribute to the great King in Horses and Mules (27). He does not forget Tully, who, speaking of Cappadocia, and its King Ariobarzanes, says, Et mehercule ego ita judico nihil illo regno spoliatus, nihil rege egentius. Indeed I am of opinion no Kingdom is poorer than Cappadocia, no King more indigent (28). Cicero was then Governor of Cilicia. He observes, that Ariobarzanes was too much in debt to be able to clear all at once with Brutus and Pompey. He paid Pompey's Agent Thirty three Attic Talents a Month, and yet that did not satisfy the Interest. He was obliged to impose Taxes; for he had no ordinary Revenues: and what was thus raised was so far exhausted, that he was unable to answer his other Creditors (29). Alii neque solvit quicquam nec potest solvere, nullum enim ararium, nullum vectigal habet. Appii (30) instituto tributa imperat, ea vix in foenus Pompeii quod satis sit efficiunt (31). Though he was very poor (32), he paid at last near a hundred Talents in one Year to Brutus, and promised to pay two hundred to Pompey at the end of six Months (33).

[F] The Romans, on granting their Friendship to the Kings of Cappadocia, comprehended also the Inhabitants. The first Cappadocian King, who had the Advantage to be declared a Friend of the Romans, had joined with Antiochus, King of Syria; he asked Pardon of the Republic after that Monarch's Defeat, and offered to expiate his Fault with a Sum of Money. He was condemned to pay two hundred Talents; but at the Request of Eumenes, King of Pergamus, his Son-in-law, he obtained a great Abatement: He was excused for one Moiety of that Sum, and admitted to the Friendship of the Romans. Legati ab Ariarathæ rege Cappadocum venerunt ad veniam petendam, luendamque pecunia noxam, quod auxiliis Antiochum juvisset. Ei CC talenta argenti sunt imperata (34). — Ariarathes rex parte dimidia pecuniæ imperatæ, Eumenis beneficio, cui desponderat per eos dies filiam, remissa, in amicitiam est acceptus (35). From that time forward he was faithful to their Interests, together with his Father-in-law. See the Margin: you will there find his Inclinations during the War they made with the last Macedonian King (36).

[G] — they could not be without a King. The Royal Family being extinct, they refused the Privilege offered them by the Romans of being a free People, and sent Embassadors to Rome to declare, that Liberty was insupportable to them, and to desire a King. Πρὸς τούτοις αὐτοὶ τὴν μὴ ἐλευθερίαν παρ' ἡμῶν εἶναι γὰρ δύνασθαι φέρειν αὐτῶν ἐπαύσαν, βασιλέα δ' ἡξίουν αὐτοῖς ἀποδεδέσθαι. verunt (37). The Romans, wondering at their Taste, gave them leave to confer that Dignity on whom they thought fit. They made choice of Ariobarzanes, whose Posterity failed in the third Generation: whereupon Archelaus, no way related to that Family, was created their King by Marc Antony (38). Of them therefore it may well be said, O homines ad servitutem natos! After all it is probable, Monarchy agreed better with them than a Commonwealth: Liberty, unless it meets with a certain Disposition of Mind, is subject to be abused; and all People are not blest with such a Disposition. Note, Justin affirms, that Ariobarzanes was elected by the Roman Senate, Cappadoces munus libertatis abnuentes, negant vivere gentem sine rege posse, atque ita rex illis à Senatu Ariobarzanes constituitur (39). Mithridates maintained, that the Romans complemented the Cappadocians with this Liberty only to affront him: He added, that, merely because Gordius was his Friend, the Request of that People to have him for their King was rejected. 'Libertatem etiam in contumeliam sui à senatu ultro delatam Cappadociæ, quam reliquis gentibus abstulerunt: deinde populos Cappadocum pro libertate oblata Gordium regem orantes ideo tantum quoniam amicus suus esset, non obtinuisse' (40). He is in this more to be credited than Strabo; for it is not likely the Romans should leave it to the Discretion of the Cappadocians to chuse a King at such a Conjunction.

[H] They abounded in Magi, and places of Devotion. A Parenthesis in Strabo is a Proof of this. 'Εν δὲ τῇ Καππαδοκίᾳ (πολὺ γὰρ ἐστὶ τὸ τῶν μαγῶν φύλον, οἱ καὶ Περσικῶι καλῶνται, πολλὰ δὲ καὶ τῶν Περσικῶν θεῶν ἱερὰ) ἔστι μαχαλεὰ θύσται, ἀλλὰ κορυφὴν τινὴν ὡς ἀνὸς τῶν τῶν ἱερῶν. In Cappadocia (etenim maxima est ibi magorum multitudo, qui Pyretibi vocantur, & multa Persicorum deorum templa) non cultro sed stipite quodam mactant, tanquam malleo verberantes (41). I have elsewhere (42) mentioned the Devotion of the Cappadocians for the Bellona of Comana, and for the Diana of Cajabala (43). We shall observe here, that they had an Arch-Priest of Jupiter, in a place called Dacia, which was very famous (44). The Temple of Apollo at Cataona was held in great Veneration throughout all Cappadocia: His Statue in this place was an Original, from which a great many Copies were taken for other Towns (45). The Jupiter of the Penafians was not at all inferior to the Bellona of Comana: His Temple was situated in a fertile Country, which brought to the High-Priest a Revenue of fifteen Talents a Year. This Office was for Life. There were Three thousand Persons appropriated to the Service of this God, and maintained in his Temple (46). Plutarch observes, that the Romans had learned from the Cappadocians the Worship of a Goddess, which was either the Moon, Minerva, or Bellona (47). Add to all this what Maximus Tyrius says, that a Mountain was the God, the Oath, and the Statue of the Cappadocians: 'Ὁρὸς Καππαδοκίας καὶ θεὸς, καὶ ὅρκος, καὶ ἀγάλμας: Mons Cappadociæ, & Deus & iururandum est & Statua (48). If he means they had no other God, but a Mountain, he is very much mistaken. You will find in a Work of Mr Buonarotti, that Mount Argæus was the Symbol of the City of Cæsaria in Cappadocia on all their Medals (49), and that the Height of that Mountain rendered it almost inaccessible: which made the People in the Neighbourhood, and particularly those of Cæsarea, adore it as a sort of Deity. See also Mr Spanheim's Dissertation de præstantia & usu numismatum, pag. 892.

[I] Here is part of the History of the Princes who reigned in Cappadocia. Let us here finish what was begun in the preceding Remarks. I. We have brought the Reader down to the Time of Perdiccas, who after Alexander's Death reduced the Cappadocians under the Macedonian Yoke. We have seen Ariarathes expire on a Cross. This unhappy Prince left a Son of the same Name, who took shelter in Armenia, and some time after recovered his Dominions: For being informed that Perdiccas and Eumenes were dead, and that Antigonus and Seleucus were taken up with other Wars, he entered Cappadocia with the Troops lent him by Ardoates, King of Armenia, and engaged and killed Amyntas, General of the Macedonians, and drove them out of the Country. He left the Kingdom to Ariamnes, his eldest Son, who contracted an Alliance with Antiochus Theos, King of Syria; for he married his eldest Son Ariarathes to Stratonice, Antiochus's Daughter. He had so great an Affection for his Son, that he made him his Colleague in the Government. Ariarathes, having reigned alone after his Father's Death, left his Dominions, at his Death, to Ariarathes, his Son, who was then very young. He married Antiochide, Daughter of Antiochus the Great (50), a crafty Woman, who, perceiving herself barren, had recourse to a supposititious Birth. She made her Husband believe she had been delivered of two Sons, who were named Ariarathes and Holophernes. Her Barrenness was removed some time after; she had first two Daughters, and then a Son, who was named Mithridates. She confessed the Cheat to her Husband, and got the eldest of those supposititious Children educated at Rome, with a very small Retinue, and the other sent into Ionis. The legitimate Son took the Name Ariarathes, and was brought up after the Græcian manner. His Father, whom he intirely loved, had a mind to give him sensible Proofs of his reciprocal Affection. He resolved to resign the Kingdom to him; but the Son opposed it, demonstrating it to be unnatural for him to reign during the Life of the Person to whom he owed his Birth. He succeeded his Father, and proved a very honest Man. He applied himself very much to the Study of Philosophy, by which means Cappadocia, unknown before to the Grecians, became an agreeable Residence to several learned Men (51). This is what we find in the Fragments of Diodorus Siculus.

II. There are other Fragments of the same Historian, which inform us, that Orofernes drove his Brother Ariarathes out of the Kingdom of Cappadocia, after which Violence he reigned himself very tyrannically. He put several of the Cappadocians to death, committed a thousand Extortions, confiscated the Great Men's Estates, and pillaged the very Temple of Jupiter; which, from Time immemorial, had been exempt from such Violations, and which stood at the bottom of Mount Ariadne (52). We are told by Polybius, that Attalus, King of Pergamus, re-established Ariarathes on the Throne of Cappadocia (53), and that he spirited him up to demand of the Inhabitants of Priene, the Four hundred Talents Orofernes had deposited in their Hands, and to lay waste their Country, upon their Refusal to deliver up that Sum (54). They were faithful Trustees, and restored the Money to Orofernes; but this Fidelity exposed them to infinite Mischief (55). Observe, that this Attalus, who re-established Ariarathes, was Brother to Eumenes, and that this was the first Action of his Reign (56). This gives us some Light into Chronology; for we know Eumenes died in the Year of Rome 596, and that Attalus succeeded him. It would not therefore be reasonable to suppose that these two Brothers, Ariarathes and Orofernes, were Sons of Ariarathes, the Philosopher, whose Mother was the Daughter of Antiochus the Great, who died in the Year 567, from the building of Rome (57). For since this Daughter of Antiochus was not married to the Cappadocian King till about the Year 560 (58), it is impossible her Son's Children should be Men grown about the Year 597, as they are represented to be. This Son was not born 'till after the Birth of two Daughters, preceded by a long Sterility, which had induced her to pretend the Birth of two Boys (59). How therefore is it possible her Son should should be the Father of an Ariarathes and Orofernes, who, before the end of the VIth Century of Rome, had done what we read of them in History?

III. We learn from Justin, that Demetrius, King of Syria, undertook to restore Orofernes. He had a Sister, whom Ariarathes had refused to wed; for which reason he became the mortal Enemy of this King of Cappadocia. Demetrius - - - Ariarathi regi Cappadociae propter sustititas sororis nuptias infestus, fratrem ejus Orofernem per injuriam regno pulsum supplicem recepit (60). He therefore received with Pleasure the Petition of Orofernes, to be restored to the Throne, from whence he had been unjustly expelled by his Brother: but, finding that this very Orofernes plotted to dethrone him, he ordered him to be imprisoned, and if he had not been afraid, that by dispatching him he should release Ariarathes from his Fears of all farther Contention with this Rival Brother, he had not been content with imprisoning him, but would have instantly put him to death. Observe, that the beginning of his Reign answers to the Year of Rome 592; and therefore we must suppose he had reigned four or five Years when he gave Protection to Orofernes, and undertook his Restoration. He effected it, if we may believe Appian (61), and drove out Ariarathes; which was not pleasing to the Romans, who would have been better satisfied to have had the two Brothers reign together. Justin does not well agree with Appian; for he places Ariarathes among those Princes who set up a pretended Son of Antiochus, and supported him so vigorously, that this Intrigue cost Demetrius both his Crown, and Life (62). But these Historians may both be in the right in a certain Sense; for Polybius says, Demetrius expelled Ariarathes to restore Orofernes, and after that removed Orofernes to make way for Ariarathes (63). However it be, I take this Ariarathes to be the same, who lost his Life in the War against Aristonicus, in taking the Part of the Romans. This War ended in the Year 623 (63). I believe also that he ought not to be distinguished from Ariarathes the Philosopher: or if he ought, we should say, that after the Death of this Monarch, the Patron of the Learned, the two supposed Sons of Antiochide disputed the Succession, and drove each other from the Throne, and that, in short, they are the Ariarathes and Orofernes mentioned by Polybius, Justin, Appian, &c. For my part, I should rather believe, Orofernes contended for the Crown with Antiochide's legitimate Son, than with the other supposed Brother. The legitimate Son, that Prince, who was a Lover of Philosophers, and who invited so many learned Men to him, would not have had time to deserve what Diodorus Siculus says of him, if he had died before Eumenes, and had left, before that time, the Throne vacant to his two pretended Brothers. It was he therefore who was rivalled by Orofernes. You may please to observe, in Appian, that it was not well known whether Orofernes was Brother to the Prince with whom he contended for the Crown. Demetrius accepit mille talentis pulso Ariarathæ Holophernem ejus, ut ferebatur, fratrem in regnum induxit (65). — Demetrius having received One thousand Talents, and driven Ariarathes from his Kingdom, established Holophernes, who was said to be his Brother, in his Room. It is very likely therefore, Ariarathes looked on him as an Impostor.

The Sons of that Ariarathes, who was slain in the War with Aristonicus, obtained of the Romans Lycania and Cilicia, as a Reward for their Father's Services (66). They were six Brothers, and some of them about fourteen Years of Age, which occasioned their Mother, out of an abominable Ambition, and fear of losing in a little time the Administration, to poison five of them. The youngest had met the same Fate, if the Vigilance of his Relations had not withdrawn him from her Fury. The People, after having slain Laudice (67), for so was this unnatural Mother called, placed him on the Throne. This new Prince took the Name of Ariarathes, and married Laudice, Mithridates's Sister, by whom he had Children. He was murdered by the Order of his ambitious Brother-in-law (68); and immediately after, (68) Id. lib. Nicomedes, King of Bitynia, seized on Cappadocia, and married Laudice. As soon as Mithridates understood this, he sent an Army into Cappadocia, and, expelling Nicomedes's Garrisons, restored the Crown to his Nephew, Son of Ariarathes, whom he had before assassinated by the Hands of one Gordius. He desired the young King, whom he had just established, and who was named Ariarathes, to re-call Gordius. In case he agreed to this, he hoped to get rid of the Son, by the Hands of the same Assassin, who had killed the Father; and if he refused it, he should then be furnished with a Pretence to quarrel. Ariarathes not being able to bear, that his Uncle should concern himself in revoking the Sentence of Banishment against Gordius, and plainly perceiving the Drift of his Designs, prepared for War. He raised a very powerful Army, by the Assistance of his Neighbours; and Mithridates presented himself at the Head of another equally numerous (69). The Armies being in fight of each other, Mithridates desired a personal Conference with his Nephew; for, as the Event of a Battle was uncertain, he resolved to have recourse to Treachery. He concealed a Dagger under his Cloaths, and whilst, according to the Custom among Kings in such Cases, he was searched about his Belly, he said to the Man appointed by Ariarathes for that Examination, and who was diligently doing his Duty, Take care you do not hit upon a Weapon quite different from that you are searching after: By this Piece of Raillery he prevented the Discovery of his treacherous Preparations, and having drawn Ariarathes aside, under the Pretence of a private Conference, he stabbed him in fight of both Armies. ‘Cum ferrum occultatum inter fascias gereret, scrutatori ab Ariarathæ regio more missa, ‘curiosius imum ventrem pertractanti, ait, caveret ‘ne aliud telum inveniret quam quæreret. Atque ita ‘risu protectis insidiis, se vocatum ab amicis velut ad ‘secretum sermonem, inspectante utroque exercitu, ‘interficat (70).’ He made a present of Cappadocia to his Son, who was but eight Years old; and named him Ariarathes, appointing Gordius his Governor.

IV. The Cappadocians, not being able to endure the Oppressions of Mithridates's Lieutenants, took Arms, and calling in Ariarathes, Brother to the last King, placed him on the Throne. Mithridates attacked him, vanquished him, and drove him out of the Kingdom. The young Prince soon after fell sick through Grief and died. Upon this Nicomedes set up a fine Youth, and obliged him to call himself Brother to the two last Ariarathes's, and upon that score to desire the Kingdom of the Roman Senate. He sent his Wife Laudice to Rome, there to attest that she had three Sons by her former Husband. Mithridates, having discovered this Imposture, countermined it with another: he dispatched Gordius to Rome, to assure the Senate that the Boy, he had created King of Cappadocia, was Son of that Ariarathes who fell in the War with Aristonicus. The Senate saw plainly that each of these Princes was for usurping the Crown, under the Name of a pretended Heir; and therefore ordered Mithridates to renounce Cappadocia, and Nicomedes to quit Paphlagonia, and that those two Nations should be governed as they thought fit themselves. It was then the Cappadocians answered, as we observed before, that they could not live without a King. The Senate gave them ARIOBARZANES (71).

V. This new Prince did not quietly enjoy his Dignity. Appian says, that Mithraas and Bagoas drove him out of Cappadocia, and re-instated Ariarathes (72). The Romans restored Ariobarzanes (73). He was soon after dispossessed by an Army, which Mithridates sent into Cappadocia, in behalf of his Son Ariarathes (74). Sylla, having gained great Advantages over Mithridates, obliged him deliver up Cappadocia (75). Some time after Tigranes, at the Instigation of this Prince (76), invaded it, and drew from thence Three hundred thousand Men, to whom he gave some Lands in Armenia. Ariobarzanes, who had fled to Rome before this Invasion (77), was not restored till Pompey had made an end of the Mithridatic War in 690 (78). See how Cicero complains plains that a Confederate Prince was excluded the Possession of his Dominions (79). Note, that, according to Plutarch, Cappadocia was twice restored by Sylla; first, when, after his Pretorship, he was sent into this Country, to re-instate Ariobarzanes on the Throne (80); secondly, after the Victories he gained over Mithridates not only during, but after his Consulship (81). We shall examine this towards the end of the following Remark, and reconcile some Contradictions of Appian and Justin. We must not forget, I. That Pompey very much enlarged the Dominions of Ariobarzanes, when he restored him to the Throne of Cappadocia (82): II. That the Son of that King inherited all those Dominions (83).

VI. He did not long enjoy them; for he had been murdered when Cicero, in 702, went to command in Cilicia. The King, who then reigned in Cappadocia, was Grandson to Ariobarzanes the first of that Name, and found himself threatened with the Fate of his Father. There was a Conspiracy formed against him in favour of his Brother Ariarathes; but Ariarathes assured Cicero he was no way consenting to it. 'Dixit (Ariobarzanes) ad se indicia manifestarum infidiarum esse delata, quæ essent ante adventum meum occultata, quod si qui ea patefacere possent, propter metum reticissent: eo autem tempore spe mei præsidii complures ea quæ scirent; audacter ad se detulisse: in his amantissimum sui, summa pietate prædium, fratrem, dicere ea, quæ se me quoque audiente dicebat, se sollicitum esse ut regnare vellet: id vero fratre suo accidere non potuisse: sed tamen ante illud tempus eam rem nunquam in medium propter periculi metum protulisse. Quæ cum esset locutus, monui regem ut omnem diligentiam ad se conservandum adhiberet: amicosque patris ejus avique judicio probatos hortatus sum, regis sui vitam, docti casu acerbissimo patris ejus, omni cura custodiæque defenderent (84). - - - He (Ariobarzanes) declared he had received Information of manifest Conspiracies, which before my coming were concealed, because they who knew of them were afraid to discover them: but that now, confiding in my Protection, a great many had boldly revealed to him all they knew: That among these his own Brother, who loved him extremely, and was remarkable for his Piety, had confessed to him, which he also did in my Presence, that he had been solicited to accept the Crown; that although he was sensible this could not happen without his Brother's Death, yet he durst never discover these Designs for fear of Danger. When the King had said all this, I advised him to take particular care of himself: I encouraged his Friends, who had been approved both by his Father and Grand-father, from what they had seen of the hard Fate of his Father, to defend the Life of their King, with all possible Caution and Zeal.' Cicero, at his Departure from Rome, had received Orders to favour and protect Ariobarzanes with all imaginable Care. The Senate had never given such an Order before for any King whatsoever: This Testimony therefore of their Affection did a very great Honour to that Prince: These are Cicero's Words (85): 'Cum vestra autoritas intercessisset, ut ego regem Ariobarzanem Euseben & Philorhomæum (86) tuerer, ejusque regis salutem, incolumitatem regnumque defenderem, regi regnoque præsidio essem: adjunxisseque, salutem ejus regis, populo senatuique magnæ curæ esse, quod nullo unquam de rege decretum esset a nostro ordine: exstimavi me judicium vestrum ad regem deferredere, eique præsidium meum & fidem & diligentiam polliceri: ut, quum salus ipsius, incolumitas regni mihi commendata esset à vobis, diceret, si quid vellet. - - - When I received your Commands to defend King Ariobarzanes, a Prince pious and in Friendship with the Romans, to protect his Person and Kingdom, and to be a Guard to both; with this additional Declaration, that the People and Senate have very much at Heart the Preservation of that Prince, which is an Honour you never paid to any King before: I made it my Business to acquaint him with your Decree, and to assure him of my most sincere and hearty Protection, that as his own Preservation as well as that of his Kingdom was recommended by you to my Care, he might freely communicate to me his Desires.' This Order of the Senate was faithfully executed. Cicero employed his Authority, his Forces, and his Advice, in favour of Ariobarzanes, and preserved him his Crown, and even his Life. 'Ariobarzanes operâ meâ vivit, regnat. Ev $\alpha\gamma\alpha\theta\acute{o}\varsigma$, consilio & autoritate, & quod infidiatoribus ejus $\alpha\pi\theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma$ ov me non modo $\alpha\delta\omega\phi\acute{o}\varsigma$ ov præbui, regem regnumque servavi (87). - - - Ariobarzanes lives and reigns by my means. My Presence, Advice, and Authority, and rendering myself not only incorruptible but also inaccessible to his Conspirators, preserved both King and Kingdom.' He hindered the Priests from molesting him (88). This was a great Piece of Service.

VII. Before we proceed any farther, let us take notice of two Mistakes in a learned Commentator. He supposes the Ariobarzanes here mentioned, to be the Son of the first of that Name (89), and that he was honoured with the Title of King by the Senate when Cicero was Consul (90). To prove the last he quotes these Words of Cicero, 'Ariobarzanem - - - Senatus per me regem appellavit, mihi quæ commendavit (91). - - - The Senate, by me, saluted Ariobarzanes - - - King, and recommended him to my Care.' But this relates to the Time when he was sent into Cilicia, and not to his Consulship. Besides it is not at all likely that Ariobarzanes I. was dead when Cicero was Consul. There could be no occasion therefore at that time to think of acknowledging another Ariobarzanes for King. As to his first Mistake, it proceeds from hence, that Manuetus did not consider, as other Critics have done, that in the Passage before quoted (92) ought to be read, Amicosque Patris ejus avique judicio probatos, - - - His Friends approved both by his Father and Grand-father. We have no reason to think that any Son or Nephew of this Ariobarzanes, who was protected by Cicero, reigned in Cappadocia, and yet this Family was not extinct 'till the third Generation (93). It is therefore reasonable to think, that he who ruled when Cicero went Governor into Cilicia, was Grandson to the first Ariobarzanes.

VIII. He led some Troops to Pompey (94); which fought against Cæsar at the Battle of Pharfallia. This, undoubtedly, was the reason that Cæsar put him under Contribution. It is certain he exacted from him several Sums of Money, for this Prince represented that he should be disabled from paying, if Pharnaces continued to pillage Cappadocia. 'Rex Deiotarus ad Domitium Calvinum, cui Cæsar Asiæ finitimæque provincias administrandas tradiderat, venit, oratum ne Armeniam minorem, regnum suum, neve Cappadociam, regnum Ariobarzanis, possideri, vassarique pateretur a Pharnace: quo malo nisi liberarentur, imperata se facere, pecuniamque promissam Cæsari non posse perolvere (95). Cæsar was then in Ægypt, and left it to bring Pharnaces to Reason. He passed thro' Cappadocia, where he made some Regulations, which shew that Ariobarzanes, and his Brother Ariarathes, were not great Friends. He obliged the last to be obedient to his Brother. He saw plainly that Ariobarzanes stood in fear of his Heir, and that the Heir was not Proof against an Impatience for the Succession: 'Fratrem Ariobarzanis Ariaratem, cum bene meritis uterque eorum de republica esset, ne aut regni hæreditas Ariaratem sollicitaret, aut hæres regni terreret, Ariobarzanis attribuit; qui sub ejus imperio ac ditione esset (96). From hence we may infer, that Ariobarzanes had no Children of his own, and that Fratres is better than Filius, in this Passage of Tully. Ariarathes Ariobarzanis Filius Roman venit. Vult, opinor, regnum aliquod emere à Cæsare, nam quomodo nunc est, pedem ubi ponat in suo non habet (97). This shews that Ariarathes, after Cæsar's Regulations, no longer shared the Government of Cappadocia. After Cæsar had conquered Pharnaces, he gave Plains under Water; after which he cut out several little Islands, in imitation of the Cyclades. There he childishly spent part of his Life (m); but these Amusements caused him both Shame and Damage. The River broke it's Dams, and the Waters, returning into their Channel, made the Euphrates overflow, so as to occasion incredible Mischiefs in Cappadocia. The Galatians, Inhabitants of Phrygia, suffered great Losses by this Inundation, for which they required Satisfaction. They demanded Three hundred Talents of the Cappadocian King, and made the Romans their Judges. He was likewise obliged to make good, to the Cilicians, the Damages they had sustained by the Carmale, another River he had also dammed up, which broke it's Banks (n). Strabo's Negligence is inexcusable; he contents himself with saying that this Prince was named Ariarathes. Would a good Author now a-days be suffered to say, gravely, that Charles, King of France, or Pope John, repaired a High-way? Would not the Reader be at a loss to know which Charles among the Kings, and which John among the Popes, this must be? Moreri has ventured to determine which Ariarathes this was. Perhaps he is under a greater Mistake in this, than in a great many other things he has delivered without Exactness [K], the Particulars of which will be found in my Remarks, as also a Criticism gave part of Armenia to our Ariobarzanes (98). This made Cæsar's Murderers, some Years after, apprehend that the King of Cappadocia would not be their Friend. He did not openly declare himself against their Party, but he refused to join with them. This Conduct of his gave them a just Suspicion of him, inasmuch that Cassius resolved not to spare him; he attacked him, and, having taken him Prisoner, put him to Death (99). This happened in the Year of Rome 712. We have seen elsewhere (100), how Ariarathes was molested in his Succession to Cappadocia, and that Sentence was given to his Prejudice in the Year 713; and that, having found Means to evade that Determination, he was intirely expelled the Kingdom, in the Year 718. After which Archelaus reigned in Cappadocia, and was the last of it's Kings.

To conclude, The Contradictions, we meet with in comparing together ancient Histories, are infinite. I shall consider some of them in the following Remark.

[K] Moreri ----- has delivered a great many ----- Things ----- without Exactness. I. He has falsely pretended, as I have already observed (101), that from Pharnaces, the first King of Cappadocia, down to Ariarathes, the first of that Name, there were no more than six Kings. II. And that their Names are not known. III. Archelaus did not succeed to the Crown after Ariarathes, Brother to that Ariobarzanes who was restored by Pompey, but after another Ariarathes, Grandson to that Ariobarzanes (102). IV. Since, in the Article of Cappadocia, Ten Kings are reckoned up, who were named Ariarathes, it is a Contradiction to say elsewhere (103) of Ariarathes the Second, that he had Seven Successors of his own Name. V. In the Battle against Perdiccas, the Number of Ariarathes the Second's Cavalry was Fifteen thousand (104), and not Twenty thousand. VI. Ariarathes the Fifth, who lent some Forces to Antiochus against the Romans, was not Brother-in-law, but Son-in-law, of that Antiochus. VII. It is not made out, that it was this Ariarathes, who stopped up the Passage through which the River Melas discharged itself into the Euphrates. VIII. He ought not to have omitted, that the Works raised in that Place were destroyed; for that Omission renders the rest of the Narration altogether unintelligible. It is impossible to comprehend how those Works should occasion the over-flowing of the Euphrates. They were infinitely more likely to prevent, than to occasion it. And if the Euphrates did over-flow, without the Waters of the Melas falling into it, it is impossible to comprehend why the Cappadocian King was liable to make good the Damages of the Inundation. IX. The Senate of Rome did not condemn him to pay Three hundred Talents; the Demand the Galatians made of that Sum was left to their Judgment, but it is not known what was their Award. It is more likely they moderated the Pretensions of the Demandants, than intirely supported them. X. Why is he content to quote Polybius and Livy (105), who say nothing of all this? He had a great deal more Reason to cite Strabo. XI. No one ever said, the City of Ariarathia (106) was built after the Inundation of the Euphrates, and the Payment of the Three hundred Talents; how comes it therefore to be affirmed in Moreri? XII. He, who built the City of Ariarathia, was Antiochus's Son-in-law (107): Moreri's Continuator therefore had no Reason to attribute this Foundation to the Ariarathes, whom he mentions for this purpose, because he considers him as Antiochus's Brother-in-law. And though at the Bottom this pretended Brother-in-law were in reality his Son-in-law, yet doth it not follow that he was the Founder of Ariarathia; for his Father Ariarathes was Son-in-law of Antiochus Theos (108). Perhaps it is he who is intended to be spoken of in Stephanus Byzantinus.

We must make a Digression here, to observe, that Pinedo has given a very insignificant Comment: He has quoted a Place in Strabo, which says, that Ariarathes the First, King of Cappadocia, united the Catainians with the Cappadocians (109). Wherein does this serve to explain the Words of Stephanus Byzantinus? And, when he was quoting this Passage, why did he not quote that of Strabo, where he makes mention of a more modern Ariarathes? Berkelius, another of Stephanus's Commentators, aimed at a better Comment upon his Text, but has not succeeded. At first he thought that Ariarathes, Son-in-law to Antiochus, had married Antiochus Soter's Daughter; but afterwards he observes that Demetrius, Brother of Antiochus, waged War with Ariarathes, propter fastidias sororis nuptias. — For refusing to marry his Sister (110). His Opinion therefore is, that the Founder of Ariarathia had married Demetrius's Sister, and that upon some Disgust he sent her back again. In answer to which I say, That the Latin Expression has a more general Signification, and that it is more natural to interpret it for a Refusal of Marriage, than for a Divorce. I add, That a Prince, who had married Demetrius's Sister, would not have been Son-in-law to Antiochus; for Demetrius's Father was Seleucus Philopater, Son of Antiochus the Great. My third Remark against Berkelius is, that he did not know that Diodorus Siculus speaks of two Kings of Cappadocia called Ariarathes, and Sons-in-law, one to Antiochus Theos, and the other to Antiochus the Great. But to return to Moreri's Dictionary.

The XIIIth Fault is in saying that Mitbridates expelled Nicomedes, who had seized on Cappadocia. He ought to have said Nicomedes, King of Bythynia. XIV. Mitbridates did not employ a young Man (111) to kill his Nephew, but did it with his own Hands, as I have observed before (112). XV. He ought to have quoted the Thirty eighth Book of Justin, and not the thirtieth. XVI. The Successor of him, who was murdered by Mitbridates, was his Brother, and not his Son. XVII. He ought not to have omitted the Reign of Mitbridates's Son, since it was antecedent to the Election of Ariobarzanes. XVIII. This Son of Mitbridates ought to have been placed under the Word Ariarathes, and not under Ariarathes; for when his Father made him King of Cappadocia, in the room of his Nephew whom he had killed, he gave him the ordinary Name of the Kings of that Country, viz. that of Ariarathes (113). Criticism on some Mistakes of Justin and Appian. Cappadocia, generally speaking, was a Country where Wit and Learning were intire Strangers; and yet it has produced some very celebrated Authors. Strabo and Pausanias are of that Number. The

did not give such a Jealousy, as to put Mitridates upon poisoning him. Cappadocia had been conquered a long time before, when this Ariarathes commanded a body of Troops for his Father in Europe (114), and if he was poisoned by Mitridates, as is pretended, it must be upon some other Jealousy.

(115). XX. It is not likely that Ariobarzanes had been advanced to the Crown about the Year 644, from the Foundation of Rome (116). This I shall afterwards prove. XXI. It was he himself who was driven out of Cappadocia by Mitridates, and restored by Sylla. How comes it therefore to be reported of his Son? XXII. He was not immediately attacked by Tigranes (117): He had been already restored more than once before he was attacked by Tigranes. XXIII. It is false that Sylla defeated Tigranes's Army. XXIV. Justin, still wrong quoted in his thirtieth Book, no where says, either that Ariarathes, Mitridates's Son, was vanquished by Ariobarzanes, XXV. Or that Ariobarzanes, by Pompey's Assistance, conquered Sophene, Gordene, and Part of Cilicia; XXVI. Or that, after these Conquests, he resigned his Crown to his Son Ariobarzanes, to pass the rest of his Days in Peace. Not only Justin is silent as to all this, but I believe so is every other good Author. Appian says only, that Ariobarzanes was gratified with these Provinces by Pompey (118). Does that shew he conquered them? XXVII. He ought to have known, that at the time when Ariobarzanes is said to have overcome Ariarathes, Mitridates's Son, that is, after Tigranes's Overthrow, this Ariarathes was dead (119).

(118) Appian. in Mithridat. pag. 163.

(119) Appian. in Mithridat. pag. 129, speaks of Arcathias Mitridates's Son, as of one who, having subdued Macedonia, was marching against Sylla, but died of a fit of Sickness. This, without doubt, is by Plutarch calls Ariarathes.

Let us examine if it be true that his Election happened in the Year 1644. I am well assured, that, if all Occurrences between Aristonicus's War and this Election be well considered, they will be found to require more than Twenty four Years. Ariarathes dying during this War, which lasted two or three Years more or less, and ended in 623, all his Sons, except the youngest, were poisoned by their Mother. He who escaped was advanced to the Throne, and assassinated by the Intrigues of Mitridates: He left two Sons, who reigned one after another. The eldest vigorously opposed Mitridates; he raised a powerful Army, and commanded it himself, when he was murdered by Mitridates, under the pretence of inviting him to a private Conference. All this shews he was no Child. After this, Gordius, Governor to the new King, Mitridates's Son, had the Direction of Cappadocia. His Administration was so severe, that the People rebelled, called in the late King's Brother, and made him King; but he was overcome by Mitridates, and constrained to quit the Country; After which he lived but a short time. Nicomedes, having heard of his Death, set up a Youth, who pretended to be the lawful Successor. His Wife took a Journey to Rome to make good the Imposture; and Mitridates sent Gordius thither to oppose it with another. The Senate put an end to all these Disputes, by leaving the Cappadocians at their full Liberty. This Favour was not accepted by these People: they would have a Prince, and had Ariobarzanes (120). It is impossible, according to this, that his Election should happen in the Year of Rome 644. I should not have repeated this long Detail, if, besides it's being necessary as a proof of the twentieth Fault in Moreri, I had not found that it would furnish Materials for a Criticism on Justin.

(120) This whole Account is taken from Justin, lib. xxxviii.

JUSTIN criticized.

He says that Laudice, Widow to that Ariarathes, who was slain in the War with Aristonicus about the Year of Rome 622, poisoned five of her Sons, and that the youngest had met the same Fate, if his Relations had not concealed him from the Violence of this unnatural Mother. He observes, that the Fear of not long enjoying the Regency, seeing some of her Sons were grown up, led her to this Inhumanity (121). 'Tis difficult to make good his Reasonings; for if this Fear was the Cause of her endeavouring to dispatch the youngest, he must necessarily not have wanted much of being of Age; in which case the eldest must consequently have been of full Age, which would have excluded Laudice from the Regency. If it be answered, that her eldest Son was not quite of Age, but very near it, it follows of Course, that the youngest was too far from it to give the least Alarm to her Ambition. There was room for her to expect an Administration long enough, not to put her upon dispatching him so soon. Justin therefore has not reasoned justly upon the Motives of this cruel Woman. There are innumerable Faults of this Nature, to be found in this Author, and in the best Writers, by any one who would be at the Pains to collect them. For my part, I am of Opinion, that all Laudice's Sons were of Age, and that it was for this reason she attempted to get rid of them all at once. My reason for this Opinion is, that the youngest of them all left Two Sons behind him, who succeeded him in the Kingdom, and who, according to the Account we have of them, must needs have lived till they were at least twenty. Now it is certain Ariobarzanes had been dethroned before the Year of Rome 659; for it was in this Year Sylla re-established him (122). There must be some Distance of Time between the Death of the last Ariarathes and Ariobarzanes's Election: During this Interval, the Pretensions of the two supposed Heirs were disputed at Rome; and there intervened a Decree of the Senate. We may add also, that there must be some Distance of Time between Ariobarzanes's Election and Expulsion, and between his Expulsion and Restoration. Since therefore he was restored in the Year 659, it is very likely the last Ariarathes, aged about twenty Years, did not die before 654. Judge therefore, if it be probable, that his Father should be only an Infant, when Laudice had a mind to make him away about the Year 623.

We shall here examine whether Appian has justly related the Adventures of Ariobarzanes. This is his Account. The Romans commanded Mitridates to resign Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes: He obeyed, but Mitbraas and Bagoas expelled Ariobarzanes, and gave the Kingdom to Ariarathes. The Romans sent an Embassy into this Country to restore Ariobarzanes: Manius Aquilius was their Principal. Orders were sent from Rome to Lucius Cassius, who commanded in Asia, and to Mitridates, to assist the Embassadors with all their Power. Mitridates, dissatisfied with the Romans, did not obey them. However, Cassius and Aquilius restored Ariobarzanes, and advised him and Nicomedes, King of Bythynia, to make Incursions into Mitridates's Territories. Nicomedes, not able to resist the Importunity of the Embassadors, committed some Hostilities (123). Upon this Mitridates complained; but, finding no Redress, he had recourse to Arms, made a Conquest of Cappadocia, and gave it to his Son Ariarathes (124). The Embassador, he dispatched to the Roman Generals, delivered himself in very high Terms, and was answered in yet higher (125). The Event was, that Mitridates overthrew the Romans, and took Prisoner Manius Aquilius, the Chief of the Embassy; but was himself at last defeated by Sylla, and forced to accept of a very disadvantageous Peace (126). The Restoration of Ariobarzanes was one of the Conditions of the Treaty (127): this was at first imperfectly (128), but afterwards very effectually executed (129). The Invasion of Cappadocia by Tigranes happened some Years after (130). Sylla was then dead. Lucullus re-took Cappadocia (131), Mitridates recovered it again (132), and lastly Ariobarzanes was re-established there by Pompey (133).

I observe, I. That Appian is to blame for speaking of the Invasion of Mitbraas and Bagoas, without telling us who they were, and who that Ariarathes was they made King of Cappadocia. II. He is also to blame for taking no Notice of Sylla's Commission to restore Ariobarzanes. This was in the Year of Rome 659. Sylla then commanded in Cilicia. He mentions it himself in Appian, addressing to Mitridates. In Cappadociam ego reduxi Ariobarzanem ex S. C. cum praesentem Cilicia: idque feci te cedente auctoritate toritatis populi (134). — I re-established Ariobarzanes in Cappadocia, by order of the Senate; and this I did by your Compliance with that Authority. This renders the Historian the less excusable; for as he was not ignorant of this Discourse of Sylla, he ought to have enquired into Ariobarzanes's Re-establishment, and have given it in its proper place like a good Chronologer. His Omission had been the more excusable if he had not known what Sylla said to Mitridates. Note, Plutarch observes, that Sylla, after his Pretorship, was sent into Cappadocia, under the specious Pretence of restoring Ariobarzanes; but in reality to be a Check upon Mitridates, who was forming some great Designs (135). Consult Sigonius who will clear up all this Matter (136); though he is not to be credited, when he says, Mitridates; by the Hands of Gordius, murdered both Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, and his Son, who was only an Infant. We may remember, Mitridates himself dispatched this Son, who was arrived to Maturity. My III. Remark against Appian is, That, in all Appearance, he is mistaken as to the Invasion of Mitraas and Bagoas: He supposes Mitridates had no hand in it; nay, that the Romans commanded him to dethrone the Usurper, and restore Ariobarzanes, and that Mitridates, disgusted at them, disobeyed their Order. I make no question but this Invasion was carried on by Mitridates's Generals, in Favour of his Son Ariarathes, whom the Cappadocians had expelled. Justin says, they recalled the Brother of their last King, and that he was overthrown by Mitridates (137); that is to say, if I am not mistaken, by Mitraas and Bagoas, who brought back into Cappadocia Ariarathes, their Master's Son. Let us observe, in the IVth place, That Mantius Aquilius's Embassy ought to be placed in the Year of Rome 663, or thereabouts; and therefore does not at all concern the first Restoration of Ariobarzanes, as Appian supposes (138).

One Word more against Justin, who supposes that Tigranes, instigated by Mitridates, was the first who expelled Ariobarzanes, and that this gave Occasion to Aquilius's Embassy. This is false. That Embassy was antecedent to the bloody Wars between Sylla and Mitridates, which did not commence till the Year of Rome 665. Tigranes is never mentioned before Lucullus's Expedition. It ought therefore to be affirmed, that he seized not on Cappadocia till after Ariobarzanes had been restored the second time by Sylla.

I expect to be charged with insinuating too much upon Trifles: But I would have it understood, that my Motive to this, is not from any supposed Importance in the Things themselves, but only to insinuate, by evident Examples, that we ought to be very diffident of what we read, and employ our Talent in the discerning matters of Facts. This Application enlarges and improves the Faculties of the Mind. I imagine therefore the Reader will not think my Labour has been ill bestowed.

There is so little Chronology in most of the Greek and Latin Historians, that ancient History stands in need of being new modelled. I dare venture to say, that, had we at this Day all those Affluences with which they abounded, we should write much better Histories than those they have left us.

[L] The Cappadocians were esteemed very unfit to make Orators. It is on this Account Mr. Kuhnias has confirmed their Opinion, who hold, that Pausanias, Author of the Description of Greece, is the same with Pausanias the Sophist, whose Life is written by Philostratus, and who was one of those Scholars Herodes Atticus admitted to so great a Familiarity. This is not contradicted by Philostratus's Observations, viz. That this Sophist pronounced Greek very indifferently; for that was a Fault so natural and incurable in the Cappadocians, that an Orator of this Country was said to be more rare than a white Crow, or a flying Tortoise. Cui non repugnat, these are Kuhnias's Words in his Preface to the New Edition of Pausanias (139), 'quod Philostratus tradit, quod Græcam Linguam durius pronunciarit quam delicata ejus rotunditas patiebatur. Hoc enim toti Cappadocum nationi commune vitium, orique fuit ἐλαττωμα nulla exercitatione emendandum, uti clare indicat notum epigramma:

[B] The historical Works of this Writer are very valuable. They relate what passed in his own Times, particularly in Italy. He published the two first Books by way of Essay, in the Year 1626. I due primi libri dell' Historia sopra i movimenti d'arme succeduti in Italia dall' anno 1613 fino al 1618 (2). — The two first Books of the History of the Wars in Italy, from the Year 1613 to 1618. He re-printed them at Genoa in 4to in 1638, with the ten following Books. All the twelve go on from the Year 1613 as far as to 1634, and were again printed at Geneva in 1644 in 8vo. The Author published a second part at Genoa in 1648, which was re-printed at Geneva in 1650 in 8vo. It was intitled, Dell' Historia di Pietro Giovanni Capriata, parte seconda in sei libri distinta. Nel primiero de qual li si contengono alcuni movimenti d'armi fuor d'Italia succeduti. E ne cinque susseguenti la continuatione di quei d'Italia dell' anno MDCXXXVIII, fino al MDCXLVIII. — The second part of the History of Peter John Capriata, divided into six Books. In the first of which is contained an Account of some Wars which happened out of Italy. In the five following, the Continuation of those of Italy, from the Year 1634, to 1644. There was printed at London, in 1663, an English Translation of the whole Work.

[C] He insists that whoever accuses him of favouring a Party, must find the Charge return upon themselves. This is a judicious Observation, and applicable to a great many Readers, who are apt to accuse Historians of being partial, for no other reason but because they are remarkably so themselves. If he speaks well of those whom they, out of National Prejudice, or Party Interest, dislike, it is Flattery; and if he says any thing amiss of those whom they, for the same sort of reason, love, it is Malice. They never examine themselves, nor discover that the Partiality which they charge upon their Author is intirely their own. This is what Capriata represents to some certain Readers, who complained that he had not preserved an exact Balance between the two Crowns; and that he had set off too extravagantly the Actions of some Princes, and reported as disadvantageously those of others. When the Readers, says he, are more prejudiced than the Writer, they think the Commendations too sparing which he gives to their Friends, and those too liberal which he bestows on their Enemies. They accuse him of not censuring the latter enough, and of censuring the former too much; and thus they judge, even whilst the Historian preserves the most perfect Equilibrium. Their doleful Complaints are the Effect of their own Passion, and not, as they pretend, of that of the Author. This Thought is better expressed in Capriata's own Words. Ma perche fra molti affectionati lodatori si sentono qualche più presto doglienze, che detrattoni, parendo ad alcuni, che io sia più dell' una, che dell' altra corona parziale, e che de Principi nella parte premiere interefatti; altri venghino innalzati, altri depressi più di quel, che la via mezzana, che han gl' Istoriographi a tenere. Dirò per tanto in rispo- sta, più che in difesa di simili doglienze, primieramente, che tanto riesche difficile tener la via di mezzo allo Scrittore, quanto al Lettore, & che però tanto può l'uno, quanto l'altro trapassare la Mediocrità, quello nello scrivere, e questo nel giudicare. Impercioche il Lettore tocco per avventura da maggior passione, che l'Autore, e però più all' una che all' altra parte inclinate riputerà sempre corte le lodi, e abbondanti gl' abbassamenti della parte, nella quale inclina, e per lo contrario maggiori le lodi, e mirori gl' abbassamenti delle contrarie, per quanto lo scrittore si sia ugualmente con tutti diportato: onde la doglienza procederà per avventura più dalla passione di chi legge, che da quella di che scrive, conforme al proverbio Latino, Arquatis omnia lurida videri (3).

A jaundic'd Eye sees every thing discolour'd.

I have said elsewhere (4), that it is sometimes easier to be an honest Man, than to appear so; and I here affirm that it is sometimes more difficult to appear a faithful Historian, than to be such in reality. I do not mean that it is an easy Task to write an History, which shall impartially represent the Prudence and ill Conduct, the Right and Wrong, the Advantages and Losses of two Parties. This requires a Man without Passions, or the Sage of the Stoics, a Man who never can be met with, and exists only in Idea; It requires, I say, this state of Insensibility, to be able to preserve always so exact a Medium in composing History. It is not sufficient to belong to a Country no way concerned either with France or Spain, during the Wars between those two Crowns. We may favour indirectly, at least by our wishes, one Party more than the other, notwithstanding this Neutrality (5). Our own national Interests, or national Caprices, may inspire this preference. It is impossible to express how this prejudices an Historian against the Party he dislikes, how many secret Passions it raises in him which corrupt his Judgment, and how it accustoms him to relate, with much more Pleasure, the Successes of the Party he favours. I add, that a private Person shall even from his own particular Constitution conceive an Affection for one Foreign Nation, greater than for another; and that the Situation of his own Fortune may make him have more to hope or fear from one Prince, than from another. These are some of the Obstacles to an Historian's being perfectly candid, and observing a just Medium. A great many more might be mentioned; and if every thing was to be, which may bias an Author in writing the History of his own Country, the Catalogue would be still much larger. It must therefore be owned to be a very difficult Task to compose an Impartial History.

But if an Author could surmount all these Obstacles, the Snares and Surprises of his Passions, the Prejudice of Education, the Force of Prepossessions, and the Habits contracted before undertaking to write his History; If in short he had related sincerely the Good and Bad of each Party, without inclining to either side, where would he find Readers candid enough to do him the Justice he deserves? Would they take the same pains to divest themselves of all Prepossession? Would they not be displeased with what they find related either in prejudice to the Party they love, or in favour of that they dislike? Would they believe these Accounts to be true? Would they not reject every Thing as false which should contradict their prejudices? Consequently, this Author would find more Difficulty to be esteemed impartial, than really to be so.

The Inconveniences I have mentioned are more particularly to be apprehended in writing a History of our own Times; for, in proportion as the Facts are of more distant Dates, the Readers become less untractable

The Venetians complained of being ill treated in his History; the Grounds on which he justified himself were worth remarking [D]. He dedicated his Work, not to the Princes, but to private Persons; for fear that his addressing to a powerful Patron might make him suspected of not having strictly adhered to the Rules of History [E].

untractable; but, as to those lately passed, they will hear no Reason. They directly declare to be Pensioners to the Enemy, the Gazetteers, who give a more favourable Account than other Writers have done of their Losses, and suppress nothing of their Successes. The generality of Readers are so unjust, as to esteem those, who dare contradict their late Advantages, to be Favourers of the Enemy. So that an Historian, in proportion as he is in reality more sincere, renders himself so much the more suspected. Salust might have reckoned this among the Difficulties in writing History: I mean the Difficulties, which, according to him, rise from the Dispositions of the Reader. 'Ac mihi quidem tametsi haud quaquam par gloria sequatur scriptorem & auctorem rerum; tamen imprimis arduum videtur res gestas scribere: primum, quod facta dictis exæquanda sunt: dein quia plerique, quæ delicta reprehenderis, malevolentia & invidia dicta putant: ubi de magna virtute, atque gloria bonorum memores; quæ sibi quisque facilia factu putet, æquo animo accipit; supra, veluti ficta pro falsis ducit (6). — And though there is not the same Glory acquired by relating Actions, as by performing them, yet I take the Undertaking of an Historian to be one of the most difficult. First, because Facts are to be equalled with Words; again, because most Readers will take all Animadversions on Misconduct to proceed from Malice and Envy: And in all Relations of brave and gallant Actions, what they think they could have done themselves, they admit as true, and what exceeds that standard they reject as fictitious and false.'

(6) Salust. in Prefat. Belli Cæsarini.

To return to Capriata, is is observable that he gives (7), as an Instance of his Impartiality, his Account of the two Wars in Montferrat. The Duke of Mantua, being attacked in the former by the Duke of Savoy, was supported by the King of Spain; but in the second he was attacked by that King, and supported by the King of France. Our Author, who had commended the King of Spain, with respect to the first, condemns him in regard to the last, and bestows so much Praise on the Conduct of Lewis XIII., that they have been copied by a Frenchman. 'Che un Cavaglier Franceſe dell' ordini dello Spirito, nel suo Politico Christianissimo, dato alle stampe, s'è compiaciuto per pompa di quella Reggia atione di registrarla parola per parola, senza però nominar (8). — That a French Knight of the Order of the Holy Ghost, in his Most Christian Politician, a Piece lately printed, was so pleased with the Magnificence of this Royal Action, as to give the Description of it Word for Word, without so much as naming his Author.' His Impartiality, and Independence, appear also from a Latin Epigram he gives us, and which was published by an Author (9), personally unknown to him. This is part of it:

(7) In the Preface to the second Part.

(8) Capriata, ibid. The author however of The most Christian Politician, is no Plagiary; for he declares, pag. 202, of the Edition of 1645, in 12mo, that he gives that account from an Italian author.

Gallus & Hispanus nullo discrimine habentur;
Nec tibi tractatur mollior Emanuel.

Nor the Designs, nor Frauds of Kings, you spare,
But their most secret springs of War declare.
Free from base Flattery your bold Truths appear Scorning the Influence of Bribe or Fear.

Spaniard and French impartial Justice find,
Nor moves Emanuel your equal Mind.

But let him have rendered himself ever so deserving of this Encomium, a Reader, who is prepossessed, will never think him so; and if it may be said, that he who writes History ought to be void of all Passion, it may also be affirmed, that he ought to be so too who judges of the Work. Books of History above all others verify that Observation, Pro capta leſoris habent sua fata libelli. — The Reader's Taste decides the Fate of Books.

[D] The Venetians complained of — his History: the Grounds on which he justifies himself are worth remarking.] Andrew Balbo, a noble Venetian, was at Genoa, when the first Part of Capriata's History was published. He complained very civilly to the Author, who answered him, among other Things, That no body could accuse him of want of Respect to the Republic of Venice, in every Thing which concerned the Wisdom of its Government (10); that, if he had not described the Successes of their Wars, in an agreeable manner, it was not his Fault, since he had represented them according to Truth, and it could not be expected that the Description of those Things, which gave pain when they happened, should give pleasure in the reading. 'Quanto poi a successi delle guerre tanto di mare, quanto di terra, non havendole recato gusto quando succedevano, e impossibile che glie' recchino quando si descrivono, onde non v'hà colpa lo scrittore se conforme al vero i rappresenta.' It would undoubtedly be a great Disorder, if the Events themselves were disagreeable to us, and yet the History of them was pleasing. Those Writers only, who have no regard to Truth, can produce this Contradiction in the Nature of Things. They are like Cooks, who make such savoury Sauces to Meats, the most insipid, and hard to digest, that they go down with a Relish. An Historian of no Integrity will suppress all bad Successes, or cover them with a long detail of little advantageous Circumstances, so as to render them imperceptible to his Readers: they will not be able to see the Wound under the Multitude of fine Plaisters, he applies to it.

Capriata represented also, that he was neither a Subject, nor Pensioner, of the Republic of Venice, and yet had treated it with greater Respect than some Authors of its own had done, who had been punished both in their Persons and Works, whilst the Sale of his History was publicly permitted. 'E se V. S. andera paragonando i nostri scritti con quei d'alcuni Veneti scrittori trovera, che, come con maggior verita, così con rispetto maggiore ho i successi poco felici dell' armi Veneticani rappresentato, havendo nelle cose dubbie sempre nella piu benigna interpretazione inclinato. In maniera, che le nostre opere sono pubblicamente, nella stessa Città di Venetia, vendute, lette, & con applausi non minori, che altrove ricevute, dove quelle de' loro scrittori rimanendo affatto sterminate, non compariono in luce e gl' Autori ne stati sono puniti, e puniti ancora i Capitani, che mal si diportarono ne sinistri incontri dell' Armee, e delle pubbliche fattioni (11). All this was more proper to justify the Author, than to remove the Uneasiness he had given the Venetians by the Sincerity of his Pen. Men do not love to be told publicly of their Faults (12).

[E] He was afraid his addressing to a powerful Patron might make him suspected of not having strictly adhered to the Rules of History.] He dedicated the first Part of his History to Ottaviano Raggi, Auditor of the Chamber to Urban VIII.; and the second to Carolo Emanuele Durazzo, Referendary of both Signatures, and declared the Reasons which hindered his dedicating them to any Prince. There is not a Prince, says he, but is interested in the Affairs I relate; whatever therefore is said in favour of him, to whom I should dedicate my Book, might be esteemed Flattery, and any thing to his Disadvantage would be an Affront. It might also be suspected, that the Desire of procuring a Prince's Favour had served as a Bridle to make me hold my Tongue, or a Spur to carry me beyond the Truth. 'Essendo vi tutti (Principi) o tanto o quanto interessati, non pareſce adulazione quel, che il corso ordinario delle cose succedere portasse di poco loro gusto, e sadiſfazione: E per che ancora nessuno haveſſe occasioni

'occasione di far concetto, che il desiderio d'acquistarmi la gratia di quel Principe, haveffe servito di freno, per farmi tacere, o di stimolo per iscrivere piu abbondantemente, contro quel, che l'obbligo di fedele, e sincero scrittore mi potesse prescrivere (13).' Nothing is more judicious than this; for the more an Historian deserves to be commended for his Sincerity, in censuring a Monarch's Misconduct, and relating his ill Successes, the more would he be to blame for his Imprudence in dedicating his Book to him. Besides, it is become customary to use Flattery in addressing to Princes. Some Pension or Reward is expected; and therefore care is taken to consider what ought to be expressed or concealed. This is made the Rule of relating their Actions through the whole Course of the Work. The Dedication of such a Piece to their Patron, is a direct Declaration of their renouncing their Liberty, and seeking a Master. At least it will be imagined so.

CARACCIOL, or CARACCIOLI. Mr Moreri has mentioned several famous Persons of this Family; but he has forgot the grand Seneschal of Naples, who was, perhaps, the first great Man of his Branch. His Name was JOHN CARACCIOL: He made use of his Pen when he was very young (a); which was occasioned by his Poverty, though he was born a Gentleman. He had the good fortune to please Joan, Queen of Naples, the second of that Name, which proved the way to his Preferment. He was not only admitted to the Friendship of this Queen, but also to her Embraces, which were followed by Posts of Honour and Profit, according as he knew how to husband his Interest with her, and make himself serviceable to her. The manner, in which this Princess is said to have made him the first Advances, is very extraordinary [A]. He at last met with the Fate common to such Favourites; he was too busy an Intriguer, and rendered himself odious to a Lady of great Credit with the Queen: Some say he was so insolent as to give this Princess gross, abusive, Language, and even to give her a Box on the Ear, upon her refusing to give him the Principality of Salerno (b). There was some reason to suspect him of several ill Practices against the Interest of the State; for it was he, who suggested to Alphonso, King of Arragon, the Design of returning to Naples (c), from whence he had only retired upon his not being able to carry away Queen Joan, his Mother by Adoption. It is easy to imagine how much the Queen must, after this, hate the Party of her ungrateful Son. Yet Caracciol undertook to procure, to this very Party, the Superiority in the Kingdom of Naples. His Designs were discovered, and, in order to make them ineffectual, the Queen pretended to put her Confidence in him: He was drawn by this Artifice to her Court, upon which she ordered him to be slain, the first of August, 1432, by the Advice of her favourite Woman (d) [B]. At the beginning of the Rupture between Alphonso of Arragon and Queen Joan, Caracciol, being sent to visit that Prince, who pretended himself indisposed, was made a Prisoner (e); but he was set at Liberty some time after (f). See Pasquier's Recherches de la France, cap. xviii, lib. vi.

[A] The manner, in which this Princess is said to have made him the first Advances, is very extraordinary. Brantome is my Author. The first Opportunity the Queen ever had of discovering her Passion to him was from his Aversion to Mice. One Day, as he was playing at Chess in her Wardrobe, she herself procured a Moule to be brought before him: he turning himself in a Fright, sometimes this way, and sometimes that, and running first against one, and then another, fled at last to the Door of the Queen's Chamber, and so fell directly upon her. By which means he discovered her Love to him, and immediately granted him the Favour, soon after which she made him her grand Seneschal (1). Believe this Story who will; however it is not improbable, that, of all Declarations of Love, none costs a Person of her Sex and Quality so dear as a verbal one.

Nor is this to be wondered at: Women have a greater Command over their Tongues, than over several other Signs, more apt to make the Fire blaze out, which lies smothering in their Breasts (2): It is for this Reason Shame more easily hinders them from having recourse to articulate words, which are Signs of Intuition, than from expressing their Desires in their Faces by some natural Signs. And as Men are commonly very dexterous in discovering these Signs, and as ready in taking the Advantage of them, Women are seldom reduced to make verbal Declarations; this Necessity therefore is so great a Rarity, that, for want of frequent Use, it cannot become easy. If they perceive all other Signs unregarded; they prefer the use of the Pen to that of the Tongue. We have seen an Example of this kind before (3), in the Description Ovid has given us of the Passion of Byblis. And it is to be observed, that, in Affairs of this Nature, a Queen has not the Advantages other Women have; she is surrounded with those only, who, by reason of their Subjection, dare not advance any Declarations of Love: so that of necessity she must be the first Aggressor, and make the Discovery of her own Passion. Other Women, generally speaking, suffer themselves to be attacked; and, though at the same time they wish to be conquered, yet keep upon the defensive, and have the Honour of it (4); whilst a Queen is forced to give the Onset, and shamefully to break through all the Rules of Decency: I say nothing of the risque she runs of not being understood; she may easily be delivered from that, and explain herself sooner or later: Our Joan of Naples was so dexterous, that, without descending to I love you, or to a Declaration more plain and gross, which was made to the Patriarch Joseph (5), she discovered her Inclinations. Much less need the fear a Repulse, after she has made herself understood; for that Danger is very small. The Advantages, which redound from such a Condescension, and the Inconvenience a Man exposes himself to, if he flights these Royal Favours, almost always oblige him to answer them (6).

[B] — this Queen — ordered him to be slain — by the Advice of her favourite Woman. These are Mariana's words: 'Principis consilii auctor Cobella Rufa Antonii Sueffæ Ducis conjux, quæ præcipuum gratiæ & auctoritatis locum apud Reginam nacta erat, eoque implacabili odio in Caracciolum ferebatur (7). — The chief Author of this Advice was Cobella Rufa, Wife of Antony, Duke of Sueffa, who was in greatest Favour and Authority with the Queen, and therefore extremely inveterate against Caraccioli.'

We must observe, that, according to some Authors, the Queen's share in this matter consisted more in permitting than commanding it to be done (8). She pardoned the Murderers, confiscated the Estate of the deceased, and attained his Memory. He did not apprehend that this Princess was his Enemy; for as soon as he was falsely informed, by the Contrivance of the Conspirators, that the Queen was fallen into an Apoplexy, and that his Preference was was desired; he rose immediately, and opened the Door to them in his Shirt. They rushed in upon him, and murdered him, the Twenty seventh of August, the Day on which he had celebrated the Marriage of his Son, with great Solemnity (9).

(9) Taken from Spondanus, ibid.

CARACCIOLI (JOHN ANTONY), Son of John Caraccioli, Prince of Melfi, Marshal of France, &c. was Bishop of Troyes in the XVIth Century, and declared himself a Calvinist in the Year 1561. See Moreri's Dictionary; but observe, that he there misrecites the Words of Thuanus. He makes him say more than he has said (a), and omits one considerable Circumstance, which he has taken notice of; which is, that the Protestants acknowledged Caraccioli for Bishop, after he had publicly embraced their Religion [A]. This deserves Examination.

(a) This is more especially remarkable in the latter Editions, where what he pretends to be said by Thuanus, is distinguished in Italic Characters.

[A] The Protestants acknowledged Caraccioli as a Bishop, after he had publicly embraced their Religion. Thuanus takes notice, that this Bishop, upon a Scruple of Conscience, for his not having been elected by the Suffrages, either of the Church or People, assembled the Protestant Elders, in order that they might piously and prudently deliberate about electing and acknowledging him for Bishop. He declared against the shewing him any Favour, and that, if they did not think him worthy of that Character, he would lay it down with Pleasure. The Affair being duly considered, he was unanimously elected and re-ordained, and took his Seat as Bishop, and often preached, till the Bishops, apprehending the Danger of such a Precedent, prevailed with the King to deprive him. 'Ei scrupulus injectus est de vocatione sua, quod non Ecclesie neque Populi suffragiis electus esset; itaque Protestantium Ecclesie seniores evocavit, ut pie ac prudenter despicere, an se eligere vellent, ac pro Episcopo habere; neque quidquam gratiae darent; nam si minus idoneum existimarent, se libenter loco cessurum. Ita re inter eos deliberata, omnium consensu electus & denuo ordinatus loco Episcopi fedit, in concionibus publice ad populum, quibus eorum doctrinam sequebatur, habendis assiduus, donec praesulis exemplum veriti apud regem pervicerunt ut dignitate moveretur (1).' Sure this was a Matter well worth being mentioned by Moreri. We shall see presently, that it does not at all agree with the Account of Theodorus Beza, and yet Thuanus has followed Peter Martyr, who was upon the Spot.

(1) Thuan. lib. xxviii, pag. 569. col. 1, C. ad Ann. 1561.

(2) He was then Minister of the Savoy Church in London, which is Episcopal.

(3) Apologia pro Ministris in Anglia (vulgo) Nonconformistis, p. 163, Edit. 1665.

One of the Presbyterian Ministers, who were banished from England, in the Year 1662, published an Apology, wherein he refutes a Piece, printed by Mr Durel (2), in Defence of Episcopacy: I have seen what this Apology answers to Mr Durel, who had proved from this Example of Caraccioli, Bishop of Troyes, that the Reformed in France did not condemn Episcopacy. It maintains, that, if they did acknowledge this Profelyte for a true Bishop, it was only by taking that Word to signify no more than a Minister of the Word of God, and not as it is used to signify a perpetual President of the Assembly of Presbyters, and much less as it signifies a Prelate, who rules absolute without the Advice of his Presbyters (3). It adds, that Caraccioli, being in doubt whether he could lawfully exercise the Pastoral Function, not having been confirmed or elected by the Church and People, (to use the very Words of Peter Martyr in his Epistle to Beza) 'convened the Elders of the Reformed Church, and desired them piously and prudently to consider, whether they would elect, confirm, and acknowledge him for Bishop, which if they thought proper to do, he would make it his Duty to proceed as he had begun, by teaching and exhorting the Church committed to his Care, to edify and enlarge it to the utmost of his Ability; but, if they judged him unfit for so great a Charge, that they would freely and openly declare so, in which case he was ready to resign, having nothing more at heart than to be permitted to live in the Reformed Church, according to the sacred Rules of the Gospel. He requested, that they would maturely deliberate on this Matter in the Church; which when they had done, he was unanimously acknowledged and received as a true Bishop, on the sixteenth of November, 1561. Incessit animum boni viri scrupulus, an possit munus pastoris obire, eo quod non haberet ecclesiae & populi confirmationem seu electionem: inde (utar ipsissimis verbis Petri Martyris in Epistola ad Beza) seniores Ecclesiae reformatae acceperunt, rogavitque, ut pie ac prudenter despicere, an eum vellent eligere, & confirmare, ac pro Episcopo habere, quod si

'judicaret faciendum, se daturum operam, ut si cut coepit ita pergeret, Ecclesiam sibi commissam docendo & hortando, pro viribus aedificare, & augere; sin vero existimarent illum minus idoneum ad tantum munus, libere atque aperte dicerent, se autem paratum esse loco cedere, modo ei liceat in Ecclesia Reformata vivere, juxta sanctam Evangelii disciplinam. Rogavit ut ea de re maturè in Ecclesia deliberarent; quod cum factum esset, ab omnibus unanimiter ut verus Episcopus agnitus est & receptus, Nov. 16. 1561. (4).' Here is an exact Agreement between Thuanus and Peter Martyr: no wonder therefore that Mr Durel should say, Caraccioli was acknowledged for a true Bishop by the Reformed in France. For who could attest this better than Peter Martyr, who, after the Conclusion of the Conference at Poissy, passed through Troyes, to pay a Visit to the Bishop who had openly declared himself a Protestant (5)? However the Apologist accuses Mr Durel either of Fraud, or Negligence; and, in order to convict him, compares his Words with the following Passage, in the History of the Reformed Churches of France.

(5) Thuanus, lib. xxviii, ad Ann. 1561.

'About the End of September, Antony Caraccioli, Bishop of Troyes, returning from the Conference at Poissy, which had made some Impression upon him, being also solicited by some Princes and Ladies of the Court, presented himself before the Consistory of the Church of Troyes, solemnly acknowledging his Errors, and requesting to be received into the Ministry. On which, there being a difference in Opinions, some thinking it would be a great Advantage to have him on their side, others suspecting, not without reason, the Levity and incontinent Life of that Bishop, at that time too notorious, it was resolved to consult the Ministers then assembled at Poissy, who, finding some difficulty in the Affair, on account of some Circumstances which were made public, it was referred to the Church of Geneva, whose Opinion of which is to be met with in writing among the Latin Answers of John Calvin (6). In the mean time, he passed through Troyes, that great Man Peter Martyr, in his Return from Poissy to his Church at Zurich, by whose Advice the Bishop, having made his Abjuration, and signed the Confession of Faith, and promised to quit his Bishopric, was received into the Ministry, though not unanimously, being opposed by one of the Ministers, named Peter le Roy. However, having quitted his Bishopric, by means of a Pension procured him by the Queen, he applied himself to preaching, abounding much more in words than knowledge: but he behaved himself very ill afterwards, as will be shewn in it's Place (7).'

(7) Beza's Ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches, Tom. I, lib. v, pag. 767, under the Year 1561.

If this Account be any way reconcilable with That of Peter Martyr, it must be allowed to be very ill expressed, and after the most obscure and deceitful manner. I agree, that if Mr Durel knew what the Author of the History of the Reformed Churches had advanced, he ought either to have refuted him, or reconciled him in the best manner he could with Peter Martyr: but very probably he knew nothing at all of it, nor in the least suspected that there was any Account so contrary to that of this Minister, which had been adopted and confirmed by Thuanus. He took advantage from the Remark, with which this celebrated Historian has corroborated his Account; namely, that the Bishops of France apprehended the Consequences of this Behaviour of Caraccioli, and that upon this account they prevailed on the King to remove him from his Dignity. The Presbyterian Apologist eludes this Remark, by replying that the Bishops apprehended the Consequences of the Conduct of their Brother of Troyes, because, if the Episcopacy copal Character could not be lawful without the Suffrages of the People, there must be an End of their Hierarchy; and because the frequent Preachings of Caraccioli condemned the Idleness of his Brethren, or their Application to other Matters (8). But this is going from the Purpose: It is evident, Tuanus meant, that the Apprehension of the Bishops was founded on Caraccioli's retaining his Bishopric, after his Admission into the Protestant Communion. It was from hence that his Example might become dangerous. It was possible that a great many of the Bishops would have separated from the Church of Rome, if they had been sure of preserving their Dignity, upon their being confirmed by the Protestant People. There was no room to fear they would renounce their Dignities to become only common Preachers. We must allow therefore, that Mr Durel's Antagonist was mistaken, and that he entered upon these controversial Topics, principally to have an opportunity of reproaching the English Bishops with their Neglect of Preaching (9).

CARBON (a) (LEWIS), Author of several Books of Rhetoric, Philosophy, and Divinity, lived towards the end of the XVIIth Century. He was not a Civilian, as Mr Konig affirms, but a Divine: He was even Professor of Divinity at Perugia. Servilius Treus, a Native of Udine, was one of his particular Friends, and advised several Persons to buy the Rhetoric that Carbon had published. This was one of the Reasons which induced Carbon to dedicate to him his Introductio in Logicam [A], printed at Venice, in the Year 1579, in Octavo. And indeed this is a Method of obliging an Author in the most agreeable manner.

(1) See, on this Head, the Remark [C], of the Antesig-NANUS.

[A] Servilius Treus — advised several Persons to buy the Rhetoric that Carbon had published. This was one of the Reasons that induced Carbon to dedicate to him his Introductio in Logicam.] He begins with the usual Topic, that the Person to whom he dedicates his Book will become its Patron (1); after which he comes to that of Gratitude, and, among other Favours, acknowledges the Encomium bestowed on his Treatise of Rhetoric, and the Recommendations in favour of the Sale of it. 'Deinde si iis potissime opera dicanda sunt, quibus se plurimum homines debere sentiunt; & ex hoc sane capite ad hos meos labores omni animi studio tibi commendandos causas non levibus impulsus sum. Nam ut paulo ante dicebam, cum te apud multos meorum scriptorum eum prædicatorem habuerim, qualem alium fortasse neminem; profecto non poteris non defendere id, quod tuæ privatæ fidei commissum fuisse videbis. Optime namque novi, te non modo meis scriptis, quæ de Arte dicendi in lucem dedi, mirifice delectari; sed etiam ad ea sibi comparanda alios sæpe fuisse hortatum (2). — Moreover, if Books ought especially to be dedicated to those to whom we have the greatest Obligations, I ought on this Account to dedicate these my Labours to you in the most affectionate manner. For, as you have been pleased to recommend my writings, in a stronger manner than any of my other Friends, I assure myself that you will not fail to defend what is thus put under your particular Protection; for I am well informed, that you not only are very well pleased with my Books on Rhetoric, but have frequently desired others to purchase them.'

(2) Lud. Carbo, Epist. Dedicat. Introductio in Logicam, folio a 2, verso.

Note, That Servilius Treus, Patron of that Book, was a Civilian, who had great Employments in the Republic of Venice. They are particularly enumerated in this Epistle Dedicatory. He was one of the seven Commissioners intrusted with the Building of the Town of Palma Nuova, and he made a Speech to them, which was printed, and has been commended by our Author, who did not fail observing that his Friend had a very rare Talent; which was his excelling both in Business, and Learning. It is certain these two Things seldom go together (3); for great Application to study generally disqualifies for any public Employment, which is not in the learned way. 'Et in te admirati sint, quod in paucis reperitur, doctrinam cum rerum agendarum ratione conjunctam; quotus enim quisque est, qui cognitione & actione excellat, ut tu, Servili, facis? Eloquentiæ vero tunc privatum specimen exhibuisti, cum orationem non jejunam, non nudam, sed rerum genere eruditam, varietate copiosam, sententiis illustratam, verborum selectione cultam, schematicis pictam, atque dicendi forma ornatam, apud Illustriss. Palmae Novæ urbis ædificandæ Præfectos, ut unus e Septem designatis, habuisti: quam vir eruditus & eloquens Augustinus Michaelius, ne tanto bono bonarum literarum studio carent, tua cum laude in lucem dedit (4). — And admired to find in your Person, what we seldom meet with together, the Scholar and the Man of Business. For how few are they who excel both in Science and in Action, as you, Servilius, do? Of your Eloquence you gave us a signal Proof, in the Speech which you, as one of the seven Commissioners for rebuilding Palma Nova, made to the honourable Trustees, not a jejune and naked one, but full of curious Learning, great Variety, wise Sentences, elegant Choice of Words, adorned with noble Figures and Expressions, which Augustin Michaelius published with due Encomiums on the Speaker, that the learned might not be deprived of so fine a Piece.'

(a) Cardanus, de Vita propria, p. 12. Edit. Paris. 1643, in 8vo.

CARDAN (JEROM), a Physician, and one of the greatest Genius's of his Age, was born at Pavia, the Twenty fourth of September, 1501 (a) [A]. His Mother, not being married [B], did all she could, during her Pregnancy, to cause Abortion;

(1) Cardanus, de Vita propria, cap. iv, pag. 14. Edit. Paris. 1643.

[A] He was born the Twenty fourth of September, 1501. I was not willing to depend upon what I have read in the second Chapter of his Life, Ortus sum An. M.D.VIII. Calend. Octobris. I intend no Criticism on the ill placing of these Words, though they leave the Reader in a doubt whether he was born Octob. 1. 1508, or Sept. 24. 1500. I stick at other Matters. Cardanus says, he had a Fit of Sickness, of which he thought he should have died, in the beginning of his Eighth Year (1), and that he recovered, whilst the French were rejoicing for their Victory, obtained over the Venetians near the Adda (2). It is certain this Victory was obtained on the fourteenth of May, 1509, and it is very likely Cardanus fell sick towards the end of Sept. 1508; now, as he was then entering upon his eighth Year, he must of consequence be born about the latter end of September, 1501. If this Proof is excepted against, under Pretence that Car- dan's Sickness might have begun in Sept. 1507; let it be observed, how Cardanus elsewhere (3) makes his Thirty fifth Year fall in with 1536. Mr Baillet had reason to remark, that Authors are extremely divided as to the precise time of Cardanus's Birth and Death (4). See the Remark [F].

[B] His Mother was not married. Her Name was Clara Mitheria (5). I find her Son no where expressly affirming he was not married; he says indeed, she attempted to destroy the Fruit of her Womb, and that his Father did not cohabit with her; but both these Things may be consistent with Marriage. There are many married Women, who make use of Drugs to cause Abortion; the Writings of the Casuists furnish but too many Instances, and the Confessors know enough of it. Besides, a Separation from Bed and Board is no such extraordinary thing in the married State. The Reason therefore, that makes me believe Cardanus was a

Abortion; but the Medicines she took had not their desired Effect (b). She was three Days in Labour, insomuch that they were forced to tear the Infant from her. He was born with a Head full of black curled Hair (c). At four Years of Age he was carried to Milan (d), where his Father was an Advocate (e); and he was eight Years of age, when, in a dangerous Fit of Sickness, they devoted him to St. Jerom. It was his Father made this Vow, who chose rather to have recourse to the Assistance of this Saint, than that of his Familiar Spirit, whose Attendance he greatly boasted of. His Son never once thought of asking the reason of his making this Preference (f). At twenty Years of Age he went to study in the University of Pavia; where, two Years after, he explained Euclid. In 1524, he went to Padua, where he took the Degree of Master of Arts the same Year, and, towards the end of the Year 1525, that of Doctor of Physic (g). He married about the latter end of the Year 1531 (h). He had been incapable, for the space of ten Years before, of enjoying a Woman [C]; which very much afflicted him. He had completed his Thirty third Year, when he was made Mathematical Professor at Milan. Two Years after, he was offered a Physic-Professorship in Pavia, which he refused, from the uncertainty of the Payment of his Salary (i). In 1539, he was admitted into the College of Physicians at Milan; and in 1543, taught Physic publicly in that City. The Year following he did the same at Pavia, but left off at the end of the Year, because they did not pay him his Stipend, and returned to Milan (k). In 1547, a very advantageous Offer was made him by the King of Denmark, which he refused, on account of the Air and Religion of the Country [D]. He Bastard, is this: The two Particulars I have taken notice of, though, I say, they exclude not Matrimony, are however commonly Signs of an illegitimate Birth. If they had not been such in Relation to Cardan, he would certainly have declared so in express Terms: for he could not be ignorant of the Consequences, which would be naturally drawn from his Confession. Since therefore, after mentioning the two Points, I have insisted on, he takes no notice of his Mother's being married, there is no reason to doubt his being the Issue of an unlawful Commerce. After he was seven Years of Age, he was brought up in his Father's Family, where his Mother, and one of her Sisters, lodged at that time. This is no Argument that she was married; and that she was not a Concubine. I have read in a modern Author (6) that Cardan confessed *, the College of Physicians at Milan would not admit him into their Society, on account of his being suspected to be illegitimate. This Word suspected is very remarkable; and plainly proves that it was not certainly known, whether Cardan's Father and Mother had been married or not. However it be, this modern Author makes use of a very improper Expression, when he says, Cardan declared himself plainly the Son of a Whore, by beginning the History of his own Life with his Mother's Attempt to make herself miscarry of him (7). The Word Whore is very improper in this place; not only because Cardan no where owns his Mother was a Concubine; but also because, if he had owned her so in the most clear and express Terms, it ought not from thence to be concluded that he had treated his Mother so very rudely. A Concubine and a Whore are commonly esteemed two very distinct Characters. * Est enim Meretrix (ut loquitur Imp. in l. 22. C. ad L. Jul. de adult.) quæ pudorem suum vulgi libidinibus prostermit, quæ passim venalem formam habet, & quæstum inde facit (8). — For a Whore (as Justinian says) is one, who prostitutes herself to all Comers, who lets out her Body, without Exception, for Lucre and Hire.

[C] He married ---- in 1531. He had been incapable, for the Space of ten Years before, of enjoying a Woman. He attributes this to the malignant Influences of the Constellation under which he was born. The two unlucky Planets, and the Sun, Venus and Mercury, were in the human Signs; for which Reason, says he, I could not but be endued with a human Form: and because Jupiter was in the Ascendant, and Venus presided over the whole Figure, I could be prejudiced no where but in my Genitals, continues he; so that, from the Age of Twenty one to that of Thirty one, I was incapable of enjoying any Woman, which made me deplore my own Destiny, and envy that of all other Men. * Cum Sol, & maleficæ ambæ, & Venus & Mercurius essent in signis humanis, ideo non declinavi à formâ humanâ: sed cum Jupiter esset in ascendente, & Venus totius figuræ domina, non fui oblatius nisi in genitalibus, ut à xxi. anno ad xxxi. non potuerim concumbere cum mulieribus, & sæpius defleerem fortem meam, cuique alteri propriam invidens (9). Upon a Review of the heaviest Misfortunes that befel him in his Life, he reckons up four, whereof the first, according to his Account, was this, of not being able to enjoy the Sex; the second, was the tragical end of his eldest Son; the third, his Imprisonment; and the fourth, the irregular Life of his younger Son. * Totidem maxima detrimenta, & impedimenta, primum concubitus, secundum mortis lævæ filii, tertium Carceris, quartum improbitatis filii, natu minoris (10). In another place he gives a longer Catalogue of his Misfortunes, not forgetting that of his Impotency. * Infelicitates sunt, mors filiorum maxime lævæ, aut stultitia vel sterilitas: impotentia ad congressum mulierum: paupertas perpetua, pugna, accusationes, incommoda, morbi, pericula, carcer, injuria in præferendo immeritis tot & toties (11). — My Misfortunes have been, the most cruel Death, or Folly, or Barrenness of my Children, my own Impotency, perpetual Poverty, Quarrels, Accusations, Incumbrances, Distempers, Dangers, Imprisonment, Hardship in the so frequent Preference of so many worthless Persons.

[D] ---- Which he refused on Account of the Air and Religion of the Country. His Friend Andrew Vesalius had procured him these Terms. Cardan was to have had Eight hundred Crowns a Year, and his Diet: He refused these Advantages among other Reasons, because, in order to have complied with the Fashion of the Country, he must have quitted the Catholic Religion. * Oblata est conditio D. CCC. Coronatorum in singulos annos à rege Daniæ, quam recipere nolui, cum etiam victus impensam suppeditaret, non solum ob regionis intemperiem, sed quod alio sacrorum modo consuevissem, ut vel ibi male acceptus futurus essem, vel patriam legem meam majorumque relinquare coactus (12). To judge of things according to the Idea, which at first sight we form of Cardan's Religion, we should not imagine him to have been so conscientious. But we ought to distrust those precipitate Opinions formed of People, from Prejudices, first Appearances, and examine to the bottom. For my part, upon reading the Book Cardan has left us of de Vita propria, I rather discover in it the Character of a superstitious Man than of an hardy Unbeliever. I confess he owns he was not very devout: parum pius (13); but in the foregoing Page he tells us, that, though he was naturally of a very revengeful Temper (14), yet he forbore to exert it when occasion offered, in Veneration of the Deity. Dei ob venerationem, quod omnia hæc vana quantum sint dignosco, occasionem oblatam ultionum etiam consulo negligo (15). There is no Prayer, no frequenting of Churches,

He made a Voyage into Scotland, in the Year 1552 [E], and returned to Milan about so acceptable to GOD as worshipping him after this manner; I mean, in obeying his Laws out of a due regard to his Majesty, and against the strongest Inclinations of Nature. He therefore, who said Cardan was, by his own Confession, an impious Man (16), made use of a rash Expression. Cardan brags that he refused a good Sum from the King of England, because he would not give him those Titles the Pope had taken away from him. Renui quingentos, certe aliqui dicunt mille (veritatem scire non potui) quod titulo ipsius regis, in Pontificis præjudicium subscribere noluerim (17). He means King Edward, whom he had the Honour to wait upon at London, in 1552. He relates, that, having found among his Father's Papers, that Prayers addressed to the Virgin Mary, the first of April, at eight in the Morning, were of wonderful Efficacy, provided a Pater Noster and Ave Maria were added to them; he made use of this Rule of Devotion in his most pressing Occasions, and observed it to answer perfectly well (18). He was very angry with Polybius for denying the Apparition of Spirits, and such other Tenets of the Pagan Religion (19). In a Word, nothing can be more solid and serious, than the Reflexions he makes in his Twenty second Chapter, where he gives an Account of his Piety and Religion. Is that an impious Reason, he has given for his Love of Solitude? When I am alone, said he, I am then more especially with those I love, with GOD, and my good Angel. 'Diligo solitudinem, nunquam enim magis sum cum his quos vehementer diligo quam cum solus sum: diligo autem Deum, & spiritum bonum: hos dum solus sum contempler, immensum bonum, sapientiam æternam, lucis puræ principium & autorem, gaudium verum in nobis, ubi periculum non est ne nos deferat, veritatis fundamentum, amorem voluntarium, autorem omnium, qui beatus est in seipso, & beatorum omnium tutela & desiderium: Justitia profundissima seu altissima, mortuos curans, & viventium non oblitus. Spiritus autem mandato illius me defendens, misericors, consolator bonus, & in adversis auxiliator, & consolator (20).

----- I love Solitude, for I am never so much in the Company I like, as when I am alone. For I love GOD, and my good Angel. These, while I am alone, I contemplate, the infinite Good, the eternal Wisdom, the Fountain and Author of Science, the true Pleasure, which we need not fear losing, the Foundation of Truth, the Source of disinterested Love, the Creator of All Things, who is happy in himself, and the Patron and Protector of all who desire to be so: the most high and profound Justice, exerting itself on the Dead, and not forgetting the Living. And the Angel who, by his Command, is my Guardian, a kind and compassionate Counsellor, and Assistant, and Comforter in Adversity.

However, I would neither contradict nor affirm what I have read in Martin del Rio. That Author says, that Cardan writ a Book concerning the Mortality of the Soul, which he would sometimes shew to his particular Friends (21). This Book was never printed: on the contrary, the public has seen a Work of Cardan, on the Immortality of the Soul, wherein some are offended at his saying, that he was hindered by Fate and Warnings from declaring all his Thoughts upon that Subject. It is a sign, say they, he published this Book out of Policy, while he retained in his Heart all his Venom. 'Cum eo ipso opere (de Animarum Immortalitate) cap. 13. p. 280. aperte prodatur se ac monitis prohiberi reliqua dicere quæ de anima sentiret, suspicito est hunc polypum ad eam scripserit metu infamiae adactum, verè antequam tale quid scripsisset contra Animæ Immortalitatem quale nonnulli referunt, idque doctrinæ venenum ejus in pectore etiam post editum eum quem retuli librum delituisse (22). I believe this is a Mistake: Dr Parker, who has very happily represented Cardan's Follies and Extravagancies, takes him to have had more of the Fanatic in him than the Atheist. I think he is in the right: see the Seventy seventh Page of his Book de Deo. It cannot however be denied, that some very pernicious Doctrines are scattered up and down through Cardan's Works. Father Raynaud, in the place just cited, has mentioned some of them, and concludes with a Proscription of this Physician's Works, calling him the Head of the second Class of Atheists. Homo nullius religionis ac fidei, & inter clancularios Atheos secundi ordinis ævo suo facile princeps.

Scaliger, the Father, quotes some Words out of Cardan's Treatise of the Immortality of the Soul, which contain the very impiety of Averroës. Cardan maintains, that there is but one Intelligence in these sublunary Regions, and that this Intelligence, which is no farther humane, than as humane Matter is capable of receiving it, enters into Man, and is that which produces in him Intellectual Actions; that it also approaches and encompasses Brutes, but is not able to enter them by reason of the disproportion of their matter; from whence it comes that Man receives an inward Illumination, while it's Rays act only on Brutes from without (23). This is all the Difference Cardan allows between the humane and brutal Understanding: from whence it follows, that a Man's Soul has no higher perfections than that of Brutes, which is inferior to it only in regard to it's matter; and consequently that our Soul is as mortal as that of a Dog. We ought not to be surprized if we meet with other Principles in this Work of Cardan; for it is nothing but a heap of divers Pieces pillaged here and there out of the Books he had read of Pomponatius, Augustin Niphus, &c. 'Ne vero tibi placeas in illis tuis Commentariis (de immortalitate animæ) quos confusus diximus: nihil enim aliud sunt quam farrago præceptorum meorum, Pomponatii, Susepiani, Domitici de Flandria: quæ tua fecisti ridiculis fabellis declamatoriis (24)'. To conceal his Theft, he intermixed the Doctrines he stole from these Philosophers with some Declamations of his own. Thomasius might have added those Words of Scaliger to those he borrowed from Naudæus (25) to prove Cardan a Plagiary (26).

[E] He made a Voyage into Scotland in the Year 1552. He says, the Archbishop of St Andrews (27), Primate of the Kingdom, sent for him, after having in vain applied first to the Physicians of the French King, and then to those of the Emperour (28). This Prelate very generously defrayed the Expences of his Voyage. By this means Cardan had an Opportunity of seeing several Countries. He passed through France as he went, and returned through the Low-Countries, and through Germany along the Rhine (29). It was upon this occasion he went to London, where he calculated King Edward's Nativity, of which perhaps I shall speak in another Article.

Let us add, that this Archbishop, being then Forty two Years old, had been ill Ten Years (30). His Distemper was an Asthma, which for the two last Years returned every eight Days (31); before which time the Intervals had been considerably longer. The Patient grew better under Cardan's Advice (32); who, after staying with him Seventy five Days, took his Leave, and gave him such Directions as did within two Years compleat his Cure (33). This is all the Account he gives of this Voyage: Nor does he in the least boast of the Prediction I am going to mention. 'This Archbishop languished under a Dropfy which all his Physicians judged incurable, but Cardan restored him. - - If we may believe what History relates of this famous Astrologer, he gave his Patient, after he had cured him, a terrible Proof of his Skill, when taking his Leave of him, he told him, That he had perfectly cured him of his Distemper; but that it was not in the power of his Art to prevent his Fate, or hinder him from being hanged. The Event justified his Prediction: for he was hanged eighteen Years after *', according to the Sentence passed upon him by Mary the Queen Regent's Commissioners. It is no wonder if, after this, some Historians, especially Scottish, have treated Cardan as a Magician (34). Two Reasons induce me to distrust his having made this Prediction. I. The first is, that Cardan was too self-interested, and too well versed in the Tricks of Astrology, to threaten at this rate so great a Prelate

He continued Professor in this last Place, 'till the Year 1570; at which time he was put into Prison, but was carried home again some Months after. However this was not absolutely giving him his Liberty, for he was kept Prisoner in his own House, but this continued not long. He died at Rome, the Twenty first of September, 1575 (n), if we may rely upon Thuanus, who, perhaps, has not been over exact [F]. The Account is sufficient to satisfy the Reader, that Cardan was of a very inconstant Temper: but his fantastical Humour will better appear from the Relation he has given us himself of his own good and bad Qualities [G]. This very Ingenuity is a plain Proof that his Mind was of a very particular Cast [H]. He tells us (o), that if Nature did not give him some late. You never find Astrologers telling a great Man that his Stars have doomed him to an ignominious End: They rather promise him what they think he most earnestly desires; and it is by this they best intitle themselves to some of his Gold. From thence it comes, that great Men, to prevent being imposed upon, commonly consult these sort of People, without making themselves known to them. II. My second Reason is, That if Cardan had delivered this Prediction, he would certainly have boasted of it in that Book, where he gives an account of his Cure wrought upon this Archbishop; since it was not printed till some Years after that Prelate had undergone the Fate he is said to have threatened him with. Judge if Cardan would have suppressed so favourable an Instance of his Abilities in Astrology.

You will find in Melvil's Memoirs, that John Hamilton, Archbishop of St Andrews, and Brother to the Regent, of the Realm, fell 'so dangerously ill, that, being for some time speechless, no body thought he could recover, but that he was restored to his Speech and his Health, by the Assistance of an Italian Magician named Cardan (35).

(35) Melvil's Memoirs, pag. 45, Edit. of the Hague, 1694.

[F] He died — the twenty first of September 1575, if we believe Thuanus, who perhaps has not been over exact.] If Cardan died the twenty first of September 1575, he must have lived Seventy four Years all but three Days; and so Thuanus would make his Life a Year longer than it really was (36). Besides, it appears from several Passages in Cardan's History, that he was carrying it on during the Year 1575. Naudæus thought it went no farther than the Twenty eighth of April 1576; and consequently did not observe the hundred and fifty eighth Page, where we find the first of October 1576. Testaments plura condidi ad hanc usque diem quæ est Calendarum mensis Octobris anni MDLXXVI. — I made another Will, on this very Day, which is the first of October 1576. If this Number is right, Thuanus is mistaken both in the Day, and in the Year.

[G] But his fantastical Humour will better appear from the Relation he has given us himself of his own good and bad qualities.] Besides what I have said in the Body of this Article, I shall observe here, that his Gate was so irregular, that he must undoubtedly be taken for a Mad-man. Sometimes he walked very slowly, like one in deep Meditation, and then all of a sudden would redouble his Pace with several odd Postures. Incessus inequalis causa fuit cogitatio.

Abire in proverbium posset incessus meus, nam est inconsideratus; dum aliena ab his quæ præ oculis sunt meditor. — Ambulatio modo celeris, modo tarda, modo capite & humeris erectis, modo inclinat (37). He was mightily pleased at Bologna to appear in a Coach with three Wheels (38). Never was Man more singular in his dress. Thuanus, who saw him at Rome, remarks that he found him in a Habit quite different from other People (39). Poverty was the Cause of this oddness in his Habit; for instance, when Cardan was in Scotland, he bought such Cloaths as were there in Fashion: and at his return into Italy, not being able to buy others, nor willing to sell those to a Loser, he continued to wear them out. His fantastical Behaviour cannot be better represented than by some Verses in Horace, I am going to cite. He owns himself that they hit him exactly, and that if Horace had been to have

(40) Cardan. de Vita propria, cap. xx, pag. 82, 83.

This fickle Wretch is never of one Mind: Sometimes his hasty Steps out strip the Wind, As if he fear'd some Enemy behind: Now with slow Pace, he apes the solemn Priest, Who in Procession walks to Juno's Feast: His Equipage now counts Two hundred Men; And now that number is reduc'd to ten: Now with grand Airs, his Conversation rings Of nothing less than Governors and Kings: Now a clean Salt-Seller is all his Wish, And a small Table for one homely Dish: And as to Cloaths, however coarse and old, They're good enough, if they keep out the Cold.

If you would know the Cause, or rather Causes, I will tell you; first the great Variety of my Thoughts and Humours; then by way of healthful Exercise; again, being obliged by often changing my Habitation and Country to change my Cloaths, which I could neither afford to sell again to such a Loss, nor to keep them superfluously. Necessity became a Law. Cardan's Mind was as inconstant as his Body. See Thuanus's Words in the following Remark.

[H] This very Ingenuity is a plain proof that his Mind was of a very particular Cast. Thuanus observes it as a very extraordinary thing. Varia ejus vita, says he (41), & mores; pluraque ipse de se inaudita in viro literas professo simplicitate seu libertate scripsit, quam curiosus quisquam à me exigat. — His Life and manners were very inconsistent; and he writes many things of himself with an Ingenuity and Freedom, never before heard of in a Man of Letters, Instances of which may be given to any curious Person. He adds, that he was surprized to find him so much inferior to the great Reputation he had in the World. This made him admire the Judgment passed on him by Julius Cæsar Scaliger; That in some things Cardan appeared more than a Man, in others less than a Child. some painful Sensation, he procured it himself, by biting his Lips, and distorting his Fingers, 'till he shed Tears [I]; that sometimes he had a mind to kill himself [K]; that he took a delight to ramble all Night long in the Streets (p); that he never was immoderate in his Amours [L], but that, if he did at any time pursue them, further than was necessary, it did him no great Damage; that nothing pleased him better than to hold such Arguments as were disagreeable to the Company (q); that whatever he knew came out, whether it was proper or improper (r); that he also was befitted to Gaming, as to spend whole Days at it, to the no small Prejudice of his Family and Reputation (s), for he played away his very Household-goods, and his Wife's Jewels (t) [M]. These, and several other things, he relates with the greatest Simplicity. However I make no question that if his Life were faithfully written by another Hand, we should find a great many more dishonourable Particulars than he has given us in that he wrote himself, which yet contains several other more remarkable Instances of the Singularity of his Temper, than those I have mentioned. He speaks of abundance of Prodigies, which foretold him, sleeping or waking, what was to befall him: This made him believe that, like Socrates, and some other great Men, he was under the Care of a particular Genius [N]. What shall we say of those four extraordinary Gifts Nature had endowed him with [O]? Which were, 1. That he could fall into an Ecstasy ‘conspicaci & allocuti, ac sæpius admirati sumus, cum celeberrimi tot scriptis hominis recordatio fubiret; neque tamen quidquam in eo quod tantæ famæ responderet animadverteremus: eoque magis Julii Cæsaris Scaligeri acerrimum judicium suspexit, qui divinum ingenium suum in opere de subtilitate exagitando, præcipuè exercuit inæqualitate illius ubique diligenter notata, qui in quibdam interdum plus homine sapere, in pluribus minus pueris intelligere videatur (42).’ We shall see in the Remark [T] that he was thought subject to Fits of Lunacy.

[I] If Nature did not give him some painful Sensation, he procured it himself, by biting his Lips, - - - still he shed Tears.] This is not so much to be wondered at, when we know the reason of it; he did it only to avoid a greater Mischiefe: For if at any time he happened to be without Pain, he was subject to such violent and dangerous Sallies or Impetuosities of Mind, as were much more insupportable than Pain itself. This is most to be wondered at, and appears almost incredible. ‘Fuit mihi mos (de quo plures admirabantur) ut causas doloris si non haberem, quaererem, ut dixi de podagra: unde plerumque causis moribificis obviam ibam (ut solum devitarem quantum possem vigilias) quod arbitrarer voluptatem consistere in dolore præcedenti sedato: si ergo voluntarius sit dolor, facile sedari poterit: & quoniam exterior me nunquam posset prorsus carere dolore, & si modo contingat, subit in animum impetus quidam adeo molestus, ut nihil possit esse gravius, ut multo minus malus sit dolor, aut doloris causa, in qua nulla prorsus inest turpitudine, periculumve. Itaque ob hoc morsum labii, & digitorum distorsionem, & compressionem cutis, ac tenuis musculi brachii finistri ulque ad lachrymas excogitavi (43).’ In another place he says, that under his greatest Uneasinesses of Mind, he used to whip himself severely, and bite his left Arm: In maximis animi doloribus crura verberabam virga, sinistram brachium mordebam acriter, jejunabam, levabam fletu multum, ubi contigisset flere, sed persæpe non poteram (44).

[K] Sometimes he had a mind to kill himself.] This he calls an Heroic Passion, and believes that several others have been possessed with it, though they have never owned it. ‘Laboravi interdum etiam amore Heroico, ut me ipsum trucidare cogitarem, verum talia etiam aliis accidere suspicor, licet hi in libros non referant (45).’

[L] He was not immoderate in his Amours.] These are his words: Veneri neque immoderate incubui, nec ex superfluo usu multum læsus sum, nunc tamen manifeste ventriculum labefactat. — I was never immoderate in my Amours, nor much hurt if I happened to pursue them farther than was proper, but at present the use of Women is very prejudicial to my Stomach. Observe, that, in the Title of his fourth Chapter, he says, he has brought his History down to the end of October 1575: since therefore he says, at present the use of Women is very prejudicial to my Stomach: it follows, that even at Seventy four Years of Age he sometimes followed that Game. So that he found some Amends for the Ten Years of Insufficiency he so much regretted; for perhaps he would have made so bad a use of them, as upon that account to have ended his Days before he had come to sixty.

[M] He played away his - - - Household Goods and his Wife's Jewels (46).] He observes, that the Misery, to which he found himself reduced, never forced him to do any thing unworthy his Birth and his Virtue, and that one of the ways he took to gain a subsistence, was writing Almanacks, Ephemérides scribebam (47). He tells us, that, having lost all his Money at Venice in a Man's House who had cheated him of it, he gave him a Cut over the Face with his Dagger, took away not only his own Money, but also that of his wounded Host, got the Door opened to him, and marched off. He had also lost his Rings, and his Cloaths, but had won them again (48). We must not forget, that in consideration of the Wound he had given to this Sharper, he threw down part of his Money upon the Floor. These are Particulars no more honorable to his Memory, than what he tells us of the Professor Curcius, who indicted him for Felony, because Cardano would not restore something which had been left him in Pawn: His Plea was, that he stopped it as a Security for some Money Curcius had borrowed of him without any Witness. Ab eodem Curcio de furto accusatus, quod pignus retinerem pro sponsione pecuniariam quam sine teste fecerat (49). What a Dispute is here! A couple of Scholars contending like a Turk and a Jew.

[N] He believed that - - - he was under the care of a particular Genius.] I should not doubt but he had reason to believe so, could I believe all he reports to be true; which in my Opinion is not to be accounted for, purely by the general Laws of the Union of the Soul with the Body. However it be, there are some People think he was very much undetermined as to that Point. ‘He speaks so differently of his Genius, that after he had in one of his Dialogues, intitled Tetini, said positively that he had one which was Venerial with a Mixture of Saturn and Mercury, and in his Book de Libris propriis, that he communicated himself to him by Dreams; yet in the very same place he makes a doubt whether he had one or no, or whether it was not the Excellence of his Nature. Sentiebam, says he, seu ex Genio mihi præfesto, seu quod natura mea in extremitate humanæ substantiæ conditionisque & in confinio immortalium posita esset, &c. And concludes at last, in his Book De Rerum Varietate, that he had none at all; declaring ingenuously, Ego certe nullum Dæmonem aut Genium mihi adesse cognosco (50). See what the same Naudæus says upon this Subject, in his Judicium de Cardano, printed with Cardano's Life.

[O] What shall we say of those four extraordinary Gifts Nature had endowed him with? This he affirms after so positive a manner, that it is worth while to consider his own Words. ‘Quatuor mihi indita sunt à Natura, quæ nunquam aperire volui, &

Extasy whenever he pleased. 2. That he could see whatever he pleased. 3. That he forefaw in his Sleep what was to befall him. And, 4. That he could foretel it likewise by certain Marks which appeared on his Nails. It has been a Question, whether or no he believed the Immortality of the Soul (u). & omnia (meo iudicio) admiratione digna. Quorum primum hoc est quod quoties volo, extra sensum quasi in ecstasim transeo. - - Sentio dum eam in eo, ac (ut verius dicam) facio, iuxta cor quandam separationem, quasi anima abscederet, totique corpori res hæc communicatur, quasi ostiolum quoddam aperiretur. Et initium huius est à capite, maxime cerebello, diffunditurque per totam dorsum spinam, vi magna continetur; hocque solum sentio, quod sum extra meipsum: magnaque quadam vi paululum me contineo. Secundum est, quod cum volo, video quæ volo, oculis, non vi mentis: velut imagines illas, de quibus dixi, cum infans essem, me vidisse. Sed nunc credo ob occupationes, nec diu, nec perfectas, nec omnino semper cum volo, nec tamen nisi velim. Moventur autem perpetuo quæ videntur imagines. Itaque video lacos, animalia, orbes, ac quæcunque cupio. Credo causam esse, vim virtutis imaginatricis, visusque subtilitatem. Tertium est, quod omnium quæ mihi ventura sunt, imaginem video per somnum. Neque unquam ausim ferre dicere, vere autem dicere possum, meminisse, quod quicquam boni aut mali vel mediocris mihi evenierit, de quo prius & raro ante multum, non fuerim per somnum præmonitus. Quartum est, quod eorum, quæ mihi eventura sunt, quanquam sint perexigua, vestigia in unguibus apparent. Nigra & livida malarum in medio digito, felicitum alba: & ad honores in pollice, ad divitias in indice, ad studia & res majoris momenti in annulari, ad exiguas inventiones in minimo: coacta, res firmas: si sint veluti stellæ, res minus constantes, & magis publicas verbiique plenas (51). — Nature has favoured me with four Endowments: which I would never reveal, all of them, in my Judgment, very extraordinary. Whereof the first is, that, whenever I please, I can transport myself out of my Senses into an Extasy. — In the doing which I feel near my Heart a sort of Separation, as if my Soul departed, and this Affair is communicated to my whole Body, as it were by the opening of a Door. The beginning of it is from my Head, principally the Cerebellum, and so diffuses itself all along the Spine of my Back, and is not stop without great Resistance; all I perceive is, that I am beside myself, and I can just contain myself a little with a certain considerable Force. The second is, that I can at any time see whatever I please, with my Eyes, not by force of Imagination; as those Images I have mentioned my seeing when I was a Child. I can therefore see Groves, Animals, Worlds, and whatever I please. I take the Cause to be the Strength of my conceptive Faculty, and the Quickness of my Sight. The third is, that I see, in my Sleep, the Representation of all that is to happen to me. And I dare almost say, I am sure I might very truly say, that I never remember any Thing happening to me either good, bad, or indifferent, of which I had not been forewarned in a Dream. The fourth is, that whatever is to happen to me is signified by Appearances on my Nails. Black and livid Specks on those of my middle Finger signify Misfortune, white the contrary: and on my Thumb Honours, on my fore Finger Riches, on my Ring-Finger Study, and Discoveries of Importance, on my little Finger Inventions of the lowest Class: if the Speck is close and even, it betokens lasting good Fortune, but if spread, and something like a Star, it is a Sign of such as will not be very much to be depended on, but rather of more public Nature, and consisting of Promises. We must take notice, that during these voluntary Extasies, he felt not the most acute Fits of the Gout, and if any one spoke near him, he could hear a little the Sound of the Words, but understood not their Signification. For the rest, he never would boast of these four Singularities: but at last this grand Secret was too hard for him, and so he revealed it to the Public in one of his Works.

(51) Cardanus, de Rerum Varietate, lib. viii, cap. 43.

[P] He was unfortunate in his Family.] His eldest Son, falling in Love with a Woman not worth a Groat, married her, and repented of his Bargain when it was too late. Instead of taking all patiently, since it was of his own seeking, he had recourse to a very criminal Remedy, and poisoned his Wife. He was punished for it according to his Deserts; Sentence being passed upon him to lose his Head, which was executed at Midnight (52), in the Prison (53). Cardan's other Son was a Rogue and a Villain. His own Father was forced to throw him into Gaol more than once (54), to cut off one of his Ears (55), and at last to turn him out of Doors, and disinherited him (56). Cardan's Daughter gave him only two occasions of Uneasiness, the first when he was obliged to pay her Fortune (57); the second when he saw she had no Children. He was so affected with the unfortunate End of his eldest Son, that he almost died with Grief; there were even some of the Judges condemned the Son, out of an Expectation that it would cost the Father either his Life or his Reason. * Confessi sunt quidam è Senatu (sed puto non de seipsis intelligi voluisse) ea spe damnasse illum ut dolore interirem aut infanrem, ab unoque quam parum abfuerim, superi norunt. — sed non successit (58). The most extraordinary Thing is, that Cardan, who did not deny but that his Son had poisoned his Wife, and which his Son himself confessed at his Trial (59), imagined the Divine Justice pursued his Judges for their unjust Sentence, and that many of them came to an unfortunate End (60). He pretended, that his Son, being drawn into marry a Wife, who, having neither Fortune nor Honour, made no scruple to cuckold him, was not to blame in murdering her.

[2] He has been justly condemned for calculating the Nativity of JESUS CHRIST.] Naudæus makes two Observations upon this Fact. I. He reproves Joseph Scaliger for believing, that Cardan was the first who attempted any thing of this Nature. II. He observes, that Cardan had the Vanity, rather to pass for the Inventor, than to justify himself by the Example of others who had gone before him, in this prophane Enterprize.

As to the first Point, he begins by citing Scaliger's own Words; which are these. * Audi subtilitatem nostri sæculi: extitit ante 44. annos cymbalum genethliacorum, qui Domini nostri Jesu Christi thema edidit, & omnia quæ illi acciderunt, ex positu Stellarum, necessario illi contigisse ratiocinatur: impiam dicam magis, an jocularum audaciam, quæ & dominum stellarum stellis subjecerit, & natum eo tempore putarit, quod adhuc in lite positum est, ut vanitas cum impietate certaret (62). — Observe the Subtlety of our Age: about Forty four Years ago appeared a most jingling Fortuneteller, who published the Scheme of JESUS CHRIST's Nativity, and undertook to prove that all these things, which happened to him, necessarily came to pass from the Position of the Stars: an Attempt which I cannot tell whether to call more impious or ridiculous, in subjecting the Lord of the Stars to the Power of the Stars, and in supposing him to be born at a precise Point of Time, which has never yet been fixed, so that the whole seems a Struggle betwixt Vanity and Impiety. Afterwards Naudæus quotes four Authors, who, long before Cardan, had been calculating CHRIST's Nativity. The most modern of them is Tiberius Ruffianus Sextus of Calabria, who lived under the Pontificate of Leo X. He undertook publicly to maintain Four hundred Proposi-

said to have been often times confirmed by the Event [R]; but he owns, that, in relation to himself, his Art had proved false (*). Some say, that Cardan having foretold he should die at a certain Time, he abstained from Nourishment, that his Death might verify his Prediction [S], and his Life not disgrace the Art. He was therefore afraid of surviving the Falsity of his Prognostics, and so tender of his Honour, that he could not endure the Reproach of having proved a false Prophet, and wronged his Profession. Few People, in the like Case, stand up with so much Courage and Affection for the Honour of their Art. They take Comfort, and are neither ashamed nor discomposed (y). He writ a very great many Books; for the Edition of his Works at Lyons, in 1663, contains ten Volumes in Folio. His Poverty contributed to this multitude of Writings, which frequently puzzle his Readers by their Digressions and Obscurity [T]. He did not write so many Volumes

tions at Bologna, Florence, and Padua: The Monks condemned twelve of them, as favouring of Heresy; of which this was one of the principal: 'Christum quoad corporis compaginem elementariam astris suppositum, ejusque genituram, & Prophetam magnam, & ea quæ circa corporis evenerant, præsertim violentum ejus mortis genus, nuntiasse non inconvenient. — That CHRIST, as to the elementary Composition of his Body, was subject to the Stars, and that there is no Inconveniency in calculating his Nativity, and shewing the Necessity of his being a great Prophet, and of all those things which happened to his Body, particularly his violent Death.' The Author of these Theses, being nettled at their Censures, published a Book called Apologeticus adversus cuullatos, in which he published the Scheme of CHRIST's Nativity, in three different Figures. Tria Christi geneseos ibemata secundum tres rationabiles differentium doctorum opiniones luculentem enarravit (63). Before him, Peter d'Ailli, Cardinal, and Bishop of Cambrey, who died under the Pontificate of Martin V, was not content to maintain, that Judgment might be made of CHRIST's Birth from Astrological Observations, but proposed the very Scheme of his Nativity. Præterquam contendit Christi nativitatem præosci potuisse ex genealogicis observationibus, ejusdam insuper nativitatibus Schema cælestis proposuit in elucidario Astronomicæ concordia (64). Albertus Magnus, before Peter d'Ailli, had maintained, that the Rules of Astrology took place, even in calculating the Nativity of our Saviour. Albumasar, more ancient than Albertus Magnus, had made a great many Observations relating to JESUS CHRIST, according to the Principles of Astrology. Here are four Authors produced by Naudæus; some of which have been cited by Roger Bacon, Picus Mirandulanus, and Robert Holkot; from whence he concludes, that Thuanus (65), and Scaliger were in the wrong, to believe Cardan the Author of this blasphemous Attempt. 'Unde mirari satis non possum illos non visos, nec auditos unquam fuisse duobus illis eruditiorum Coryphæis Thuanus & Scaliger, qui saltem ex Bacchone, Picco Mirandulano, aut commentariis Roberti Holkot in Sapientiam Salomonis, dicere potuissent, erratum à nonnullis ante Cardanum hunc errorem fuisse, ut Christum falsis, & commentitiis astrorum imaginibus submitterent: nec propterea æquum esse ut Cardanus, quasi sceleris istius primus opifex fuerit, tam acerbe ab illis vapulet (66). Without going so high, they might have read in Sixtus Senensis what Cardinal d'Ailli had thought upon that Subject (67).

(63) Naudæus in Judicio de Cardano.

(65) These are Thuanus's Words. Extreme amentia fuit, imo impie audacie astrorum commentitiis legibus astrorum Dominum velle subijcere, quod ille tamen exarata Servitoris nostri genitura fecit. — It was extreme Madness, nay and most impious Audaciousness, to endeavour to subject the Lord of the Stars to their pretended Influence, which he has yet done by drawing the Scheme of our Saviour's Nativity. & in discrimen capitis veniret, vel minimam de illis auctoribus mentionem injicere, maluitque de sua impietate tot rumores disseminari, quam ex opinione tam audacis facti partam gloriam amittere (68).

[R] His Astrological Predictions are said to have been oftentimes confirmed by the Event.] Thuanus says, Cardan brought Astrology into Credit by his good Success in his Horoscopes. 'Judiciaria quam vocant fidem apud multos adstruxit, dum certiora per eam quam ex arte possint plerumque promeretur (69). But Naudæus will not agree to this Fact, but refers us to Scaliger and Alexander de Angelis, who have related, that Cardan's chief Horoscopes were directly contrary to the Events (70). Cardan owns himself, that by the Knowledge he had in Astrology, he was persuaded he should never exceed his fortieth Year, or at least, that he should never arrive to his Forty fifth; and that this was also the Opinion of all who knew him. He adds, that this Persuasion was very prejudicial to him. 'Astrologia cognitio quam tum habebam, & ut mihi videbatur, & omnes aiebant me non excessum XL. vitæ annum, certe non ad XLV. perventurum multum obfuit (71).

[S] He abstained from Nourishment, that his Death might confirm his Prediction.] Thuanus says this was the common Opinion. 'Cum tribus diebus minus septuagesimum quintum annum implevisset, eodem quo prædixerat anno & die, videlicet xi. Kalend. Octobri defecit, ob id, ne falleret, mortem suam inedia accelerasse creditus (72). — When he was within three Days of finishing his Seventy fifth Year, in the same Year, and on the same Day he had foretold, viz. the Twenty first of September, he departed this Life, being thought to have hastened his Death by starving himself to make good his Prediction.' Scaliger relates it as a Matter of Fact: I shall recite his own Words, after having observed, that Cardan's Father died in the same manner, in the Year 1524. He refused all Sustenance, and lived so for nine Days (73). He had white Eyes, could see in the Dark, and never had any occasion for Spectacles (74). These are Scaliger's Words. 'Idem Genethliacum quum multis ante annis diem & horam mortis suæ determinasset, & appetente tempore nihilo minus bene valeret, quanquam jam octogenario major, ne artem contumeliæ exponeret, inedia constituit mori. Quodnecio serius, an citius ante constitutum ab eo tempus contigerit. Res nota est: neque nostrum est mentiri. Omnino fecit, quod ille in Epigrammate, ἀσχυρὸς ἢ τρώσις ἀπὸ γέλας. Volumes without stealing from others (z). As to writing his own Life, he justifies it by the Example of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius (aa). Naudæus concurs with him in the same Justification (bb); tho' it is certain the Instance is ill alledged; for the Piece, attributed to that Emperor, is not his Life, but a Collection of Moral Instructions for his own Use. Some say Naudæus writ a Life of Cardan; but they are mistaken; he only published a Discourse, wherein he gives us his Judgment of the Character of that Man. He could not forbear saying he was a Madman [U]; though he does him Justice in other respects as to his Wit, his Learning, &c. Scaliger, the Father, writ against Cardan, and imagined, without reason, that his Book was the cause of his Death [X].

in his Arithmetic, several Discourses upon the Motion of the Planets, upon the Creation, and upon the Tower of Babel: In his Logic, his Thoughts upon the Historians and Letter-Writers. He owns these Digressions were made on purpose to fill up the Page; for he had so much a Sheet from the Book-feller, and he writ as much for his livelihood as for his Reputation. 'Ut missos faciam (excursus) quos de rebus suis frequentissimos habet: eo tantum fine, quemadmodum alicubi fatetur, ut plura folia Typographis mitteret, quibuscum antea de illorum pretio pepigerat; atque hoc modo fami, non secus ac famæ scriberet (76).' As to his Obscurity, the Author, last quoted, gives some Reasons for it (77), and this among others, that Cardan imagined a great many Things, which were familiar to him, wanted not to be expressed; besides, his quick capacious Genius passed readily from one thing to another, without troubling himself with explaining the Medium and Connection between the two Extremes. He is not the only Author guilty of this Fault.

[U] Naudæus could not forbear saying he was a Madman.] The Opinion Seneca ascribes to Aristotle, that your greatest Wits have all a Mixture of Madness, nullum magnum ingenium sine mixtura dementiæ (78), does not hold good as to Cardan; we must not say of him, that his great Wit had a Mixture of Madness; but on the contrary, that his Madness had a Mixture of great Wit: His Wit was only an Appendix, an Accessory, to his Madness. They, who think I aggravate the Matter, may, if they please, follow the Sentiment of Naudæus: I consent to it; he agrees with them, who hold Cardan to have lived almost like a Madman, 'Ut mittam aliorum etiam gravissimorum virorum judicia, qui Cardanum miras de seipso fabulas concitasse, & infanti proximum vixisse non perperam asserunt (79). The prodigious Contradictions, adds he, we meet with in his Works, are infallible Signs that he was not always in his right Senses. They can neither be ascribed to want of Memory, nor to Cunning. The little Coherence there is in his Variations, is a Consequence of the different Fits of Extravagance with which he was seized. 'Enimvero non semper eum compotem fuisse, sed æstu quodam raptum, indicio est omnium certissimo, varietas illa pugnantium inter se sententiarum, quas non est quod aliquis oblivione eorum quæ jam dixerat, aut astu, vafriæque prolatis ab eo fuisse, sibi persuadeat, cum se in rebus aliis memorem ad miraculum usque præstiterit; & artis ac vafriæ suspicionem omnem elevet, quod grandia quidem, sed contraria semper, nunquam autem connexa, & sibi mutuo coherentia loqueretur (80).' The scandalous Things he has published of himself, are another great Argument of his Madness. He might have brought his Action against any Poet who had treated him so barbarously. He confesses his Stars had given him an impious, revengeful, treacherous, magical, calumniating Soul, addicted to all sorts of Impurities, and full of an infinite number of shameful Faults, all which he specifies. 'Ingenium si quis inimicus tale illi affinxisset quale suum esse in themate natalitio testatus est, potuisset in illum agere merito ea læge Pœna, quæ lata, malo quæ nollit carmine quemquam decipi. Nam ex Venere loci Lunæ ac Mercurii domina, & Mercurio multum, Saturno mediocriter commissa animum sibi effusum ait, in diem viventem, nugacem, religionis contemptorem, &c (81). Naudæus pretends Cardan was the very Man he represented himself to be; but I should rather think he meant only to show what the malign Influences of his Stars would have subjected him to, had he not undertaken to correct them; for he owns the Arts of Divination were frustrated in his own Case. According to the Rules of Chiromancy, he was judged to be of a heavy Wit, ut Chiromantici rudem esse pronunciarint ac stupidum, inde ubi norunt puduerit (82); and by the Rules of Astrology, he was to have died before he was Forty five Years old (83). Every one knows how Socrates justified the Physiognomist, who had ascribed to him so many Defects. We must not forget, first, That Naudæus maintains, that Cardan, who boasted he never was guilty of a Lie, was a very great Liar. This he proves upon him in several Particulars. Secondly, That Dr Parker is of Naudæus's Opinion, in relation to Cardan's Madness, the chief Signs of which he enumerates (84).

(84) Parker, Disputat. de Deo, §. 25.

[X] Scaliger, the Father, writ against Cardan, and imagined, without reason, that his Book was the Cause of his Death.] It may be said, without the least prejudice to Probability, that the Hope of acquiring a great Name from his Adversary's Reputation, provoked Scaliger to write against Cardan. If he had not been so much possessed with the Spirit of Contradiction, he had gained more Honour than he did in this Combat; but what the Greeks called ἀμετρία τῆς ἀνδραγαθίας, an excessive Passion of opposing others, did Scaliger a great deal of harm. For upon this Principle he maintained that the Parrot was a very ugly Creature. If Cardan had said so, Scaliger would have objected to him the Testimonies of the ancient Poets, concerning the Beauty of this Bird. Vossius has made a judicious Observation upon this perverse Humour in Scaliger, and shown at the same time wherein these two Antagonists were superior and inferior to each other. 'Scaliger, in Exercitat. 246, quia Cardanus Phittacum commendat à colorum varietate, ac præterea fulgore, quod & Apuleius facit in secundo Floridorum, contra contendit esse deformem, non modo ob fœditatem rostri, ac crurum, & linguæ, sed etiam quia fit coloris fuscæ, ac cinericiæ, qui tristis. Quid faciamus summo viro? Si Cardanus ea dixisset, provocasset ad judicia Poëtarum: atque adeo omnium hominum. Nunc quia pulchri dixit coloris, ille deformis contendit. Hoc contradictionis studium, quod ubique in hinc exercitationibus se prodit, Sophistâ dignius est quam Philosopho. Majorem etiam modestiam, dum falsè adeo tractat Cardanum, merito passim requiras: præsertim si cogites, scribere adversus virum summum, studiis quidem Humanitatis, & Metaphysicæ non paulò inferior; at non scientia naturæ, matheseos autem omnibus disciplinis, in quibus parum omnino Scaliger videbat, albis quod dicitur equis prævertentem (85). - - - - - Scaliger, in his Two hundred and forty sixth Exercitation, because Cardan had commended the Parrot for the Brightness and Variety of its Colours, as Apuleius has also done in his second Florida, undertakes on the contrary to prove its Deformity, not only from the ugliness of its Beak, Tongue, and Legs, but also from its brown, ash, and dull Colour. What is to be done with this Great Man? Had Cardan said this, he would have appealed against him to the Judgments of the Poets, and of all Mankind. But now because Cardan declares this Bird beautiful, he will have it ugly. This Spirit of Contradiction, which appears every where in his Exercitations, is fitter for a Sophist than a Philosopher. And he must be allowed very much wanting in Modesty, to treat Cardan so bitterly: especially if it be considered, that he writes against so great an Adversary, who was very little his Inferior in Humanity and Metaphysics; but in natural Philosophy

I shall make an Addition concerning his Book De Subtilitate, which Julius Cæsar Scaliger refuted (cc) [2].

'and Mathematics, which Scaliger knew very little of, far his Superior.' Naudæus is still more offended at Scaliger than Vossius: He blames him for resolving not to read the second Edition of Cardan's Book. This Reflexion is very just. For how unreasonable is that Critic, who, rather than lose the Labour he has been at in marking down Faults, publicly arraigns a Writer for Errors he has already corrected? Now Scaliger printed his Book two Years after the second Edition of his Adversary. He was afraid of finding, in this second Edition, several Passages corrected; this would have fouled the Pleasure he had met with in finding Faults, and deterred him from publishing his Criticisms on Errors no longer to be found in Cardan's Book: He thought it therefore his best way not to read the second Edition at all. This is Naudæus's first Remark. 'Nam primum quis ferat Scaligerum exercitationes suas triennio post secundam librorum de subtilitate editionem invulgasse, nec tamen illam videre voluisse, nec mendis illis pepercisse, quæ postrema hac diligentia sublata à Cardano fuerant, ne videlicet laboris sui quantumvis frustra impensis fructum amitteret.' His second Remark is, 'That Cardan justified himself so well, that if there were any Objections left unanswered, they were to be looked upon as little or nothing. Præterea quis nescit Cardanum, actione prima in calumniatorem librorum de subtilitate, sic omnes illius aculeos retulisse, objectiones diluissse, accusationes infregisse, ut earum ratio haberetur non debeat, quæ superesse forsan ex tanto numero possent: nam homo fuit Cardanus, & humani à se nihil alienum putavit: nec adeo mirum est illum errasse, quin multo magis admiratione dignum sit, tam rarò, & in tam paucis, ac minimis celsitasse.' He remarks, in the third place, that Scaliger, during the nine Years he spent in this Criticism, committed more Errors himself, than he censured in Cardan. 'Imò verò ausim ego pignore deposito contendere multo plures nævos esse, quos Scaliger exercitationibus suis inimicis reliquit, quam eos quibus adversus Cardanum tam procaciter exagrandis totos novem annos insudavit.' IV. Lastly, he remarks, that Scaliger's Motive was not so much the Love of Truth, as a Passion of opposing whatever was then most eminent in the Republic of Letters. 'Non tam eruditi veritatis studio, quam ut effroeni desiderio suo satisfaceret, cum illis omnibus congrederendi, quos suo tempore literarum eruditionumque principes haberi cognoverat.' To these four Remarks may be added a fifth, which is, that Scaliger imagined his Criticisms had killed poor Cardan. Upon this he writ a Preface full of laboured Reflexions (86); he loaded Cardan with Encomiums, and expressed a mighty Regret for having gained a Victory that cost the learned World so considerable a Man, &c. The Truth is, Cardan out-lived Scaliger fifteen or twenty Years, and, by Naudæus's second Remark, we may guess whether he had reason to be so much afflicted at Scaliger's Book.

(86) It is at the end of his Orations against Erasmus, Edition of Toulouze, 1620, pag. 63. It was not designed to serve for a Preface to the sixteen Books Exercitationum exercitiorum, as we find it in the History of Cardan, pag. 334; but to the sixteenth Book.

[§ (a) There were two Editions of the Book de Subtilitate published in Scaliger's Life-time; the first at Nuremberg, 1550, in Folio, and the second at Basil, in 1554, also in Folio; and this last was corrected and enlarged by the Author in more than Two thousand two hundred Places, as the Title Page has it. And therefore, if Scaliger, in his Exercitationes, has criticised Passages which Cardan had corrected in the Edition of 1554, he had good reason to complain of it, and Mr Naudé and Mr Bayle justly approve of his Complaint. But this Complaint does not relate to the Passage of which Mr de la Monnoie speaks in the new Edition of the Menagiana, Tom. iv. pag. 305. That scandalous Passage which is in the Two hundred fifty fourth Page of the first Edition is to be found, without any Alteration, in pag. 354 of the second Edition, and the Passage in question was not corrected till the third Edition at Basil, in 1560, in 8vo, newly Corrected and Augmented in above a thousand Places. REM. CRIT.]

[2] I shall make an Addition concerning the Book de Subtilitate, which Scaliger refuted.] Cardan belloyed but eight Months in writing it, and gave it to John Petreus, Bookseller of Nuremberg, to print. He dedicated it to Ferdinand de Gonzague, Governor of the Milanese. The first Edition was in Folio, and dated in the Year 1550 (87); and yet the Author declares in an Epistle Dedicatory, dated at Paris, the Twenty first of April, 1552, that since the first Edition he had spent three Years in correcting and enlarging the Work. Quos octo mensium spatio absolvam, perpetuo triennio emendati atque aucti in publicum sub nomine tuo prodirent. This is the Epistle Dedicatory of the second Edition, and is addressed to the same Ferdinand de Gonzague. I mean by the second Edition, that which was published after the first revising that Work, in the beginning of the Year 1554 (88). That of Nuremberg had already been counterfeited at Lyons. Scaliger's Book against that Edition appeared in 1557, and yet Cardan objects that his Adversary had employed about nine Years in criticising it (89). He made a second Revival of his Work, and gave it to be printed with his new Corrections and Additions to a Bookseller of Basil (90), and subjoined to it an Answer to Scaliger. It was intitled, Hieronymi Cardani in Calumniatorem Librorum de Subtilitate Actio prima, and is only a general Answer, without descending to Particulars. As Ferdinand de Gonzague was no longer living, the Author sought a new Patron. He dedicated this third Edition to Don Gonzales Ferrand of Corduba, Duke of Suesfa. He has not dated his Epistle Dedicatory, but I believe it was written in the Year 1560. I have however seen the Epistle Dedicatory of the second Edition, in a Copy printed at Basil, in Folio, ex Officina Petrinâ, 1560. The Actio prima in Calumniatorem was at the end of this Copy. I do not believe Cardan revised his Book any more after this: there are no Appearances of a third Revival in the Edition of Henric Petri, in 1582, in 8vo (91). I have an Edition of Lyons, apud Bartholomæum Honoratum, 1580, in 8vo, which is according to the first Revival. The Actio in Calumniatorem is not in it. The extreme Negligence in this Bookseller of Lyons is very remarkable; who did not know that within twenty Years there had been published a much better Edition than that he had counterfeited. There was a French Translation of this Book of Cardan, done by Richard le Blanc, and printed at Paris, in the Year 1556, in 4to (92).

CARION (JOHN), Professor of the Mathematics in the University of Frankfurt upon the Oder, was born at Buetickeim, in Germany (a). He published Ephemerides from the Year 1536, to 1550. He put out another Book called Prædictæ Astrologica (b). He gained but little Reputation from these two Pieces; but he became famous for a Chronicle in which he had no Hand [A], and which the Protestants

[A] He became famous for a Chronicle in which he had no Hand.] It has been often printed, and translated into several Languages. This is the Account of it. Carion having written a Chronicle, had a mind to have it printed at Wittemberg, but was desirous Melancthon should first correct it. Melancthon, instead of correcting it, composed a new one, which he published under Carion's Name at Wittemberg. It was written in High-Dutch, and translated into Latin, in 1538, by Herman Bonnus, Minister at Lubec, and Principal of the College (1). Melancthon observing how well this Book was received, after having revised and enlarged it, published a new Latin Version, in 1558 (2). He published testants extolled at a high rate [B]. He died at Berlin, in the Year 1538 (c). (c) Id. ibid. pag. 105. Mr lished it two Years after, with an Addition of a second Part. It then consisted of three Books: the two first contained the first Part, extending from the beginning of the World down to our Lord Jesus CHRIST. The third Book contained the second Part, from Augustus down to Charlemagne, exclusively. Peucer, after his Father-in-law Melancthon's Death, continued the Work, and published, in 1562, a fourth Book, from Charlemagne to Frederic II. About three Years after he printed a fifth Book, which ended with the Death of Maximilian, in 1519. In 1572, he published an Edition of the whole (3), I mean of what was written by himself, and by Melancthon, and promised a Continuation of it down to his own Time (4), but was never so good as his Word. The Edition I have of Carion's Chronicle is that at Geneva, printed in 8vo, 1625 (5), containing, in an Appendix, the Abridgment of the History from the Coronation of Charles V. to the Death of Rodolphus in 1612. Eusebius Menius has translated this Chronicle into High Dutch (6). Simon Goulart printed a French Translation in 1579, and published a second Edition in 1595, adding each time a Supplement of his own down to his own Days. I shall take notice presently of the French Version of John de Blond.

We are to observe, that Carion's Manuscript was sent to Melancthon, in 1531. This appears by a Letter from the latter (7). I will here insert a long Passage out of it, because it serves to give us a Character of our Carion. 'Accepi tuam disputationem de prædictionibus Carionis. Quamquam autem iste vehementer affirmat, se nihil præter fiderum positum in consilium adhibere, tamen multis non satis persuadet hoc. Et ars meo quoque judicio non potest tam disertè de singularibus eventibus pronuntiare, sed vir est, quantum ego quidem cognovi, Candidus, & Sævicæ simplicitatis plurimum referens. Misit huc Carionem excudenda, sed ea lege ut ego emendarem. Sunt multa scripta negligentius. Itaque ego totum opus retexo, & quidem Germanicè, & confitui complecti præcipuas mutationes maximorum imperiorum. --- I have received your Disputation on Carion's Predictions: Though he declares very earnestly, that he has formed them solely from the Position of the Stars, yet he has not prevailed on many to believe him. And indeed, in my Opinion, it is not in the Power of that Art to pronounce so exactly on particular Events; but the Author appears, as far as I can judge of him, to be a Man of candour, and to discover a great deal of the Schwabian Simplicity. He sent his Chronicle hither to be printed, but upon condition that I should revise it. But I find it a very hasty Work: And have therefore now formed the whole Work in the German Language, and comprised in it the principal changes of the most considerable Empires.' By this it appears, Melancthon new moulded the Work he was desired to correct. We shall see, by and by, he made but one Blot of Carion's whole Manuscript, and that nevertheless he was willing that the Chronicle he substituted in its place, should appear under Carion's Name; and That not only in the German Edition of Wittenberg, in 1531, but also in the following ones in Latin, which he corrected and augmented. The same was observed after his Death, in Peucer's Continuations. Read what follows: 'Nomen Chronici Carionis retinui, quod mutare illud autor primus sanctæ beatæque memorie Philippus Melancthon, fover meus noluit. Ocasio nominis hujus inde extitit, quod cum Joannes Carion Mathematicus ante annos quadraginta cœpisset contexere Chronicum, & recognoscendum illud, atque emendandum, priusquam prælo subiceretur, misisset ad Philippum Melancthonem, hic, quod parum probaretur, totum aboluit unâ liturâ, alio conscripto, cui tamen Carionis nomen præfixit: sed & hoc cum retexisset, amici nomen & memoriam, à cuius primordiis ægropiâ prima Chronici contexendi nata atque profecta esset, titulo posteritati commendare voluit (8). --- I have continued the Chronicle under Carion's Name, because it's first Author, Philip Melancthon, my Father-in-law, of blessed Memory,

'set me the Pattern. The Occasion of it's being published under that Name was this: John Carion, the Mathematician, had been for forty Years before composing a Chronicle, which he sent to Philip Melancthon to revise and correct before it went to the Press; but he not at all approving the Work, made but one Blot of the whole, and wrote a new one himself, to which however he prefixed Carion's Name. And when he afterwards revised it, he would continue to Posterity the Name and Memory of his Friend, who had laid the Plan, and given the first Occasion of his composing it.' But it is also to be remarked, that there is some reason to believe that Carion published his own Piece. Mr Sagittarius makes no doubt of it: He is only surprized at Carion's Conduct in doing so (9). He had, among his Books, two German Editions of this Author's Chronicle; one in 4to, but in what Year published he could not tell; the other in 8vo, reaching down to April 16, 1521. This does not at all agree with Melancthon's Work, which, even after it had been very much augmented by the Author, reached no farther than the beginning of Charlemagne's Reign. But we meet with another Difficulty. The Swissers found that the greatest part of what has been said concerning their Nation in this Chronicle, is false. 'Qui inter Helvetios nostros historiarum patriæ non imperiti sunt, pleraque falsa eum de rebus nostris scripsisse affirmant (11).' Bullinger publicly refuted the Falsities he observed in it concerning a Battle lost by the Swissers near Zurich in 1531 (12). Neither can this, for the reason before given, any way in the World agree with Melancthon's Work. On the other side, Gesner, who relates these Observations of the Swissers, had just before described Carion's Work by Marks, perfectly suiting with that of Melancthon. He had been saying that Carion's Chronicle, printed in High Dutch at Wittenberg, in the Year 1538, had been printed at Hall in Suabia, in 1539, and at Lyons, in 1543, translated into Latin, by Hermannus Bonnus, and called Chronicorum libellus, maximas quasque res gestas ab initio mundi apto ordine complectens, ita ut annorum ratio ac præcipuæ vicissitudines quæ in regna, in religionem, & in alias res magnas incidunt, quam rectissime cognosci queant. This Title exactly answers the Design and Character of Melancthon's Chronicle; and it is well known this Author publicly owned that to be his Work, which had been translated into Latin by Herman Bonnus (13). The same Gesner observes, that Carion dedicated his Book, in 1531, to Joachim, Marquis of Brandenburg. This admirably agrees with Melancthon's Book, as appears from this Passage, in a Dedication (14). 'Cum autem prima editio illustrissimo principi Electori patri tuo dedicata sit, ne transferre munus in aliam familiam viderer, filio dedicare hanc editionem volui, quia patrem ipsum cui jam historia ecclesiæ & imperiorum notissima est, scio velle talia jam à filiis legi, & se vivo vos in possessionem doctrinæ venire. --- The first Edition having been dedicated to the most illustrious Electoral Prince your Father, I was not willing to seek a Patron in any other Family, and therefore have dedicated this to the Son, because I know it to be the Desire of the Father, who is excellently skilled in History, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, that his Sons should study and make themselves Masters of the same during his Life.' It will not bear to be made an Objection, that at the time when this was written, the *Elect*or of Brandenburg, to whom the first Edition was addressed, was then alive, which cannot agree to the *Elect*or in the Year 1531 (15). For he to whom the first Edition was dedicated, was not yet *Elect*or, when the Chronicle in question was first published. Let us observe farther, that Du Verdier tells us that the Chronicle of John Carion, the Philosopher, containing the most remarkable Things from the Creation of the World down to the Reign of Henry II., and translated into Latin by John Blond, was printed several times at Paris and Lyons (16). Can this be said of Melancthon's Work,

Mr Moreri has made a childish Mistake [C]. And I have something to charge some other Writers withal [D].

Work, which was continued down no farther than Charlemagne? It is more likely to be that Chronicle Carion had continued down to 1530, if we believe Keckerman (17). We must only suppose, that the Frenchman, who translated it, continued it down to his Time.

The Result of all this is, That it is uncertain, whether there were not two Pieces published under Carion's Name; one composed by Carion himself, the other by Melancthon. It is probable Carion did not acquiesce in the Judgment of that Great Man, when, instead of correcting some Places in his Chronicle, he saw it quite laid aside, and another composed. Perhaps he then published his own, whilst another was published under his Name. If so, we have two Chronicles, one of which was continued down to the Time of the Impression. Perhaps also Melancthon consented that a Supplement should be added to his, and leaving it to Carion's Discretion, the latter printed his Work such as Melancthon had sent it him, adding an Appendix down to his own Time. If it be so, we have but one German Edition in Carion's Name. It may easily be supposed, that Melancthon, having revised his own Work a long time after, and translated it into Latin, retrenched what was not of his own composing. Thus the first Edition of his Latin Chronicle appears to reach only to Cæsar, and the second to Charlemagne. They, who understand the German Language, and have an Occasion to search the Libraries of Germany, are desired to clear this Matter, and let us know what we are to believe upon it.

Since the printing of what you have just now read, I am put out of doubt; for I have seen a Latin Chronicle of Carion, dedicated by him to Jacobus, Marquis of Brandenburg, and divided into three Books, which reaches from Adam to Solyman's Expedition into Hungary in the Year 1532. The Author ends with four or five Prophecies, which he applies to Charles V., and all which have proved false. The Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Berlin, in 1531. The Edition I use is of Paris, 1563, in 16mo, by James Dupuis, and contains a Supplement down to the Twenty ninth of September, 1560. I have likewise seen the French Translation of John le Blond, printed at Paris by Stephen Groleau in 16mo. It contains no Appendix with relation to the general History, but only with regard to that of Francis I. and Henry II.; That relating to Francis I. begins with the first Year of his Reign.

[B] --- which the Protestants extolled at a high Rate.] See what Andrew Franckenberg says of it: 'Chronicon Carionis magna sui parte retextum, tanto judicio tantaque dexteritate perfecit (Melancthon) ut nihil in eo genere & compendiarie ratione præstantius extare sciamus (18). — Carion's Chronicle, being a great part of it new modelled, was completed by Melancthon, with so much Judgment and Exactness, that it is acknowledged to be a Master-piece of it's kind, and in the compendiarie way.' He esteemed it so highly, that he followed the Model of it in his own Work, quoted in the Margin (19), and made an Oration, 'De magnitudine rerum divinarum & politicarum quæ in Chronico Philippi continentur' (20). — Of the Greatness of the Matters Ecclesiastical and Civil, which are contained in Melancthon's Chronicle. One may suppose Vissarius Strigelius to be much of the same Judgment; for he writ several Historical Lectures upon this Chronicle (21). Stephen Prætorius looks on them, who have no taste for it, to be direct Dunces: 'Eruditissima & elegantissima Epitome omnium fere historiarum totius mundi est Chronicon Phil. Melancthonis, quod qui non degustavit, is vere barbas eff' (22). Add to this Bæclerus's Testimony. In hoc (Chronico) ea sunt ad summam rerum & historiarum universalis contextum spectantia, judicia, monita, præcepta, ut de alio hujus generis & instituti volumine similia polliceri nemo facile queat (23). — In this (Chronicle) appear such Judgments, Observations, and Rules, relating to the Formation of a Compendium, and universal History, as will not readily be equalled in any other

Work of the same kind and Design.' He, who quotes these Judgments, makes it appear that he approves of them: 'Meretur, says he (24), hoc ipsum, quod vulgo Carionis, rectius tamen Philippo-Peucerianum appellaretur Chronicon, inter selectissima probatissimaque utriusque Historiæ (Ecclesiasticæ ac Civilis) monumenta computari, atque à studiosa juventute diligenter legi, lectumque aliquoties repeti. — This Chronicle, which is commonly called Carion's, but more properly Melancthon's and Peucer's, deserves to be esteemed amongst the most compleat and valuable Monuments of History (Ecclesiastical and Civil), and to be diligently read, and often repeated by young Students.' He finds Fault, that the Authors, from whom the Accounts were taken, are not quoted; and he is in the right. It is a great Fault in a Work of this Nature, and indeed in all others; La Popeliniere, who has given this Piece a very good Character, finds another Fault in it, which is a Spirit of Prejudice. It will not be amiss to give it in his own Words: 'John Carion, the Mathematician, is reputed the Author of some Chronicles, first printed in Germany, and afterwards in other Places, under his Name. Tho' his Master Melancthon, as I am informed (25), to whom he presented the first Draughts for him to revise, add, and correct what he thought fit, made but one Blot of the whole, and composed new ones: But, through a Condescension, natural to him, permitted Carion to print them under his own Name. They shew a great deal of Learning and Industry. But his Zeal to benefit his Reader, is yet more remarkable, by insisting upon the most eminent Examples, to habituate him to Virtue, and sometimes raising him up to Heaven, in order to admire the Divine Providence, in the so various Methods of governing the World. However, he exceeds the Duty of a Chronologer by his Prolixity, and of a Historian by diverse Fictions (26). Simon Goulart's Commendations of this Work of Carion (27) are not attended with this Censure. We must observe that the Writers of the other Party very much condemn this Chronicle. 'Possévinus, suo more, they are the Words of Keckerman (28), insectatur Chronicon Melancthonis sine ulla ratione & fronte. — Possévinus, after his usual manner, falls foul of Melancthon's Chronicle without Reason.' Surius throws a whole Load of Reflexions upon Peucer, for his Continuation of this Chronicle (29). He saw himself ill treated in the Dedication to the fifth Book.

[C] Mr Moreri has made a very childish Mistake.] I make use of this Expression, because he has translated like a School-boy. These are his Words: Carion was skilled in the Languages, in polite Learning, and Mathematics. He taught them with Applause, at Wittemberg, and elsewhere. This infers, that he taught these three things in several Universities. Though the Truth is, he taught only the Mathematics at Frankfort upon the Oder. Let us see the Latin Moreri meant to translate; it is very easy to be understood, though he could not apprehend it. A teneris optimarum artium, & literarum studiosus fuit, inque pluribus Germaniæ Academicis, præsertim in Wittebergenf, cum laude versatus (30). This shows plainly that Carion gained himself a Reputation, whilst he studied at Wittemberg, and elsewhere in Germany, but not that he taught there with Applause.

[D] I have something to charge some other Writers withal.] Gesner's Abbreviators take notice of an Edition in 1528: it is a mistake: the first Edition could not be before 1531. Keckerman says, Melancthon published, in 1540, a Chronicle, extending from the beginning of the World down to Charlemagne (31). He ought to have said in 1560. Zeiller followed Keckerman in the same Mistake (32); for he copied him word for word. He is guilty of another, in saying that Peucer continued this Chronicle down to his own time (33): he ought to have said, down to 1519. He observes, that Peucer died in 1602. Mr Sagittarius makes use of a strange Instance, to prove, that Melancthon and Carion

CARMILIANUS (PETER), a Latin Poet, and an Englishman by Nation, lived in the beginning of the XVIIth Century. Erasmus, and Andrew Ammonius, speak of him with a great deal of Contempt. He published, among other Poems, an Epitaph upon That King of the Scots, who was slain in a Battle, he lost to the English, Ann. 1513. The Opinion, the World had of it, will be seen in the Remark [A], which will serve for a Reason to the Reader, why this Poet was never taken notice of. The profound Obscurity, in which he lies buried, is one of the chief Reasons, which engaged me to consecrate this small Article to him: a Method I shall observe towards some others.

[A] The Opinion the World had of it will be seen in the Remark. Here is what Ammonius wrote to Erasmus thereupon. 'Hoc prætereundum non est P. Carmilianum Regis Scotorum epitaphium nuper edidisse muliebribus maledictis refertum, quod Pinfonicis characteribus excusum propediem leges. Eo Carmilianus magis sibi placet, seque magis miratur, quam Catullianus ille Suffenus; & tamen nisi ego admonuisssem pullulare prima correpta possuisset. Utcunque multa restant quæ rideas, & in primis aliquos inveniri qui ejusmodi ineptias serio laudent (1). — I must not omit, that Carmilianus has lately published the Epitaph of the King of Scots, full of womanish Reviling; which you will soon read, printed by Pinfon. Carmilianus discovers great self-satisfaction, thereupon, and admires himself more than even Suffenus in Catullus; and yet, if I had not sworn him, he would have made the first Syllable in pullulare short. You will have still greater occasion to laugh, especially when I tell you there are some, who commend such Stuff in earnest.' This Letter from Ammonius, dated in November 1515, is the fortieth in the eighth Book of those of Erasmus, who returned him this Answer: 'Carmiliani epitaphium vidi, quumque legerem pullulare, hic, inquam scabies est: deinde quum sciscitanti respondissent esse Carmiliani, ref- pondi, sane ipso dignum est. Id quidam sic acceperunt quasi dixissem Scotorum rege dignum: quibus plusculum erat nati, subrisere. Sed næ tu hominum es candidus qui belluæ istius famæ confus- las: ita me Deus amet magno emerim si suisfices. — I have seen the Epitaph, written by Carmil- lianus; and, when I read the word pullulare, here, said I, is a Scab: when, upon enquiry, I was told it was Carmilianus's, I replied, indeed it is worthy of him. This by some was taken, as if I had said, it was worthy of the King of Scots: Those, who were more acute, smiled at the Jest. But, in truth, it is too good natured in you, to concern your self for the Reputation of That Fellow. I wish to GOD you had been silent.' This Answer of Eras- mus, dated in November 1511, is the twentieth Letter in the eighth Book: from whence we may judge how exact they were, who put Erasmus's Letters in order, and set a Date to those that were without Date (2).

CARNEADES, a famous Greek Philosopher of Cyrene (a). He founded the third Academy [A], which, properly speaking, differed in nothing from the second (b); for, if you except some Softenings, which served only to cast a Mist before the Eyes, he was as earnest a Stickler for Uncertainty, as Arcefilas [B]. He found

(b) Founded by ARCE- SILAS. See his Article.

[A] He founded the third Academy. I shall observe elsewhere (1), that Diogenes Laërtius is not to be relied upon, when he attributes to Lacydes this Foundation. Lacydes nicely followed Arcefilas his Predecessor's Hypothesis; which received no Innovations, for ought appears to us, either from Evander, who succeeded Lacydes, or Hegesinus (2), who came next after Evander. It was Carneades, Hegesinus's Successor, who made himself Head of a new Party. Let us see what Cicero says: 'Cujus (Arcefilæ) primo non admodum probata ratio --- proxime à Lacyde solo retenta est: post autem conficta à Carneade, qui est quartus ab Arcefila: audivit enim Hegesinum, qui Evandrum audiverat Lacydis discipulum, quum Arcefila Lacydes fuisse (3). — The Method of Arcefilas was not much approved of, at first. — It was next taken up by Lacydes alone: afterwards it was put in practice by Carneades, who is the fourth from Arcefilas; for he studied under Hegesinus, who had followed Evander, the Disciple of Lacydes, which Lacydes was the Disciple of Arcefilas.' He had observed in another place, that Arcefilas's Academy met with no variation till Carneades's Time; Quæ (Academia) usque ad Carneadem perduravit, qui quartus ab Arcefila fuit, in eadem Arcefilæ ratione perman- sit (4). Clemens Alexandrinus observes, that the middle Academy flourished till Hegesilaus, Carneades's Predecessor's Time (5). I shall quote St. Au-ustin hereafter, who attributes to Carneades the Inno- vation of Arcefilas's Academy.

[B] He was as earnest a Stickler for Uncertainty as Arcefilas. See Cicero's Words, which show, that Carneades confirmed Arcefilas's Hypothesis: Hæc in philosophia ratio contra omnia differendi,

'nullamque rem aperte judicandi, profecta à So- crate, repetita ab Arcefila, confirmata à Carneade, usque ad nostrum viguit ætatem (6). --- This Method, in Philosophy, of disputing against every thing, and openly judging of nothing, invented by Socrates, restored by Arcefilas, and confirmed by Carneades, was in vogue even to our Time.' What follows proves, that, as to Incomprehensibility, he went as far in it as the other. 'Ex hoc illud est natum quod postulabat Hortensius, ut id ipsum sal- tem perceptum a sapiente diceretur, nihil posse per- cipi. Sed Antipatro hoc idem postulanti, quum diceret, ei qui affirmaret nihil posse percipi consen- taneum esse, unum tamen illud dicere percipi posse, ut alia non possent, Carneades acutius resi- stebat. Nam tantum abesse dicebat ut ei consen- taneum esset, ut maxime etiam repugnaret. Qui enim negaret quidquam esse quod perciperetur, eum nihil excipere: ita necesse esse ne id ipsum quidem, quod exceptum non esset, comprehendere & percipi ullo modo posse (7). — Hence arose That Postulat of Hortensius, that a wise Man can at least only perceive this, that nothing can be perceiv- ed. But when Antipater took the same thing for granted, and said, that he, who affirms that no- thing can be perceived, must yet say, that this very thing (viz. that other things cannot be perceived) is capable of being perceived, Carneades opposed him with more Subtlety. For This, he said, was so far from being necessary, that it was most contradictory. For he, who denies that any thing can be perceived, excepts nothing: whence it necessarily follows, that what is not excepted cannot possibly be comprehended and perceived.' By this we find, he taught, that they, who hold nothing can be comprehended, and that it in the most evident Notions [C]. It is not agreed whether he wrote any Books or that there is nothing certain, ought to allow, by an unavoidable Consequence, that this very Proposition, there is nothing certain, we can comprehend nothing, is uncertain and incomprehensible. Now he was one of those, who held we could comprehend nothing, and therefore he went as far as Arcefilas. Duo placet esse Carneadi genera visorum. In uno hanc divisionem: alia visa esse quæ percipi possint, alia quæ non possint. In altero autem, alia visa esse probabilia, alia non probabilia. Itaque quæ contra sensus, contraque perspicuitatem dicantur, ea pertinere ad superiorem divisionem, contra posteriorem nihil dici oportere. Quare ita placere, tale visum nullum esse ut perceptio consequeretur; ut autem probatio, multa; etenim contra naturam esset, si probabile nihil esset, & sequitur omnis vitæ ea quam ut Luculle commemorabas everfio. Itaque & sensibus probanda multa sunt, teneatur modo illud, non inesse in his quicquam tale, quale non etiam falsum nihil ab eo differens esse possit. Sic quicquid acciderit specie probabile, si nihil se offerret quod sit probabilitati illi contrarium, utetur eo sapiens, ac sic omnis ratio vitæ gubernabitur (8).

(8) Id. ibid. cap. xxxi.

— Carneades says, there are two kinds of Things seen: In the one he makes this Division: Some things are seen, which may be perceived; others, which may not: In the other; Some Things seen are probable; others not probable. Those Things therefore, which are said to be contrary to Sense and Perspicuity, belong to the first Division; but that nothing can be said against the second. He was therefore of Opinion, that there is nothing so seen as to be followed by Perception: but many things, so as to be followed by Probability; since it is contrary to Nature, that nothing should be probable; and such a Sentiment tends to That Subversion of human Life, which you just now mentioned, Lucullus. Many Things therefore may be proved to the Senses: only we must remember, that there is nothing in those things of such a Nature, as that nothing, even what is false, can differ from it. Thus whatever has the Appearance of Probability, if nothing offers, which is contrary to That Probability, will be made use of by a wise Man; and by such things human Life will be directed. By this we see, that he allowed of nothing but Probabilities for the use of Life; and beyond that he believed there was no Certainty or Evidence. He laboured might and main to break the Custom of assenting to what is not evident

(9) Ego enim est maximam actionem potest repugnare visis, obfistere opinionibus, assensus laboribus sustinere, credoque Clitomacho ita scribenti: Herculis quendam laborem exantlatum à Carneade, quod ut feram & immanem bellum sic ex animis nostris assensionem, id est opinionem, & temeritatem extraxisset, tamen, &c. sufficient to determine us to act; provided we pronounced absolutely upon nothing (13). He was yet more indulgent; he allowed a wise Man, upon some occasions, to conclude, 'Si nulli rei sapiens assentietur unquam, aliquando etiam opinabitur: nunquam autem opinabitur, nulli igitur rei assentietur. Hanc conclusionem Arcefilas probat. Confirmabat enim primum & secundum. Carneades nonnunquam secundum illud dabat assentiri, aliquando id assequebatur etiam opinari (14). — If a wise Man will ever assent to any thing, he will sometimes conclude; but he will never conclude; therefore he will never assent to any thing. Arcefilas proves this Consequence. For he confirmed the Major and the Minor. Carneades sometimes allowed of Assent, and now and then permitted to conclude.' This Condescension in Carneades made some Breach in his System; for which reason, Arcefilas is said to have maintained his Hypothesis better than he. 'Ex his illa necessario nata est εἰροχῆ, id est assensionis retentio, in qua melius sibi consistit Arcefilas, si vera sunt quæ de Carneade nonnulli existimant. Si enim percipi nihil potest, quod utrique visum est, tollendus assensus est. Quid enim est tam futile, quam quicquam approbare non cognitum: Carneadem autem etiam heri audiebamus solitum esse delabi interdum, ut diceret opinaturum, id est peccaturum esse sapientem (15).

(13) See Cicero Academ. lib. iv, passim.

(14) Id. ibid. cap. xviii. See likewise cap. xxix.

(15) Id. ibid. cap. xviii.

From hence necessarily arose the εἰροχῆ, or withholding of Assent, in which Arcefilas is more consistent with himself, if it be true what some think of Carneades. For if nothing can be perceived, as both allow, all Assent is taken away. For what can be weaker, than to approve we know not what? But we were told yesterday, that Carneades sometimes went so far, as to say, that a wise Man would conclude, that is err. But it is certain, Carneades always returned to the εἰροχῆ, which was, if I may so call it, the Analysis of his Faith. This appears from the Exposition of his Sentiment at the end of Tully's Academic Questions. This is it: 'Quid Catulus sentit? Quid Hortensius? Tum Catulus. Ego ne inquit? ad patris revolvor sententiam, quam quidem ille Carneadem esse dicebat, ut percipi nihil putem posse, assensurum autem non percepto, id est opinaturum, sapientem existimem, sed ita ut intelligat se opinari, sciatque nihil esse quod comprehendi & percipi possit, per εἰροχῆν illam omnium rerum comprobans; illi alteri sententiæ, nihil esse quod percipi possit, vehementer assentior. Habeo, inquam, sententiam tuam, neque eam admodum aperiore. Sed quid tibi tandem videtur Hortensi? Tum ille ridens, tollendum. Teneo te inquam. Nam ista Academicæ est propria sententia (16). — What is Catulus's Opinion? What Hortensius? Then Catulus; My Opinion, say you? I return back to my Father's Sentiment, which he said was That of Carneades; viz. that nothing can be perceived, yet that a wise Man will assent to what he does not perceive; yet so as to be sensible, that he only concludes, and to know, that nothing can be perceived, in every thing observing the εἰροχῆ, or withholding of Assent: this Sentiment I strongly approve of. I have your Opinion, said I, nor do I greatly dislike it. But what think you, Hortensius? Upon which he smiled, and replied, that we should refuse all Assent. I understand you, replied I; for it is properly the Sentiment of the Academy.' This is not all; some, who knew it well, maintained he did not allow a Philosopher to conclude. 'Licet perceiving nihil, & tamen opinari: quod à Carneade dicitur probatum. Equidem Clitomacho plusquam Philoni aut Metrodoro credens, hoc magis ab eo disputatum, quam probatum puto (17). — It was allowed, that we perceive nothing; yet we were permitted to conclude: which Carneades is said to have proved. For my own part, relying more on Clitomachus, than Philo or Metrodorus, I rather think he discussed, than proved, the Point. It is very probable therefore, in my Opinion, that he retained at the bottom Arcefilas's Doctrine; but, out of Policy, and that he might deprive his Adversaries of the most specious Pretences of declaiming against, and ridiculing him, he granted them some Degrees of Probability, capable of determining a wise Man to choose such such a side in his civil Capacity. He saw very well, that, without this, he should never be able to answer their most odious Objections, or prove that his Principle was not the readiest way to reduce a Man to Inaction, and the most scandalous Quietism. If it be well considered, it is the same thing to say, There are no Truths, and there are, but we have no Rule to distinguish them from Falshoods. If Arcefilas had maintained the first of these Propositions, he might have been compared to a fiery Courser, that follows his Impetuosity to the very bottom of a Precipice. But I can scarce be brought to believe, that he absolutely denied the Existence of Truths. He thought it enough, in my Opinion, to maintain, that they were impenetrable to human Understanding. The Heat of the Dispute perhaps hindered him from expressing himself so cautiously, as they did afterwards in Carneades's Academy. Carneades managed himself more circumspectly, than to inherit all the Disgrace of his Predecessor. Carneades primo illam

velut calumniandi impudentiam, qua videbat Arcefilam non mediocriter infamatum, deposuit, ne contra omnia velle dicere quasi ostentationis causa videretur (18). ----- Carneades was the first, who laid aside the shameful way of calumniating, which he knew Arcefilas to have been very guilty of, that he might not be thought fond of disputing against every thing, for the sake of Ostentation. These words of St. Austin are more favourable to Carneades, than Arcefilas; but Numenius had another Opinion of these two Academics; he was more angry with Carneades, than with Arcefilas. He pretended, that Arcefilas was in earnest, and deceived himself whilst he was deceiving others: but that Carneades believed nothing of what he said, and entertained his Confidants with Discourses quite different from his Lectures, being pleased in nothing more than puzzling his Scholars, and diverted himself with arguing pro and con. Τοισιν ἀπάγων τὰς ἀλλας, αὐτὸς ἐμὲν ἀνεξέπαυτον, ὃ μὴ περὶ τῶν Ἀκαδημαίων ἐκείνῳ γὰρ περιεχόμενος τῇ φαρμάκῃ τὰς συκοφαντίας, ἐλαδὲν εὐαίῳ πρῶτον ἐξήπαλιν καὶ μὴ ῥηθῆναι, πεποιθὲς δ' ἀληθῆναι εἶναι, ὃ λέγει διὰ τῆς ἀσφαπῶν ἀναίρεστος χρημάτων. Quippe, cum in fraudem alios et errorem impelleret, tum fallabatur ipse nunquam, id quod locum in Arcefila non habebat. Is enim dum ceteros suis secum maleficiis ac praestigis, Corybantum more insaniens, circumferret, non sentiebat quam sese primum ipse deciperet, dum sibi quoque vera esse quae diceret, omnia simul ac semel abolendo, persuadebat (19). He built and demolished, having no sooner established a Probability, but he was the first himself that took care to destroy it. Ἥς δ' ἐν αὐτῷ, καὶ ἀπέρεν, ἀντιλογίας τε καὶ σεραφῆς λεσολόγους συνέφερε τῇ μαχῇ ποιημάτων, ἐξαρνητικός τε καὶ καταφαντικός τε ἦν, κάμπερον ἀντιλογικός. Idem asserbat, idem auferbat, pugnamque suam contrariis sententiis, et versutis quibusdam ac subtilibus argutiis cum multiplici varietate miscebat, affirmando simul ac negando, et oppositis utrinque rationibus disputando (20). In confelling there were Truths and Falshoods in Nature, but so concealed, that they were not really to be distinguished one from the other (21), he was a more dangerous Sharper than Arcefilas. Ἦν γὰρ λυσὶς καὶ γόνος σοφώτερος. Fur ergo praestigia-torque fuit solertior (22). Cicero says a thing, which may be opposed to Numenius. The latter pretends, that Carneades's public Doctrine differed from his private; that, in public, he confounded all, in order to combat the Stoics; but that, among his Friends, his Sentiments were the same with the rest of the World. Ὅμως δὲ καίτοι καὶ ὑπὸ Στωϊκῆς φιλοσοφίας εἰς τὸ φανερόν, πρὸς γὰρ τὰς εὐαίῃς ἐταίρους δ' ἀπορρήτων ἐμολογεῖται τε καὶ ἠλθὲν, καὶ ἀπερρίνῃ, ὃ καὶ ἄλλῳ τῶν ἐπιτυχόντων. Et tamen ille ipse, qui Stoicos velle-candi studio palam cuncta miscebat, clam sodales inter suos eadem omnia fatebatur vereque ac certo pronuncia-bat, quae alius quicvis ἐ populo (23). This does not agree with a Passage in Cicero, where we are told, that Clitomachus never could discover what Carneades thought the most probable, though he had for many Years been his favourite Scholar (24). Cuius (Calliphontis) quidem sententiam Carneades ita studiose defendebat ut eam probarectiam videretur, quamquam Clitomachus affirmabat nunquam se intelligere potuisse quid Carneadi probaretur (25).

I know I shall be condemned by a great many for this heap of Quotations: I was aware of their Contempt, Dislike, and magisterial Censures; but had no regard to them: I chose rather to turn Copier, for the sake of those, who, without stirring from their Place, are glad to receive an historical Account of the Opinions of the Ancients, and see the original Proofs, I mean the genuine Expressions of the Witnesses. This is the Principle I shall stick to upon an hundred other occasions.

[C] He found an Uncertainty in the most evident Notions.] Every Logician knows, that the Foundation of a Syllogism, and by consequence the Faculty of Reasoning, is built upon this Maxim: Those things that are the same with a third are the same to each other; Quae sunt idem uni tertio sunt idem inter se. Now it is certain, Carneades strongly opposed it; since he has with all his Subtilties attacked this; Those things that are equal to a third, are equal among themselves. This we have from Galen, in a Discourse printed with one of Sextus Empiricus's Books; and he tells us farther, that this Philosopher's Scholars left in writing all the Sophisms their Master had opposed to this Notion, the most evident in the World, and that neither they, nor any of the Academics, who lived after him, endeavoured to solve those Sophisms. He adds withal, that it is as mischievous to preserve in a Book such Objections, without observing wherein they are deficient, as it is to invent them. The Reader shall have his words, as I find them translated by Erasmus. Carneades ne illud quidem quod est omnium evidentissimum concedit esse credendum, quod magnitudines uni cuipiam aequales, sint etiam inter se aequales. Rationes igitur quibus conatur deservire & haec & alia permulta, quae tibi evidentur apparent credunturque esse vera, adhuc in hunc ulque diem servatas habemus, proditas scriptis, ab illius discipulis collectas. Solutiones autem nec ab illis, nec ab alio quopiam Academicorum, qui post Carneadem fuerunt, datae sunt. Ea res sola declarat, istius rationes omnes esse sophismata: nobisque querenda sunt, O discipuli, istarum solutiones. Improbum est enim hoc: attamen nihilo minus improbum fecerunt illi qui scripserunt quidem has, ceterum vobis non indicarunt quales essent (26).

[D] His Application to study was very singular.] He was as laborious as any one, and so intent upon his Studies, that he would not allow himself time to pare his Nails, or have his Hair trimmed. φιλόπονος δὲ ἀνθρώπος γίγονεν εἰ καὶ τις ἄλλος ----- ἔδεν καὶ ἐκόμα καὶ ἔτρεφεν οὐρυχας ἀσχολία τῇ περὶ τὰς λόγους. Fuit autem vehementer studiosus ----- quocirca & caesariem & unguis nutriebat, tanta erat in literas intentione (27). He was so unwilling to lose any of his Hours, that he not only avoided all Feasts (28), but forgot to eat even at his own Table (29); inasmuch that his Maid, who was likewise his Concubine, was forced to cut his Meat for him, and put it into his Hand, nay perhaps into his Mouth. I express myself so, because the Latin Author I am just going to quote confines himself to general Terms only. We are to observe, that his Concubine was divided between the fear of interrupting Carneades, and suffering him to perish with hunger. This is no useless Observation: We may infer from it, that this Philosopher was unwilling to be disturbed in his Meditations, tho' for his necessary Sustainance. Carneades laboriosus & diuturnus sapientiae miles: siquidem nonaginta expletis annis, idem illi vivendi ac philosophandi finis fuit. Ita se mirificum doctrinae operibus addixerat, ut cum cibi capiendi causa recubisset, cogitationibus inherens, manum ad mensam porrigere oblivisceretur. Sed enim Melissa, quam uxoris loco habebat, temperato inter studia non interpellandi, sed inedia succurrendi officio, dexteram suam necessariis usus aptabat. His Application to Study was so wonderful, that, when he sat down to Meat, through intenseness of Thought he would forget to reach out his hand to the Table. But Melissa, his Hand-Maid, with divided Care, not to interrupt his Meditation, and yet to satisfy his Hunger, dexterously supplied his wants. He enjoyed Life, therefore, only in his Thoughts, and looked upon his Body as foreign and superfluous. Add to this what I shall relate immediately touching the Remedy he made use of to strengthen his Mind.

(31) Muret. Orat. II, Vol. I, pag. 17.

Muretus, through a defect of Memory, has taken Cbrysippus for Carneades. 'Prodeat in medium Chrysippus, says he (31), qui saepe studio intentus tanta voluptate perfruebatur, ut eum tanquam extra se positum cibi potionisque caperet oblivio. — Let us instance in Chrysippus, who was often so wrapped up in the pleasure of Contemplation, that he forgot to eat and drink.' Another learned Man, upon Muretus's Authority, has twice applied That to Cbrysippus, which belongs to Carneades alone (32); tho' it is true, he says, Valerius Maximus spoke of Carneades, and not of Cbrysippus (33). I shall set down his Words; wherein we shall find, that he supposes Cbrysippus had his Meat put into his Mouth. 'Aut Chrysippum denique repetam, quem inter etiam epulas tam intemperantem studii fuisse aiunt, ut evolante ad alia ingenio, manus cessaret, & hianti ori ancilla Melissa cibum ingerere deberet (34). — Or I will again instance in Chrysippus, who, even at a Banquet, is said to have been so intemperately studious, that, his Thoughts wandering on other things, his Hand was idle, and his Maid Melissa was obliged to put the Meat into his Mouth.' He is no Plagiary, though he makes use of Frontonius's Words (35); for he refers us to him: so that here are three Authors together guilty of the same Error: without doubt they have many Companions.

[E] He was a grand Stickler against the Stoics, and attempted to refute the Works of Cbrysippus. Here is a Passage of Cicero: 'Sed is (Carneades) ut contra Stoicos, quos studiosissime semper refellebat, & contra quorum disciplinam ingenium ejus exarserat (36). — But He (Carneades) ever refuted the Stoics with the greatest eagerness, whose Doctrines he could not endure with patience.' He attentively read the Writings of the Stoics, particularly those of Cbrysippus, and refuted them (37). He succeeded so well, that he owned, had it not been for Cbrysippus, he had never been what he was. Εἰ μὴ γὰρ ἦν Χρύσιππος, οὐκ ἂν ἦν ἐγώ. Nisi Chrysippus fuisset, non essem ego (38). There are many others, who might say the same thing: they are obliged to their Antagonists for their Reputation: they had either sunk into Idleness, or made no more than a private Amusement of Study, if the Ambition of excelling their Adversaries had not inspired them with the Resolution of acquiring great Knowledge, and of publishing it to the World. The Necessity a Man finds of defending himself against an ambitious and troublesome Aggressor, has produced Books, which have procured great Reputation to those, who never thought of being Authors. This was not Carneades's Case; he began the Quarrel, chose for his Antagonist one of the most famous Stoics, and so earnestly desired to get the better of him, that, whilst he was preparing himself for the Combat, he took a Dose of Hellebore, to render his Conception more free and serene, and to excite against him with the more force the fire of his Imagination. Idem (Carneades) cum Cbrysippo disputaturus, helleboro se ante purgabat, ad exprimendum ingenium suum attentius, & illius refellendum acrius (39). I wish he, who gives us this Account, had left out the Word cum, which implies a verbal Dispute; whereas Cbrysippus was dead, when Carneades undertook to confute him. Pliny (40) and Aulus

Gellius (41) pretend, that he made use of this Expedient, when he undertook to answer Zeno's Writings. Some Moderns conceive, that this Zeno was not the chief of the Stoics, but Zeno of Tarsus, Cbrysippus's Scholar and Successor (42). This may be; though, as Mr Menage has judiciously observed (43), it may as well be understood of the Founder of the Stoic Sect. I cannot approve all his Criticisms upon Joncius. He censures him justly for saying, Valerius Maximus affirms, that Carneades, being to write against Zeno, took Hellebore (44). He should have said, being to dispute with Cbrysippus. He charges him very fallily with having reprehended Petronius, Tertullian, St Jerom, and St Austin, for saying, that Carneades purged his Brain with white Hellebore, whilst he was writing against Cbrysippus (45). This Fault in Mr Menage is the more surprizing, because he had just then been quoting Joncius's words, which are these; Quod tamen Cbrysippus tribuit perperam Petronius in Satyrice; Tertullianus libro de anima cap. 6; Hieronymus Commentario in Epistolam ad Galatas (46). These Words clearly imply, that those three Authors were in the wrong in attributing to Cbrysippus what Pliny, Valerius Maximus, and Aulus Gellius, apply to Carneades, Joncius speaks not a Word of St Austin. This is not Mr Menage's only Fault; for he says expressly, that Petronius, Tertullian, and St Jerom, affirm, that Carneades cleared his Brain with white Hellebore, whilst he was writing against Cbrysippus (47). Now it is certain these three Authors mentioned the Hellebore in relation only to the last. Mr Menage says the same thing himself, in another Book (48). I shall make one more Observation upon him. He is mistaken when he says, that Fulgentius, speaking of Carneades's Hellebore, mentioned Zeno (49): this is false; he named no Body but Carneades (50). If he had consulted the Originals, Joncius had lain open to a new Criticism, for placing Fulgentius among the Authors, who hold, that Carneades prepared himself to write against Zeno by a Dose of Hellebore. I would not insist upon these Punctilio's, but that our Writers might accustom themselves to a most severe Exactness; for a small neglect in them gives rise to many Blunders, transmitted by others from hand to hand.

Observe, that Fulgentius takes notice also of Cbrysippus's Hellebore. Ego vero Cbrysippi elleborei rancidulo acreo postposito cum Musis aliquid blandius fabulabor (51). — Setting aside therefore the Hellebore of Cbrysippus, I will apply to the left severe Studies of Poetry. Thus have we almost as many Authors for Cbrysippus as for Carneades. For Carneades, we have Valerius Maximus, Pliny, Aulus Gellius, St Austin (52), and Fulgentius: For Cbrysippus, Petronius, Tertullian, St Jerom, and the same Fulgentius. To these Mr Menage adds Lucian (53); but this is to bring him in by Head and Shoulders: for the Passages he quotes say only, that Cbrysippus could not be admitted into the Fortunate Island, till he had taken four Doses of Hellebore (54). There is another Passage in Lucian more to the purpose, where he brings in Cbrysippus saying, that one can never be a wise Man, till he has taken three Draughts of Hellebore one after another (55). See likewise his Hermotimus towards the end. There you will find, that, if Mr Menage had quoted that place, he might have proved what he asserted. In this Division I had rather follow those, who apply all this to Carneades (56), though it is not unlikely but Cbrysippus too might have taken a Draught to sharpen his Wit.

Let us observe by the way, that Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, made a great Blunder, when they said, that Carneades was Cbrysippus's good Friend and faithful Follower, Cbrysippi maxime studiosus. I shall observe hereafter (57), that he maintained some Doctrines with no other Intent than to contradict the Stoics.

[F] He had a surprizing Eloquence, which made him feared by the Roman Senate. It was so effectual, that he was there, he is said to have made an admirable Oration, one Day, for Justice, and that he never maintained any thing he did not prove, nor attack any thing he did not utterly defeat. 'Carneadis vero vis incredibilis illa dicendi & varietas perquam effect optanda nobis, qui nullam unquam in illis suis disputationibus rem defendit quam non probavit, nullam oppugnavit quam non everterit (58).' After this Commendation is This other Passage in Cicero, necessary to be cited; Hinc hæc recentior Academia emanavit, in qua extitit divina quadam celeritate ingeni, dicendique copia, Carneades (59). — Hence arose this later Academy, in which Carneades, famous for his Wit and Eloquence, flourished. Numenius compares Carneades's Eloquence to a rapid Torrent, that bears down all before it. This Commendation will appear better in the Original Greek: Εἰς τὴν αὐτὴν τὴν καὶ θαυμάσιον λόγον, ἐξηγείσθω λόγος, οἷον ποταμὸς ποταμὸς, ὁ ποταμὸς ὅσων, πᾶσι καὶ ἀπαιτήτως τὰ τῆς καὶ τὰ καὶ, καὶ εἰς τὴν αὐτὴν, καὶ συνέσπρε τὴν ἀκούσαν διὰ τοῦτο. Quod si alto quodam & exaggerato dicendi genere opus esset, tum enimvero vehementer ac rapido cursu ferebatur, ut amnis quidam incitatus & rapax, qui omnia passim inundet & obruat: sic in auditorem incumbat, cumque secum magno cum fragore strepitumque rapiebat (60). He adds, that this Philosopher charmed his Auditor to that Degree, that he brought them, like Captives, to submit to his Sentiments; and that, by Force or Address, he subdued those very People, who had armed themselves with the most exact Precautions against him. This deserves to be quoted in Greek. Καὶ μὲν οἱ λέγων ὁ Καρνεάδης ἐλυχαρῶντο καὶ νῦν ἐπαυροῦντο. ἢν δὲ κλέπτον μὲν ἀφάνει, φαινόμενον δὲ ληΐης, αἰρῶν καὶ δόλῳ καὶ βία τὴν καὶ πᾶν σπῶδες παρὰ κενοσμένους. Ἀνὴρ γὰρ Carneades interea dicendi facultate auditorem perculsebat, idemque captivum traherebat: & fur occulte, manifeste prædo, vel fraude vel aperta vi paratissimum etiam quemque capiebat (61). None of his Adversaries, continues he, were able to resist him; they were inferior to him in Eloquence; he was the only Conqueror; his Opinions were established, those of others rejected. Πᾶσα γὰρ Καρνεάδης δόξα ἐνίκη, καὶ ἐδεδίκα, ἥτις ἂν ἀλλοίως. ἐπεὶ καὶ οἱ περισσεύοντες, ἥσαν εἰσιπὶν ἀδυνατώτατοι. Omnis quippe Carneadis vincebat opinio, alia cujuslibet nulla proposita, cum adversarios omnes longe dicendo inferiores haberet (62). Antipater had a mind to combat him (63), but how? he never dared appear before him at the public Lectures, in the Walks, or in Conversation. He was silent; the poor Man had not a word to say for himself; he attacked him only with his Pen at a distance, and secretly by some Books which he wrote. Posterity has seen them: They were not able to make head against Carneades after his Death, so far were they from being able to oppose him whilst he flourished in the Meridian of his Glory and Reputation. Βιβλία κατέλιπε γράφας τοῖς ὕστερον, ἔτε νῦν δυνάμενα, καὶ τότε ἀδυνατώτατα πρὸς ἄνδρα ὑπέρμαχον φανέντα, καὶ καλὰ δέξαντα εἶναι τοῖς τότε ἀνθρώποις τὸν Καρνεάδην. Libros tantum posteris relinquebat, verum ejusmodi, qui nunc quidem, tum vero multo minus Carneadem illum, qui tantus ac tam admirabilis ejus ævi hominibus videbatur, sustinere possent (64). Let us end all with this beautiful Passage in Lactantius. 'Carneades Academicæ sectæ Philosophus, cujus in differendo quæ vis fuerit, quæ eloquentia, quod acumen, qui nescit, is ex prædicatione Ciceronis intelliget, aut Lucilii, apud quem differens Neptunus de re difficillima, ostendit non posse id explicari, nec si Carneadem ipsum Orcus remittat (65). — Carneades, a Philosopher of the Academic Sect, whose strength of Reasoning, whose Eloquence, and whose Wit, whoever is unacquainted with, may learn them from the account given us by Cicero, or Lucilius, in whom Neptune, disputing concerning a most difficult Point, shews that it cannot be explained, not though the Grave should give back Carneades himself. What an Idea! What a Commendation is this! Neptune is introduced discoursing upon a very intricate Point, and affirming, that, if Carneades himself should rise from the dead, he could not solve it. Let us proceed to his Embassy to Rome: it will furnish us with such Instances of his Eloquence, as are sufficient to warrant this matter of Fact; viz. that the Rhetoricians left their Schools to become his Auditors (66).

The Athenians, being fined Five hundred Talents, for having pillaged the City of Oropus, sent their Embassadors to Rome, who prevailed so far as to have the Fine reduced to One hundred Talents (67). Carneades the Academic, Diogenes the Stoic, and Critolaus the Peripatetic, three famous Philosophers, were charged with this Embassy (68). Before they had their Audience of the Senate, each of them made an Oration in the presence of a great Assembly, and in each of them was admired a particular Excellency (69). Strength and Rapidity of Thought was That of Carneades (70). Cato the Censor advised the Senate to send the Embassadors back again immediately, because it was difficult to discover the Truth in the Intricacy of Carneades's Arguments. Cato Censorius, in illa nobili trium sapientie procerum ab Athenis legatione, auditio Carneade, quamprimum legatos eos conjunct dimittendos, quoniam illo viro argumentante, quid veri esset haud facile discerni posset (71). The Athenian Embassadors, said they in the Senate, are not sent to obtain any thing from us by way of Persuasion, but rather to force out of us whatever they think fitting, Εἰς τοῦτον ἐνέτρεξαν τὴν σύγκλητον βουλὴν, ὡς εἰπεῖν αὐτοῖς, ἐπεμψάν Ἀθηναῖοι πρεσβευόντας, ἃ τὴν πείσονται, ἀλλὰ γὰρ τὴν βίαν ὡς ἡμᾶς δεῖσαι ὅσα θέλουσιν. Qui tanta gravitate dicendi senatum perpulerunt, ut diceret, Miserrunt Athenienses legatos, non ut nos persuaderent, sed qui cogerent nos facere, quod ipsis collibitum esset (72). There is no need to add, that this infers only, that Carneades's Discourses were irresistible. Plutarch tells us, the Roman Youths were so charmed with them, that they renounced their Pleasures and Exercises, to indulge without interruption the Passion he had inspired into them for Philosophy, and with which they were seized as with an Enthusiasm. Δύσθω κατείχετο, ὡς ἀνὴρ Ἕλληνας εἰς ἐκπληξιν ὑπερβούς πάντα κηλῶν καὶ χειρῶν, ἔρωτα δεινὸν ἐμβέλλων τοῖς νοῖς, ὥς ἂν τῶν ἄλλων ἡδονῶν καὶ διατεχνῶν ἐκπεσόντες ἐνθεσίῳσι περὶ φιλοσοφίαν. Vulgatumque fuit, virum Græcum ad miraculum utque eximium, omnia delinientem & allicientem, mirum infudisse juventuti ardorem, per quem reliquarum voluptatum & oblectamentorum oblit, quasi fanatici raperentur ad philosophiam (73). This by no means pleased Cato; he was afraid, lest, for the future, young People would chuse to follow their Studies, rather than the Wars, and taxed therefore, in the Senate, the Conduct shown to those Philosophical Embassadors. Let us give them their Answer out of hand, said he, and send them home; they are Men able to make us believe whatever they please (74). He spoke this not out of any particular Prejudice to Carneades, as some have imagined, but because he disliked Philosophy in general, and all the Greek Learning (75). We ought not however to infer from these Words of Plutarch, that Cato did not particularly fear the Subtlety of Wit, and the Strength of Reason, wherewith Carneades disputed pro and con; those sort of Men are dangerous; they are able to weaken the best Cause in the World, as Cicero has observed of him (76): they will sometimes prove black to be white, and resemble Mercury's Son, of whom the Poet;

Nascitur Autolycus, furtum ingeniosus ad omne,
Qui facere assuevit, patriæ non degener artis,
Candida de nigris, & de candentibus atra (77).

At Will made white look black, and black look white, and the next Day against it [G]. The nice Subtilties, with which he opposed That Virtue, appeared terrible to Cicero [H], and capable of dissolving the Foundations, on

[G] He made an admirable Oration one Day for Justice, and the next against it. He was then in his Element: he loved to ruin his own Works, because at the bottom it served to support his grand Principle, which was, that the Mind of Man was capable of nothing, but meer Probabilities; so that of two contrary things a Man might indifferently stick to the one or the other, in a negative or affirmative Discourse. To make good our Text, we shall quote Laëtantius. 'Is (Carneades) cum Legatus ab Atheniensibus Romam missus esset, disputavit de iustitia copiose, audiente Galba, & Catone Censorio, maximis tunc Oratoribus. Sed idem disputationem suam postmodum contraria disputatione subvertit, & iustitiam, quam pridie laudaverat, sustulit, non quidem Philosophi gravitate, cujus firma, & stabilis debet esse sententia, sed quasi oratorio exercitii genere in utramque partem differendi. Quod ille facere solebat, ut alios, quodlibet sententiarum, posset refutare (78). — Carneades, being sent Ambassador by the Athenians to Rome, disputed copiously concerning Justice, in the presence of Galba, and Cato the Censor, both at that time great Orators. The next day he overthrew his own Disputation by a contrary one, and destroyed Justice, which the Day before he had extolled; not indeed with the Gravity of a Philosopher, who ought to stick to his Opinion, but as it were to exercise his Rhetoric in disputing pro and con. This he did, that he might be able to oppose others, what ever they asserted. Laëtantius adds, that it was easy for this Philosopher to refute whatever they could say in the behalf of Justice; for the Heathens could have no Notion of it, being Strangers to Religion, the Fountain and Foundation of Justice. 'Erat facillimum iustitiam radices non-habentem labefactare, quia tum nulla in terra fuit; ut, quid esset aut qualis à philosophis cerneretur — cujus origo in religione, ratio in æquitate est. Sed illi, qui primam illam partem nescierunt, ne secundam quidem tenere potuerunt (79). If they had no Notion of it, they were unable to defend it, and consequently forced to quit the Field to the first Sophist, who attacked it. Expofui causam, cur Philosophi nec invenire iustitiam, nec defendere potuerunt. Nunc redeo ad id quod intenderam. Carneades ergo, quoniam erant infirma, quæ à Philosophis differabantur, sumpsit audaciam refellendi, quia refelli posse intellexit (80). — I have shown the reason, why the Philosophers could neither find out, nor defend, Justice. I now return to what I proposed. Carneades therefore, finding how weakly the Philosophers disputed, ventured to refute them, because he knew they might be refuted. After this Laëtantius gives us the Substance of the Dispute, and tells us Carneades argued thus. If there be such a thing as Justice, said he, it must be founded either upon positive Right, or upon natural Right. Now it is not founded upon positive Right; for that varies with Times and Places, every People applying it to their own Profit and Interest: nor is it founded upon natural Right, which is no other than a Byass Nature has implanted in all Animals, which leads them to search after what is useful to them; and it cannot be regulated according to this Byass without committing a thousand Frauds and Violences: from whence it follows, that it cannot be the Foundation of Justice; wherefore, &c. He proved, by a great many Examples, the Condition of Men to be such, that, if they have a Mind to be just, they must act imprudently and foolishly; and, if they have a mind to act prudently, they are unjust: from whence he concluded, that there is no such thing as Justice; for a Virtue inseparable from Folly cannot be just. Laëtantius owns the Heathens were incapable of answering this Argument, and that Cicero dared not undertake it. 'Ita ergo iustitiam cum in duas partes divisisset, alteram civilem esse dicens, alteram naturalem; utramque subvertit, quod illa civilis sapientia fit quidem, sed iustitia non fit, naturalis autem illa iustitia fit quidem, sed non fit sapientia. Arguta hæc planè, & venenata sunt, & quæ M. Tullius non poterit refellere. Nam cum faciat Lælius Furio respon-dentem, proque iustitia dicentem, irrefutata hæc tanquam foveam prætergressus est, ut videatur idem Lælius non naturalem, quæ in stultitiæ crimen venerat, sed illam civilem defendisse iustitiam, quam Furio sapientiam quidem esse concesserat, sed injustam (81). — Thus, having divided Justice into two kinds, and called the one civil, the other natural, he overthrew both; inasmuch as The Civil is Prudence, but not Justice; the Natural is Justice, but not Prudence. This is a subtle Argument, and which Cicero could not refute. For when he introduces Lælius replying to Furio, and defending Justice, he leaves this Argument unrefuted, and seems to make Lælius defend, not Natural Justice, which had been shewn to be Folly, but Civil, which Furio had allowed to be Prudence indeed, but unjust. After this, he gives us a Solution of it by the Light of Faith (82), and observes, that Carneades, knowing on one side that just Men were no Fools, could not find, on the other, the true Reason, why they appeared to be so: from whence he took an Opportunity of declaiming in favour of Incomprehensibility, his darling Principle. Sensit igitur Carneades, quæ sit natura iustitiæ, nisi quod parum altè prospexit, stultitiam non esse, quamquam intelligere mihi video, quæ mente id fecerit. Non enim vere existimavit eum stultum esse, qui iustus est; sed cum sciret non esse, & rationem tamen, cur ita videretur, non comprehenderet, voluit offendere, latere in abdito veritatem, ut decretum disciplinæ suæ tueretur, cujus summa sententia est, nihil percipi posse (83). Let us not forget a very good Observation made by Quintilian. He says that Carneades always lived up to the Rules of Justice, though he argued for Injustice: This was usual with the Academics; their Speculation hung betwixt two Contraries; but their Practice stuck fast to one of them. 'Neque enim Academici, cum in utramque differunt partem, non secundum alteram vivunt. Neque Carneades ille, qui Romæ audiente Censorio Catone non minoribus viribus contra iustitiam dicitur differuisse quam pridie pro iustitia dixerat, injustus ipse vir fuit (84). It is the way of the World: Men do not live up to their Principles (85).

[H] The Subtilties, with which he opposed Justice, appeared terrible to Cicero. One of the best Pieces of This Illustrious Roman is That De Legibus. There he lays down this Foundation, that there is a natural Right, that is, some Actions are just in their own Nature, and which we are obliged to do, not because we live in a Society, where the positive Laws punish those that pay no regard to them, but for the sake of That Justice and Equity, which accompanies them independent of human Institution. This, he says, he must suppose, if he intends to build upon Principles well chosen, and rightly concerted, and yet he does not expect every Body will approve of them: He promises himself only the Approbation of the ancient Platonists, and of the Peripatetics, and Stoics. Epicurus's School he regards not: They professed a Retreat from Politics; he therefore suffered them to philosophize as they thought fit in their Retirement; but he demands Quarter from Arcesilas and Carneades. He is afraid, if they once came to attack him, they would make too great a Breach in the Structure he had been raising. He finds himself too weak to oppose them; he wishes he may not be exposed to their Anger; he desires to appease, and live in Peace with them. These are his Words: 'Vecor committere, ut non bene provisâ & diligenter explorata principia ponantur: nec tamen ut omnibus probentur; nam id fieri non potest; sed ut eis qui omnia recta atque honesta per se expectanda duxerunt, & aut nihil omnino in bonis numerandum, nisi quod per seipsum laudabile esset, aut certe nullum habendum magnum bonum, nisi quod vere laudari sua sponte possit. His omnibus five in Academia veterem cum Speusippo, Xenocrate, Polemone manserunt: five Aristotelem & Theophrastum cum illis re congruentes, genere docendi paululum differentes, sequuti sunt: five, ut Zenoni visum est, rebus non commutatis immutaverint; on which the Books, that treated of Right, and of the Laws, were built. He proved the Stoics guilty of Absurdities with respect to Religion [I]; and I wonder he was suffered to attack them so violently upon that Score; for the Arguments, he alledged, were very proper to destroy, Root and Branch, all the Hea-then Deities. There can be nothing more Christian than one of his Moral Tenets [K].

According to this Idea, Carneades might pass for a destroying Angel (87).

(86) Cicero, lib. i, de legibus.

(87) We observed before, Citat. (81), that Cicero, making Lælius defend Justice against Furius, who stood up for Injustice, let several of Carneades's Arguments pass without an Answer. This was in his Book De Republicâ. See St. Julien, de Civitate Dei, lib. ii, cap. xxi.

[I] He proved the Stoics guilty of Absurdities with respect to Religion. This may be gathered from these Words of Cicero, addressed to the Stoics. Si vos sequar, dic quid ei respondeam, qui me sic roget: Si dii sunt, sunt ne etiam Nymphæ & Deæ? Si Nymphæ, Panisci etiam & Satyri? Hi autem non sunt, ne Nymphæ quidem Deæ igitur. At earum templa sunt publice vota & dedicata. Quid igitur? ne cæteri quidem ergo dii, quorum templa sunt dedicata? Age porro Jovem & Neptunum deum numeras? ergo etiam Orcus frater eorum deus, & illi qui fluere apud inferos dicuntur, Acheron, Cocytus, Styx, Phlegethon; tum Charon, tum Cerberus, dii putandi. At id quidem repudiandum: ne Orcus quidem igitur. Quid dicitis ergo de fratribus? Hæc Carneades agebat, non ut deos tollerent: quid enim philosopho minus conveniens? sed ut Stoicos nihil de diis explicare convinceret. Itaque insequabatur. Quid enim, aiebat, si ii fratres sunt in numero deorum, num de patre eorum Saturno negari potest, quem vulgo maximè colunt ad occidentem? Qui si deus est, patrem quoque ejus Cælum esse Deum confitendum est. Quod si ita est, Cæli quoque parentes dii habendi sunt Æther & Dies, eorumque fratres & sorores, qui à genealogiis antiquis sic nominantur, Amor, Dolus, Metus, Labor, Invidentia, Fatum, Senectus, Mors, Tenebræ, Misericordia, Querela, Gratia, Fraus, Pertinacia, Parca, Hesperides, Somnia, quos omnes Erebo & Nocte natos serunt. Aut igitur hæc monstra probanda sunt, aut prima illa tollenda (88). — If I should embrace your Self, what Answer can I make to him, who shall put this Question to me: If there are Gods, are the Nymphs likewise Deities? If the Nymphs are, are the Pan's and Satyrs? But these are not Gods: therefore neither are the Nymphs. But there are public Temples dedicated to them. What then? Are not the rest therefore Gods, who have Temples dedicated to them? Farther, do you reckon Jupiter and Neptune among the Gods? Then is their Brother Orcus a God, as also the infernal Rivers, Acheron, Cocytus, Styx, and Phlegethon: then are Charon and Cerberus to be esteemed Gods. This you can by no means allow: then neither is Orcus a God. What do you say then of his Brothers? Thus Carneades reasoned; not to take away the Gods; (for what could be more unbecoming a Philosopher?) but to shew, that the Stoics gave no consistent Account of the Gods. He therefore went on. If, said he, those Brothers are in the number of the Gods, can you deny it of their Father Saturn, who is chiefly worshipped in the West? And if Saturn be a God, so must his Father Cælum be likewise. Again, if Cælum be a God, you must esteem his Parents, Æther and Dies, as such, as also their Brethren and Sisters, who are thus named in the ancient Genealogies, Love, Grief, Fear, Labour, Envy, Fate, Old Age, Death, Darkness, Misery, Complaints, Favour, Fraud, Perseverance, The Destinies, The Hesperides, and Dreams; all which, they say, sprung from Erebus and Night. Either therefore you must prove these Fictions to be all Gods, or you must deny that the fore-mentioned are so. You will find, in Cicero, the rest of this Argument, which is very long. We find elsewhere, that Carneades had offered such Arguments against those, who held that the Gods wrought a thousand Things upon Earth for the Benefit of Mankind, that he raised in many People a Curiosity to enquire into the Truth of it. Contra quos Carneades ita multa disseruit, ut excitaret homines non sordides ad veri investigandi cupiditatem (89). It has been observed (90), that, if Carneades had undertaken to plead in behalf of the Pagan Religion, he had fallen very short of that Eloquence, which nothing was able to withstand. Let us observe here, that, in pleading against it, it was easy for him to prevail. His Antagonists melted before his Eloquence, like Wax before the Fire. Mr Foucher, who excuses him as much as he can (91), makes use of too favourable a Turn, and of Conjectures incompatible with Matters of Fact.

WHETHER Carneades wrote any Books.

There are two Passages in Cicero, which I have quoted, that seem to prove, that Carneades wrote some Books. For it is not likely, that a Philosopher's Arguments should be cited, if they had been only known by Tradition. But it may be said, in Answer to this, that they were cited, as found amongst the Works of some of his Scholars. Thus Cicero relates several other of his Doctrines, as he found them in Clitomachus's Writings (92). So that we have no demonstrative Proof against those, who say, that Carneades left nothing behind him in Writing. Plutarch assures us of it in express Terms (93). Others say, there were Letters published, which he had written to Ariarabes, King of Cappadocia, and that all the rest was published by his Scholars, he leaving no Writings behind him (94). These Letters make nothing against Plutarch; for, if they were written without an Intent of being published, the Writer cannot, upon that Score, be reckoned an Author. Pliny and Aulus Gellius contradict Plutarch; They affirm that Carneades took a Dose of Hellebore, when he was to write against Zeno (95). I will not insist upon Fulgentius; for the Carneades, he quotes (96), is probably the Poet (97), and not the Philosopher. Cicero would be more to the purpose; he speaks of a Work of Carneades, upon this Subject; A wise Man will be assisted for the Loss of his Country. This Work was inserted, by Clitomachus, in a Consolatory Epistle, addressed to the Carthaginians, his Countrymen. Legimus librum Clitomachi, quem ille everfa Carthagine misit consolandi causa ad captivos cives suos. In eo est disputatio scripta Carneadis, quam se ait in commentarium retulisse: quum ita positum esset, videri fore in ægritudine sapientem patria capta. Quæ Carneades contraxerat, scripta sunt (98). — I have read the Book of Clitomachus, which he sent, after the Destruction of Carthage, by way of Consolation to his captive Countrymen. There is in it a written Disputation of Carneades, which Clitomachus says he himself transcribed; the Subject of which is the Position, that a wise Man will naturally be assisted for the Loss of his Country. What Carneades said against it was committed to Writing. Cicero was sensible of the strong and subtle Reasons, wherewith Carneades opposed Divination. Nobismet ipsis querentibus quid sit de divinatione judicandum, quod à Carneade multa acute & copiose contra Stoicos disputata sunt (99). But still this does not prove, that they were extant in any Book of this Philosopher. I have observed before (100), how we came by his Objections against this Maxim, Quæ sunt æqualia uni tertio sunt æqualia inter se.

[K] There can be nothing more Christian than one of his Moral Tenets. I shall here copy from a Canon of Dijon, that it may not be said, that, if I was a Divine,

His Arguments against the Oracles of Apollo were of some weight [L]. It is thought he would have made his Disciple Mentor his Successor in the Philosophical

Divine, I would not talk at this rate of the Opinions of a Philosopher, who invincibly refuted the Religion of the Heathens, the only Religion he was acquainted with. 'This was one of his Maxims. If a Man knew privately, that an Enemy, or any other Person, whose Death would be an Advantage to him, was going to sit upon the Grass, under which an Asp lay concealed, he ought to warn him of it, even though no one could reprehend him for his Silence in that Point. Si scieris, inquit Carneades, aspidem occultè latere, assiam, & velle imprudentem aliquem super eam affidere, cujus mors tibi emolumento futura sit, improbe scieris nisi monueris ne affideat, sed impune tamen id te constaret fecisse: quis enim cogere possit (101)? This Doctrine is admirable, and very worthy of Christianity; for what can become a Christian better than to do good to his Enemy, and that without any hopes of Recompence in this World (102)?' These are Mr Foucher's Words, which he almost repeats word for word, in the fourth Chapter of the third Book. But since we are upon Carneades's Morality, let us see what Notion he had of the Nature of Sovereign Good. The chief End of Man, said he, is to enjoy Natural Principles (103). Mr Foucher takes the Meaning of this to be, 'To exercise, in Perfection, all the Functions of the Understanding and the Will, without any Hindrance whatever, arising either from Ignorance, Prejudice, or any other exterior Obstacle (104).' Cicero observes, that Carneades maintained this Maxim, only to contradict the Stoics, and that, if Virtue were united to this Felicity, it were enough to make a Man completely happy. 'Quæ possunt eadem contra Carneadeum illud summum bonum dici, quod is, non tam ut probaret (105), protulit, quam ut Stoicis, quibuscumque bellum gerebat, opponeret. Id autem ejusmodi est, ut additum ad virtutem autoritatem videatur habiturum, & expleturum cumulate vitam beatam (106).' He says, in another place; 'Honestum vivere fruentem rebus his, quas primas homini natura conciliat, & vetus Academia censuit, ut indicant scripta Polemonis, quæ Antiochus probat maxime, & Aristoteles ejusque amici nunc proxime videntur accedere. Introducebatur etiam Carneades, non quo probaret, sed ut opponeret Stoicis, summum bonum esse frui his rebus, quas primas natura conciliavisset (107).'

'Stoici, quum ea re non verbis ponderarentur, causam esse desiderandi negabat (110).' One of his Victories against the Stoics was his driving them from a Post they had held a considerable time. They had maintained, that a good Name, without Profit attending it, was not worth a Man's Care. This they could not make good against Carneades, but found themselves obliged to maintain, That, of itself, it deserved our Choice (111). Every one knows they made a Difference between good Things, and Things that deserve to be preferred.

(111) Id. de finitibus, lib. iii, cap. xv, & seq.

[L] His Arguments against the Oracles of Apollo were of weight.] He maintained, that Apollo could not foretell Things to come, unless they had a Dependence upon a necessary Cause. He denied him the Knowledge of all contingent Events, the Parricide of Oedipus, for Example; for, there being no Cause necessitating him to kill his Father, it was not to be foreseen that he would kill him: A future Action is not to be foreseen, but from a Knowledge of the efficient Causes of it. Nay, he held, That the Gods, presiding over Oracles, could not so much as know what was past, where no Footsteps were remaining to carry them up to the Time of the Event. He pretended, without doubt, that no other Footstep was sufficient for this, but a Chain of Natural Causes, acting without any Use of Free Will, and that the Acts of the Free-Will of Man, breaking this Chain, hindered the Gods from casting their Eyes backward upon past Ages, where no visible Mark of the Events remained. 'Dicebat Carneades, ne Apollinem quidem futura posse dicere, nisi ea, quorum causas natura ita contineret, ut ea fieri necesse esset. Quid enim spectans Deus ipse diceret Marcellum eum, qui ter consul fuit, in mari esse peritum? Erat quidem hoc verum ex æternitate, sed causas id efficientes non habebat, ita ne præterita quidem ea quorum nulla signa tanquam vestigia extarent. Apollini nota esse censebat, quo minus futura. Causis enim efficientibus quasque rem cognitis, posse denique sciri quid futurum esset. Ergo nec de Oedipode potuisse Apollinem prædicere, nullis in rerum natura causis præpositis, cur ab eo patrem interficere necesse esset, nec quicquam ejusmodi (112).' Chrysippus had eluded the Instance drawn from this, That a Man, predestinated to die, shall die, let him make use of Physic or not; he had, I say, eluded it, by supposing a Complication of predestinated Events, as that such a Man shall make use of a Physician, and be cured: For then the Remedy is annexed to the Fatality of the Cure. 'Omnes igitur hujus generis captiones eodem modo refelluntur. Sive tu adhibueris medicum, sive non adhibueris, convalesces, captiosum. Tam enim est fatale medicum adhibere, quam convalescere. Hæc ut dixi confatalia ille appellat (113).' This Answer did not satisfy Carneades: but, in order to confute it well, he shewed the great Inconvenience attending it, I mean, the Loss of Free-Will. If, said he, you join thus, in the Decrees of Fate, the Causes with their Effects, all Things must be done by Necessity, and nothing will be left in our Power; every Thing will depend upon an antecedent Cause, and a Chain of Causes arise, linked together by a natural invincible Tie. His Thought will appear better in Cicero's Words. 'Carneades genus hoc totum non probabat, & nimis inconsiderate concludi hanc rationem putabat: itaque premebat alio modo, nec ullam adhibebat calumniam, cujus erat hæc conclusio: Si omnia antecedentibus causis fiunt, omnia naturali colligatione conferta contextaque fiunt, quod si ita est, omnia necessitas efficit. Id si verum est, nihil est in nostra potestate. Est autem aliquid in nostra potestate. At si omnia fato fiunt, omnia causis antecedentibus fiunt: non igitur fato fiunt quæcunque fiunt (114).'

depends upon an indifferent Cause. None, but the Socinians, have been so ingenuous as to acknowledge the evident Force of this Objection; but, alas! into what a Gulph has their Ingenuity thrown them? It has cost them the Preciency of GOD; and what a monstrous Absurdity is it to suppose a GOD ignorant of what Men will do, 'till their Actions are a doing.

[M] He broke with Mentor, upon catching him in Bed with his Mistress.] That I may leave room for no Equivocation, I must tell the Reader that Mentor was in Bed with his Master Carneades's Concubine. In this case Carneades found no Grounds to dispute upon Probability or Incomprehensibility; he was grown like the rest of his Neighbours; he took for a Thing certain and indisputable, what his own Eyes had seen, of the Infidelity of his Mistress, and his Scholar; whereupon he broke with Mentor, who became his Antagonist, opposed Subtilties to Subtilties, and confuted the Acatelephs. Καρνεάδης δὲ γίνεται γυναικὶ. Μέντωρ μὲν οὐ παρὸν, ἡ μὲν διαδοχὴ. Ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τῷ Καρνεάδῃ ἐπὶ πολλὰ καὶ μοιχρὸν εὐρύν, ὅχ' ὑπὸ πιδανῆς φαντασίας, ἡ δ' ὡς μὴ κατεληγμένη, ἐς δὲ μάλα σιγῶν τῇ ὁδοί, καὶ καταλαβὼν, παρτήσατο τῆς διατελεῖς. Mentorem Carneades primum habuit discipulum, non tamen pellicem suam repererat, non jam viro tantum probabili, aut quasi minus hominem comprehenderet, at suis maxime credens oculis, eumque vere comprehendens, ejus deinceps operam & consuetudinem repudiavit (115). This we have from Numenius. Diogenes Laërtius speaks of it with more Brevity (116). This Action of Mentor was a very base one: He was Carneades's Head Scholar; he had as free an Access into his Master's House, as if he had been his Child; this Liberty he abused, and debauched his Patron's Mistress. The Irregularities of Love can never be too much detested. It is a brutal Passion, that chokes all Sentiments of Gratitude and Generosity. There are some Men, who, for the whole World, would not wrong their Friend of a Farthing. If they are sensible of having betrayed him in the smallest Circumstance, they are severely touched with it: Generosity carries them through all other Points: But, when a Wife or Daughter are in the way, there it leaves them, and they make no scruple of debauching them. Friendship is not proof against That Devil of Uncleanness, to which every Thing is lawful Prize. Non sospes ab hospitio tutus. The Rights of Hospitality, so sacred, so inviolable, cannot retain him, but rather serve to open a readier way to his Designs.

[N] I do not believe - - - he was cotemporary with Epicurus. This Point raised a Contest between two modern Writers.] I mean between Mr Foucher, Canon of Dijon, and Mr Lantin, Counsellor in the Parliament of the same Town. The Particulars of this Dispute are to be found in the Journal des Sçavans (117). The Question is, Whether Carneades was cotemporary with Epicurus. This Mr Foucher affirms in his History of the Academics, and maintains, by four Arguments, in a Memorial communicated to Mr Cousin (118). They were refuted by Mr Lantin (119), and that in a Method, I think, unanswerable. He has found in Cicero (120) a very decisive Point; which is, that Carneades came with the other two Athenian Embassadors to Rome, under the Consulship of P. Scipio, and M. Marcellus. Now this Consulship was in the 598th Year of Rome, which is the second of the CLVth Olympiad, and after Epicurus's Death about 112 Years. Which proves, that Epicurus and Carneades could not be living at the same time. The Authority therefore, which Mr Foucher brings from Cicero (121), where he says, that Carneades, Epicurus's intimate Friend, Epicuro persamiliaris, made a Visit to Arcefila, must be groundless. Either Cicero's Memory failed him, or he speaks of another Carneades (122), or the Copylists have written Carneades instead of some other Philosopher, as they have done in several other Places (123). Mr Foucher, without question, felt the weight of this Reason; but, having started new Difficulties, he thought not fit to surrender, till Mr Lantin had removed them (124). He thought it probable, that the Consulship, under which the three Embassadors came to Rome, might be That of one Scipio the Bald, and a Marcellus in 531, or 532, of the Foundation of Rome. . . . This being allowed, Carneades might have lived twenty Years with Epicurus, and have been deputed to this Embassy at sixty Years of Age. . . . and have lived thirty Years longer; since he did not die before he was ninety Years old. But it is very easy to prove this Embassy to have been a great while after the Year 532.

In the first place, we learn from Pausanias (125), that the Pillage of Oropus was after the Romans had reduced Macedonia into a Province; and it is certain, that Perseus, the last King of that Country, was not carried to Rome till the Year 587. It is therefore impossible, that an Embassy, designed to moderate the Fine laid on the Athenians for the Pillage of that Place (126), should fall in with the Year of Rome 532. In the second place, Cato was an old Man in the time of this Embassy: This Plutarch observes. Ἡ δὲ αὐτοῦ γένησις γέγονε πρὸς τὸν Ἀδριανόν, ἡ δὲ ἐν τῷ ἔσχατῳ ἔτη οἱ περὶ Καρνεάδην, &c. Eo jam sene legati Atheniensium Romam adventarunt Carneades, &c (127). Now Cato was born in the Year of Rome 519; for Cicero (128) makes him say, that, at the Age, of Sixty five, he advised the Establishment of the Poman Law, under the Consulship of Philip and Cepio, which falls in the Year of Rome 584. This proves it impossible those three Embassadors should be sent to Rome in 532. Here is a third Reason, taken from the very Passages, which Mr Foucher has produced to support his Cause. Scipio and Laelius were very young at the time of this Embassy (129), and looked on old Age as at a great distance from them, in the Year of Rome 601. See Cicero de Senectute; where Cato speaks like an old Man to young People, and tells them, that Scipio Africanus had been dead Thirty three Years (130), one Year before Cato was Censor. He died then in 568: Wherefore it is impossible Carneades should have been at Rome in Quality of Athenian Ambassador in 532; for, if Scipio and Laelius had been then fifteen Years of Age, they must have been more than eighty before the third Punic War, than which nothing can be more false, nor would any thing be more ridiculous than Cato's Discourse in this Dialogue de Senectute. He would not have been so old as they. So that I cannot comprehend what induced Mr Foucher to vindicate his Opinion by this Instance, that Scipio and Laelius were young, when these Philosophers were deputed to the Roman People. I add, in the fourth place, that his Objection to Mr Lantin, founded upon the Consulship, assigned by Cicero, is insignificant. Cicero places the Embassy of these three Philosophers under the Consulship of Scipio and M. Marcellus. Mr Lantin will have it to be That of P. Scipio Nasica, and M. Marcellus, Anno Urbis 598. He is answered thus: 'That Marcellus, under whose Consulship Carneades was sent to Rome, was dead before That Marcellus, who had Scipio Nasica for his Colleague, was created Consul. For we find, in the Dialogue de Senectute, that this first died before the Year of Rome 552; whereas Nasica's Colleague was not Consul with him 'till the Year 599, at which time it is certain Carneades's Embassy was over. It could not therefore be under the Consulship of Scipio Nasica and Marcellus, that Carneades came to Rome, since, before that time, the Embassy was expired, and Marcellus, under whose Consulship it was performed, was then dead; which is manifest from Cicero in the same Dialogue: Cujus interitum ne crudelissimus quidem hostis honore sepul-

Reader will find in the Journal des Scavans, and of which I shall give a short Account. Plutarch has recorded this witty Saying of Carneades (b), That the only thing young Princes are instructed in, is, how to ride the Great Horse: Other Masters flatter them: They, who wrestle with them suffer themselves to be thrown; but a Horse, without making any Distinction between the Rich and the Poor, the Subject and the Sovereign, flings to the Ground every unskillful Rider that dares mount him. I shall observe, in the Remarks, a Mistake of Mr Saldenus [O], and Those

(131) Journal des Scavans, 1692, pag. 705.

'turæ carere passus est (131). -- Whose Death even the truest of Enemies honoured with Funeral Rites. For an Answer to this Passage, it will be sufficient to consider, that the Latin Words, with which it concludes, relate to That brave Marcellus, who behaved himself so gallantly in the time of the second Punic War, and whose Funeral Obsequies Hannibal honourably solemnized Ann. Rom. 545. Cato was then but Twenty six Years old. It was therefore under neither of this Marcellus's Consulates, that Carneades was sent to the Romans. I cannot conceive for what reason the Year of Rome 592 is brought in here.

Observe, that the Passage in the second Book de Oratore, quoted by Mr Foucher, is erroneous; it may be a Fault of the Impression; however it be, instead of L. Africano read P. Africano, and be very well assured that nothing is more improper for Mr Foucher's Purpose, than this Passage in Cicero. We there meet with three illustrious Romans, Scipio, Lælius, and Furius, very well pleased that the Athenians had sent, in Quality of Embassadors to Rome, Carneades, Critolaus, and Diogenes. Mr Foucher was in the right, when he said, that these three Romans, with some others, were the young Men that raised a Jealousy in Cato, upon Account of these Grecian Philosophers, and that Scipio Africanus was not then Consul. But this Observation, instead of favouring his Cause, is prejudicial to it. No one ever pretended, that Scipio, under whose Consulship these three Philosophers came to Rome, was either of the two Scipio's surnamed Africanus; and, as this manifestly relates to him, who, in the third Punic War, ruined Carthage, and after that Numantia, it necessarily follows, that the Voyage of the Philosophers was made towards the End of the Vth Century of Rome, and not in 532. That Scipio was not yet born in 532; for, when he was created Consul in 606, he had not the Age required by the Laws for the Execution of that Office (132). He only demanded to be Ædile; however, to the Satisfaction of the Tribunes of the People, his Age was dispensed with (133). His Youth, during the Residence of those Philosophers at Rome, is one of the best Arguments Mr Lantini could object to Mr Foucher. I wonder he passes over so carelessly the Testimony of Aulus Gellius, which Mr Foucher makes use of. He thinks it sufficient to observe, that it is not an Authority, which can be compared with That of Cicero (134). In my Opinion, he might have given a more effectual Answer: He might have contradicted what Mr Foucher has made Aulus Gellius say, That Carneades was sent Embassador about the Year 534 (135). These are Aulus Gellius's Words: 'Ac deinde annis fere post quindecim bellum adversus Pœnos sumptum est: atque non nimium longe M. Cato Orator in civitate, & Plautus Poeta in Scena floruerunt: iisdemque temporibus Diogenes Stoicus, & Carneades Academicus, & Critolaus Peripateticus ab Atheniensibus ad Senatum populi Romani negotii publici gratia legati sunt: neque magno intervallo postea Q. Ennius, &c. (136). -- About fifteen Years after, a War was begun against the Carthaginians; and, very soon after, M. Cato the Orator, and Plautus the Poet, flourished: the one in the State, the other on the Stage: and, at the same time, Diogenes the Stoic, and Carneades the Academic, and Critolaus the Peripatetic, were sent Embassadors from the Athenians to the Senate of Rome, on a public Affair: and, a little later, Ennius, &c.' This ought rather to be referred to the Year 560, than to 534; for Cato's first Consulship falls in with the Year of Rome 558, and Plautus died not 'till 569 (137). I do not approve of Aulus Gellius's Chronology: The loose manner, in which he expresses himself, with his non nimium longe: iisdem temporibus: neque magno intervallo postea: is enough to make it disregarded. These are indefinite Terms, and may be extended more or less, as Cassaubon has very judiciously observed (138).

I know there are a great many Readers, who will accuse me for insinuating longer than I ought upon Punctillio's; they will say, that it signifies but little to know whether Carneades came to Rome in 532, or 598: But I shall not concern myself at all with the ill Taste of such Censurers, or make a Scruple of those Enquiries, which an illustrious Counsellor in the Parliament of Burgundy, and an illustrious Canon in the Capital of the same Province, thought not unworthy their Attention, and which they have communicated to the Public under the Patronage of a famous President of the Court of the Mint at Paris (139). If any one be willing to take my Part against the Censures of those tickly Palates, that condemn this sort of Discussions, I desire them to apply, in my Behalf, these Verses in Terence.

Faciunt næ intelligendo ut nihil intelligant,
Qui cum hunc accusant, Nævium, Plautum, Ennium
Accusant, quos hic noster autores habet,
Quorum æmulari exoptat negligentiam,
Potius quam istorum obscuram diligentiam (140).

— With all their Pretensions to Knowledge, they do but betray their Ignorance; who, in accusing him, accuse Nævius, Plautus, Ennius, whose Example our Author follows, and whose Negligence he would rather emulate, than the obscure Diligence of such Men.

[O] I shall observe — a Mistake of Mr Saldenus.] Having made mention of the Philosopher Heraclitus's Obscurity, he observes the same Fault in Epicurus and Carneades. 'Germani huic fuerunt Epicurus & Carneades Cyrenæus, novæ Academiæ principes, quorum hic adeo a Clytomacho obscurus dictus fuit, ut nunquam percipere se potuisse asseveravit, quænam scriptorum ejus mens sensusque fuerit (141). — A kin to these were Epicurus, and Carneades of Cyrene, the Founder of the new Academy; the latter of whom, Clytomachus tells us, was so obscure, that he averred he could never discover the Sense and Meaning of his Writings.' Allowing his Epicurus to be as much chief of the new Academy, as I am Patriarch of Constantinople, we will only observe, that Clitomachus did not complain of the Obscurity of Carneades's Writings. He said no more than that he could not discover what Sentiments Carneades approved of (142). This does not proceed from the Obscurity of Expression, but the Scepticism of that Philosopher. He held nothing for certain; he maintained and opposed successively the self same Doctrines, and, for this reason, it could not be discerned whether he approved of any of them. I do not accuse honest Saldenus of not understanding Cicero's Words, from whence we have what relates to Clitomachus: I make no question but he had understood them, if he had found them in the Original; but he met with them in a Place of Exile, where they had lost their natural Garb. He ought therefore to be excused if he mistook them. He saw them in a modern Book, whither they were arrived, after having traversed several sorts of Countries. They had suffered so much by Thieves, that there was nothing left them of their Patrimony. They had passed through so many Hands, that a small Blow at every Removal was enough to cost them their Lives. The same may be said of an infinite number of Passages, copied from the first modern Writer that comes in one's way. They are robbed, maimed, stigmatized, &c. Fugitives: It is therefore no wonder if their Condition be mistaken, and if the Qualities of their Birth cannot be discovered.

Those of Mr Moreri [P]. I have mentioned, elsewhere (i), a Carneades, one of Epicurus's Friends, and who, in my Opinion, is the same with That voluptuous Epicurean, called Corniades in the Edition of Plutarch (k). There is no reason to suppose, that Cicero, speaking of this Friend of Epicurus, meant That Carneades who was Author of the third Academy. See the Marginal Note (122), in the Remark [N]. I shall examine, upon another Occasion (l), That Passage in Diogenes Laërtius, importing, that one of Epicurus's Scholars changed Sides, and joined himself to Carneades; and I shall set down Mr de la Monnoie's Thoughts thereupon.

[P] ----- and the Faults of Moreri.] I. Nothing is more false than to affirm, that Carneades succeeded Chrysippus. This Fault was omitted in the second Holland Edition. II. It is true, he applied himself more to moral than natural Philosophy (143); but it is false that he neglected every thing else besides Morality. Could he have maintained the Epoche so vigorously and eloquently as he did, if he had neglected Physics, Logic, Rhetoric, &c? III. Ought that earnest Meditation, which made him forget to eat at Table, to be called a profound Sleepiness? Can any one be more awake than in such a Condition? IV. Valerius Maximus did not say, that he purged his Brain with Hellebore ----- when he was to dispute against Zeno: Moreri should have said against Chrysippus. V. He did not poison himself, upon hearing that Antipater had taken Poison. We find the quite contrary in Diogenes Laërtius. That Historian relates, that (144) Carneades had a great Aversion to Death, often repeating these Words, Nature, that has collected, will disperse likewise, intimating, that she ought to be left to herself, and not be prevented by self-murder. When he was told, that his Adversary, Antipater the Stoic (145), had poisoned himself, he felt a Fit of Resolution to brave Death. Give me too, said he: and when they asked him what? Some good Wine, replied he. By which it appears, that, if he had conceived some Ambition of imitating his Antagonist, it vanished in a Moment. Diogenes Laërtius ridicules him for his Cowardice, and reproaches him for choosing rather to languish under a Phtisic, than release himself by Death (146). Father Labbe ought to have known these Particulars, and not have affirmed, that he poisoned himself (147). VI. If it is difficult to settle the Year, in which he died, it is not for the Reason Moreri gives, viz. because Diogenes Laërtius allows him to have lived Eighty five Years, and Cicero ninety. This Difference does not make the thing difficult; for we are ignorant in what Year

Carneades was born, which if we could discover, we should have no more to do than to suppose him to die Five Years sooner or later, according as Cicero's Authority should be rejected, or preferred to That of Diogenes Laërtius; by which means the Difficulty would not be very considerable. It is so however, but for other Reasons, which you will find discussed in the two Authors named by Father Labbe. 'It is very difficult, says he, to determine in what Year this Philosopher died, as the same Father Petavius has very well observed, in his Miscellaneous Exercitations upon the Works of Julian the Apostate. Jonsius, in his Philosophical History (148), very judiciously answers the Objections, which the said Father had learnedly made against the vulgar Opinion, founded upon the Authority of Apollodorus, as he is cited by Diogenes Laërtius (149). Mr Moreri, intending to make use of the first Lines in this Passage, did it with too little Attention, and thereby fell into a great Oversight. VII. It is not true, that Apollodorus, quoted by the same Diogenes, ----- affirms ----- that there was an Eclipse of the Moon at Carneades's Death. Diogenes vents it only upon an Hear-say, without quoting Apollodorus. He adds, that it looked as if the most beautiful of all the Stars, next to the Sun, sympathized with Carneades (150). Others say, the Sun was darkened at the same time (151). VIII. The Athenians having pillaged Oropus, Moreri should not have said, that they were the Cause of That Plague. It is a wrong Expression in that Place. IX. It is false, to say, that Carneades was against following Probability; he owns a Man ought to square his Actions by it (152). X. Plutarch's Piece against Colotes ought not to have been quoted; for there is not one Word of Carneades in it. XI. But Father Rapin ought to have been quoted (153), whom Moreri has copied Word for Word, near a Page together.

CARRANZA (BARTHOLOMEW), a Native of Miranda (a), in Navarre, was one of the most illustrious Dominicans in the XVIth Century. He signalized himself in the Council of Trent, Ann. 1546 [A], especially whilst the Matter of Residence was in agitation (b). He maintained, not only that Residence is of divine Right, but also that the contrary Opinion is a diabolical Doctrine (c). Philip of Austria, who had been his Pupil (d), took him with him (e), when he went into England to marry Queen Mary. He thought him very capable of refuting and exterminating the Protestant Faith, which had taken deep Root in that Country. He laboured very earnestly in this Mission; he caused several Books to be burned, and a great many People to be banished, and the University of Oxford to be restored. He was made the Queen's Confessor, and pleased Philip to that degree, that, by his means, he was preferred to the first See in Spain, (the Archbishopric of Toledo), Ann. 1557 (f). He assisted at the Death of Charles V (g) [B], which,

That Oration which we still have of his. Oration is very improper; it ought to have been Sermon. Nicolas Antonio, who very expressly observes the Year to have been 1546, makes use of the Word Cencio (1). There was no Council in 1556.

[B] He assisted at the Death of Charles V. No one can deny This. 'administering those Assistances, which a departing Soul is supplied with after the Christian manner.' Father Paul knew nothing of this; if he had, he would have taken notice of it in that place, where he makes mention of Constantius Pontius and our Carranza (3). The Jesuit Palavicini, who spares him in nothing, accuses him for having attributed That to Pontius, which belonged to Carranza, viz. that Pontius attended the Emperor in his last Extremity. which, as much as any thing else, occasioned People to say, that That Emperor died a Lutheran [C]; for, in 1559, Carranza was taken up for an Heretic by the Inquisition (b). After having defended himself in Spain till 1567, he was removed to Rome, where his Imprisonment continued very long. At last Sentence was given against him in 1576, importing, that, though they had no certain Proofs of his Heresy, yet, forasmuch as there were very great Presumptions against him, he must make a solemn Abjuration. Upon his Submission to this Order, he was removed into the Convent of the Minerva (i), where he died a little after (k), viz., the second of May, 1576, at Seventy two Years of Age. Palavicini therefore is a Witness that Carranza performed the last Offices of the Church to Charles V. Nicolas Antonio saith the same thing (5). I shall produce Campana as a fourth Witness, in the following Remark.

[C] Which ----- occasioned People to say, that the Emperor died a Lutheran.] It is notoriously known, that Carranza lost his Archbishopric and his Liberty, as an Heretic; and that, after fifteen or sixteen Years Imprisonment, he was declared suspected of Heresy, and condemned, as such, to an Abjuration, and other Penalties (6). It is not very strange therefore, that several Catholics and Protestants should suspect, upon different Motives, that Charles V died not averfe to the Sentiments of Luther, since he was willing to render up his Soul in the Hands of such an Archbishop. The Spaniards knew very well the bottom of these Presumptions; and, finding they cannot deny that Carranza assisted at the Death of that Emperor, they come off with saying, that Charles V sent for him to censure and reprove him. See how the Count de la Roca turns the matter: 'Don Bartholomew de Carranza, Archbishop of Toledo, was present at the Funeral of the immortal Charles V, at which all his Family assisted. This Prelate arrived a little before at St Justus, where the Emperor expected him with Impatience, having heard that his Heretical Opinions, which after that gave him abundance of Trouble: this generous and catholic Prince thought himself obliged to reprimand him (7). This Author takes no notice, that the Emperor was prepared for Death by Carranza: but his Silence is of no weight, since Cardinal Palavicini, who gives the same reason for Carranza's appearing at that Ceremony (8), that John Antony de Vera (9) gives, acknowledges, in express Terms, that this Archbishop afforded to the dying Prince all the Assistance, that the Church affords on such an Occasion, Extrema Ecclesiae officia illi praestitit in vitae exitu (10). Spondanus, perceiving the Artifice of the Spanish Historians, thought himself obliged to oppose the Testimony of Campana to That of Sandoval, Panegyric Historiographer to Charles V. Sandoval owns that his Imperial Majesty saw Carranza, but denies, that he spoke to him, though he had a Desire to question him about some erroneous Opinions charged upon him. Spondanus, notwithstanding this Account from Sandoval, gives an entire Credit to Campana, who says, in Philip the Second's Life, that Charles thanked Carranza for having assisted him on that necessary Occasion, confessed his Sins to him, received the Sacrament from him, and had several spiritual Discourses with him till his Death. 'Carolus gratias ei egisse de adventu ad ipsum in tali necessitate, & confessum ei esse sua peccata sacramentaliter, atque Eucharistiam de ejus manu sumpsisse, ac multa spiritualia colloquia cum eo habuisse usque ad transitum: quod & nos verum putamus, cum plures id afferant (11). Spondanus verily believes all this, without any regard to Sandoval, who had not denied it, but for fear such a thing would have made Charles V pass for an Heretic: 'Sed Sandovalium qui nonnulli laudes Caroli prosequitur timuisse, ne si diceretur Carolus sacramentum in fine à Miranda, qui postea ----- infamatus est de pravâ doctrinâ, suscepisse, & extrema verba cum eo habuisse, id in Caroli dedecus ac quoddam animæ periculum verteret (12).'

amends in another place, and has not neglected the Occasion of making Charles V appear under the Character of a Prince suspected of Heresy: for, giving an Account of the cruel Executions in Spain, he observes, 'that Constantius Pontius, who died some Days before in the Prison of the Inquisition, and who had been Charles the Fifth's Confessor in his Solitude, and received his last Groans, was burned in Effigy (13). He was imprisoned immediately upon That Prince's Death (14). This last Execution, adds he, tho' done on an Image, appeared more terrible than any of the rest; every one concluding there was no Connivance or Pity to be expected from a Prince, who did not so much as spare a Person, whose Disgrace would be a Blemish to his own Father's Memory (15). Mezeraï carries the Reflexion farther; for, after having related how Philip caused several Lutherans to be burned, 'nay the very Effigies of Constantius Pontius Confessor to Charles V, and who administered to him at the Point of Death; he adds, that it was no wonder he could, without scruple, blast his Father's Memory, since, as some say, he had a mind to have him indicted after his Death, and his Bones burnt, for being an Heretic, nothing restraining him but this Consideration, that, if his Father died an Heretic, he had forfeited his Estates, and consequently had no Right of resigning them to his Son (16). In this Account are several Particulars: I. That Pontius was Confessor to Charles V. II. That he performed the Functions of That Office in the Agonies and dying Gasps of That Emperor. III. That he was burnt in Effigy. IV. That this reflected upon Charles's Memory. And, V. That Philip would have got his late Father condemned to be burnt for Heresy, but for some weighty political Reasons, that restrained him. Mezeraï relates this last Circumstance as being the Opinion of some People; but others affirm it without any Restriction (17). We shall see hereafter (18) upon what Authority Brantome reports it. I believe this for certain, that it is a matter very uncertain. The first and second Points are denied by the Spanish Writers (19). They own, that Pontius (20) was Preacher to Charles V, but deny his being his Confessor, and maintain, that he was in the Prison of the Inquisition before the Death of That Prince. See what the Count de la Roca says; 'When the Inquisition arrested Constantine, at Seville, Charles was heard to say, 'If Constantine be a Heretic, he is a very great one (21). That Prince's last Confessor was called Francis Villalva (22). The third Point is most true. And, as for the fourth, it may be said, that the Conviction of Constantius Pontius gave ground for some Suspicions relating to Charles V. We ought not to forget, that it does not appear that Carranza had any share in the spiritual Direction of That Emperor; and, if he administered to him the Sacraments of the Church upon his Deathbed, it was, say some, because the Monastery of St Justus was in his Diocese. He went to the Convent, as soon as he heard the Emperor was ill, and arrived there the Day before his Imperial Majesty's Decease. 'Placidissime expiravit (Carolus) praesente Bartholomæo Carranza à Miranda Archiepiscopo Toletano, Ordinis Dominicani, loci Ordinario, qui audita ejus infirmitate accurrerat, & pridie obitus advenerat, summa ejus, ut quidem scribunt, consolatione (23). ----- Charles expired very calmly in the Presence of Bartholomew Carranza of Miranda, Archbishop of Toledo, a Dominican, and Ordinary of the Place, who, bearing of his Sickness, hastened to him, and arrived the Day before his Death, to the great Consola-

of his Patience [D]. His chief Books are Summa Conciliorum, and a Spanish Catechism in Folio, which has been put in the Index [E].

You will find an ample Account of the Merit and Adventures of Carranza in Mr Varillas's Preface to the fifth Tome of his History of Herefy. See likewise the Twenty third Book of the same History. He has not forgot to observe, that the General of the Jesuits favoured Carranza. An Apologist of the Dominicans (1) made use of this in answer to a Jesuit, who had a mind to call this great Prelate's Faith in Question. Gratitude obliged the General of That Society to defend Carranza in this Conjunction; for it was he who gave the Jesuits leave to settle in Toledo, which his Predecessor had vigorously opposed (m).

* tion of the Emperor as some write.* We shall speak more fully of this Part of Charles's History under his own Article, in the Remark [D]; where we shall observe some Faults of the Abbot de St Real.

[D] They tell us Wonders of his Patience.] One of the greatest Instances, that can be given of it, is, that, though he knew himself innocent, he did not in the least blame his Judges. 'Perceiving himself near Death, upon St Athanasius's Day, who was the greatest Prelate, and the most persecuted of any the Church had in his time, in presence of the holy Sacrament, which was brought him for his Viaticum, and of all the Religious in the Convent of the Minerva, at Rome, where he died (24), he said, with Tears in his Eyes, That by the glorious LORD he was going to receive, and before whom, in a few Hours, he must give up his Account, he had never mortally offended him in matters of Faith; that, notwithstanding, he esteemed it a just Sentence that was pronounced upon him, in consequence of what had been alledged and proved against him; an Action that acquired him so high an Esteem of Innocence, that, when he was interred, though it was upon a Working-day, all the Shops were shut up as close as if it had been Easter. The People had as great a Veneration for his Corps, as they could have had for That of a Saint (25). It is an edifying thing, that the People made it appear they did Justice on this Occasion to oppressed Innocence. The People are not always blind (26); though here they did their Duty but by halves: they ought at the same time to have expressed their Indignation against That unjust Tribunal, which had been so long persecuting an innocent Man; and, at least, they should have made it appear, that they wished his wicked Judges might be stigmatized with some Mark of Infamy: For how insupportable is it to see a learned Prelate, against whom no Proof was produced, not able to get out of his Informers

Clutches, till he had suffered a long and painful Captivity, and then to be discharged with a Brand, designed only to save the Honour of his execrable Persecutors? In order to hide the Injustice they had done Carranza, they were obliged to declare, that there were strong Presumptions against him; without which they had stood too much exposed to the Complaints and Indignation of the People. This is the Point, wherein the Public was imposed upon, and at which the People should have been offended. But this is to require too many things at one time from the Multitude. It is the part of wise Men to behold this double Iniquity, and humbly to adore the divine Providence, which suffers the Tribunal of the Inquisition, a real Abomination introduced into the Holy Places, not only to reign and triumph thus long in so many Christian Countries, but also to enlarge it's Phylacteries, and spread it's Roots every way.

[E] He wrote a Spanish Catechism - - - which has been put in the Index.] Nicolas Antonio says this was the Cause of Carranza's Persecutions. 'Qui liber Autori suo infortunii tota causa fuisse dicitur: quare prohibitus est in Romano Indice (27). You may find, in Father Paul, what a Clamour the Bishop of Lerida made against the Congregation of the Index for having approved this Book. The Bishop of Lerida inveighed against the Sentence of the Congregation, and related several Plates in the Book, which, taken in the Sense he gave them, seemed worthy of Censure; and, what is worse, taxed the Conscience of the Prelates of That Congregation. Hereupon the Chief complained to the Legates. The Dispute was concluded, upon some Excuses made by the Bishop of Lerida, and on Condition that no Copies should be given of the Attestation, that had been remitted to Carranza's Agent. The Count de Luna, the Spanish Ambassador, recovered the Attestation out of the Agent's Hands (28).

CARTEROMACHUS (SCIPIO), Native of Pistoia in Tuscany, was a learned Man in the XVIth Century. He understood very well both Latin and Greek [A], and was very happy in his Explications of the difficult Passages of the ancient Authors. He was very much respected at Venice, from whence he had never parted, but for the Confusions of the War, which threatened to interrupt his Studies. He retired to Rome, where he found a favourable Protection in Cardinal Francis Aldobrandini's Family. He followed him to Ravenna, whence, when that Cardinal had lost his Life, he returned to Rome. He was placed, by Pope Leo X, with Julius de Medicis, in quality of a learned Man, and had undoubtedly raised himself

[A] He understood very well both Latin and Greek.] This appears by his Writings: 'Qua literaturâ fuerit, five carmen Græcè five Latine pangeret, five orationem elucubraret, ex multis ejus scriptis unicuique erudito viro licet inspicere (1). — His Writings will satisfy any learned Man of his Abilities in Greek or Latin Poetry, or Prose.' Alcyonius ascribes to him a profound Knowledge in the Greek Language. 'Cui, says he (2), tametsi Latinus est, attamen vel Græci ipsi in suæ linguæ cognitione & subtilitate primas deferunt. — Whom, though an Italian, The Greeks themselves allow to excel in the Knowledge and Accuracy of their Tongue.' Some Pages after, see how he makes Julius de Medicis speak to his Cousin John Cardinal de Medicis, afterwards Pope Leo X. 'Multos Græcâ literaturâ insignes viros domi habes, ad quorum emulationem non desitis cum omni genere exercitationis, tum maxime stilo, augere partam eloquentiam; atque inter hos maxime eminet Scipio Carteromachus, quem honorificentissime pro tua natura liberalissimèque tractas, cum præsertim videas illum quamquam Latinum Græcè sic loqui & scribere, ut solus post veterum Græcorum Platonis, Socratis, Demosthenis, & Strabonis interitum, orbi eloquentiæ tutor relictus videatur (3). — You have with you many Men famous for Greek Learning, in Emulation of whom, you continue to improve the Eloquence you have acquired, in every kind of Exercise, particularly in Stile: among these the most eminent is Scipio Carteromachus, whom you treat with that great Respect and Liberality, which is natural to you, being sensible, that, though he is an Italian, yet he speaks and writes in the Greek Language so well, that, since the Death of the ancient Greeks, Plato, Socrates, Demosthenes, and Strabo, he seems to be left as the only Support and Guardian of Orphan Eloquence.'

self to some honourable and advantageous Post, if Death had not anticipated his Master's Friendship (a). I shall quote one Author, who says that he lived with Cardinal John de Medicis, in 1512 (b): this Cardinal was afterwards Pope Leo X. I shall cite another Author, to shew, that Carteromachus was free from Ostentation, and that he died at about the Age of Forty three Years [B].

[B] Carteromachus was far from Ostentation, and died at about the Age of Forty three Years. He must be provoked, and spurred, before he would discover himself in his Discourse to be a Man of Learning. What a fine Commendation! and how few learned Men deserve it! He, who has given it to Carteromachus, ought to be believed; he speaks of a Man that was dead, and to whom he was personally known. 'Bononia primum videre contigit' 'Scipionem Carteromachum, reconditæ & absolutæ eruditionis hominem, sed uique adeo alienum ab ostentatione, ut ni provocasset, jurasset esse litera-

I was more intimately acquainted with him afterwards at Rome: and he died not much above Forty two Years of Age.' The Letter, out of which I take these Words, is dated the first of March 1524.

CARTHAGENA (JOHN), was first a Jesuit, and after that a Franciscan. He was a Spaniard by Nation, and Professor at Salamanca; but removed from thence to Rome, where he taught Divinity with Applause, under the Pontificate of Paul V. He died at Naples, in 1617 (a). No Man was ever more devoted to the Interest of the Court of Rome than Carthagenæ, or stood up more peremptorily for the Papal Rights. This appears by his Works published upon the Quarrels between Paul V, and the Republic of Venice [A]. The French have found Arguments in these Works, wherewith to defend themselves against the malicious Complaints of the Spaniards [B]. Carthagenæ made likewise some extravagant Suppositions concerning God's Favours to some Saints [C]. The Reader will find, in the last Remark, a Specimen of his Genius.

[A] The Works be published upon the Quarrels between Paul V, and the Republic of Venice. These are the Titles; Pro Ecclesiastica libertate, & potestate tuenda adversus injustas Venetorum leges; printed at Rome 1607, in Quarto. Propugnaculum Catholicum de jure belli Romani Pontificis adversus Ecclesiæ jura violantes. Rome 1609, in Octavo.

[B] The French found Arguments in them, wherewith to defend themselves against the malicious Complaints of the Spaniards. They were continually complaining of the Alliances France concluded with the Protestant Powers. They used Exaggerations and Hyperboles, to cry down particularly the League, which was formed in favour of the Elector Palatine, and of which, said they, the King of England is the Head: whereupon they vented their Spleen against that Monarch to such a Degree, that they were within an Hair's breadth of displaying all that infamous Satire, they had formerly printed against him under the Name of the Corona Regia (1). To this, among other things, Father Carthagenæ was objected (2), who, in Rome, a Spanish Monk, writing to the Pope, for the Pope, and by his Order, takes up a whole Chapter to prove. 'That the Pope might, with a safe Conscience, when he thought it proper, make use of infidel Soldiers, to assist him against all those who were for violating the Liberties of the Church.' The same Monk was produced (3) writing another Book (4), expressly to prove that it is lawful to war with Catholics, if the case requires it; and concluding thus, 'That it does not belong to a Subject to enquire whether the Causes of a War be just.' They quoted (5) another Maxim of the same Monk. 'All Ecclesiastics are obliged by the divine and natural Right to maim and kill their Enemies in defence of the Republic, without being guilty of any Irregularity; and may enter upon and enjoy the Estates of Enemies, with as much Reason as any secular Soldier whatever.' The Spanish Writers on one side with their Complaints against the Leagues of France, and the French on the other with their Apologies, thought little of what was to come, and that, before an Age was at an end, Proofs would be changed into Objections on both hands. They may now say, both of them,

Mutemus clypeos, Danaumque insignia nobis Aptemus (6).

Then change we shields, and their Devices bear.

O thoughtless Men, and to the future blind!

[C] He made some extravagant Suppositions concerning GOD's Favour to some Saints. He pretended, that St Joseph, and some others, were sanctified before they were born. Claudius Dausqueius, or Dausquius, Canon of Tournay, wrote against this Fancy; and says, among other things, that Carthagenæ wrestled the holy Scriptures with too much Presumption. 'Palam in oculis Ecclesiæ Romanæ præcipiti temeritate in sacras literas involavit, easque oborto collo in affectatæ novitatis patrocinium interpretando contra Concilii Tridentini edicta depravavit (8). — He openly, in the face of the Romish Church, and with a precipitate Rashness, laid his hands on the sacred Writings, and, interpreting them contrary to the Edicts of the Council of Trent, wrestled and forced them to patronise the novel Opinions he affected to advance.' A Flemish Franciscan took Fire at this, and writ a Book against the Canon; who replied, and did not shew more Moderation than his Adversary. This Doctrine of Carthagenæ's is to be found in his Homilia sacrum Catholicæ tum Morales de Religionis Christianæ arcanis. According to Dausquius's Account of this Work, it consists of nothing but a parcel of high-flown insignificant Words (9); 'Ista incuriosa curiositate victus Carthagenæ volumina ista quibus orbis cymbalum audire meruit (an etiam voluit) inscribit de Religionis Christianæ Arcanis. Quia scilicet arcano quodcumque Moses volumine clausit, & de arcanis Catholicæ veritatis quæcumque Galatinus compilavit, veritate, diligentia, immanitate superavit Carthagenæ (10). — Carthagenæ, subdued by That incurious Curiosity, entitled those Volumes, by which he deserved, (or even was willing) to be called The World's Drum, De Religionis Christianæ Arcanis. — Of the Mysteries of the Christian Religion. For Carthagenæ surpassed, in outrageous extravagancy, whatever Moses comprehended in the secret Volume, and whatever Galatinus compiled, with Truth and Diligence, concerning the Mysteries of the Catholic Truth. There is one Book in these Volumes, called Arcana Deiparæ, ac Josephi Mysteria; in which the Author vents a very scurvy piece of Impertinence (11); which is, that St Joseph may be reckoned among the Martyrs, because the jealousy, which tore his Heart, upon seeing his Wife grow every Day bigger, could not but give him insupportable torment. 'Cum ergo B. Josephus immani zelotypia dolore angetur, neque levamen hoc, quod ei adsumere licebat, quaritaret, Evangelista dicente, cum esset justus, noluit eam traducere, consequens est cor ejus gravissimo doloris vulnere fuisse exulceratum. — Profecto hujusmodi perplexitas, & plusquam civile bellum inter sensum & rationem, non poterat non immaniter viscera Josephi disrumpere, & excarnificare — cogitatio illa non potuit non esse illi grave martyrii genus (12). He confirms his Thought by the Authority of Solomon: 'Cum zelotypicus amor sit, ut ait Salomon, dura sicut infernus æmulatio, non poterat non vehementer, & absque ulla interruptione Josephi cor transversari, sicut & infernus summopere torquet, & nec per momentum excruciare cessat (13). — Since Jealousy, according to Solomon, is painful as Hell, the Heart of Joseph must, of necessity, have been vehemently, and without interruption, pierced through; as Hell greatly afflicts, and never ceases to torment.' How are the Mysteries of our holy Religion exposed to the Railleries of profane Men, when some dare create such sort of Martyrs! The Canon of Tournay was in the right, when he thought these Whimfies were no better than Blasphemies. Sensus virgineum uterum intumescens videns adulteram judicabat; — Seeing the Virgin's Belly to swell, he judged that she was an Adulteress; these are Caribagena's Words, and here is the Answer of the Canon (14): Josephus Chrysostomi testificatione cavebat vel nimam Virgini afferre molestiam, & tu dicis Josephum eam adulteram judicasse. Impie! Ac si dicat, Manifestaque crimina pleno fert atero. — Joseph, according to the Testimony of St Chrysostom, was careful not in the least to molest the Virgin; yet you say, that Joseph thought her an Adulteress. Impious! As if he should say: Her swelling Womb too plain the Crime betrays.

A Professor of Louvain was not the better for the judicious Reflexions of the Canon of Tournay. 'One Day he ran into an excess of Impiety and Impudence; for, explaining the Trouble that St Joseph was in, and designing to give an account of the Reason why he thought of leaving the Holy Virgin, he said it was because that great Saint was afraid of being looked upon as a C----- timebat vocari C----- Modesty does not allow me to say, what he was not ashamed to utter in a full Auditory.' This I find Word for Word in a Book printed at Cologne in 1685, and intitled, The History of the Intrusion of the Sieur du Bois into his Professorship to explain the Holy Scriptures, in the University of Louvain, and of the manner how he discharges that Employment: with some Reflexions on the Reasons of his Reputation and Credit.

CASSANDRA, Daughter of Priamus and Hecuba, was tempted by Apollo, and deceived him. He promised her the Gift of Prophecy, provided she would give him her Maiden-head [A]. She made a show of agreeing to the Bargain; but, when she had obtained her Ends, she disappointed the Seducer, and broke her Word. Apollo did not revenge himself in recalling what he had given her, but in making her find no Credit, whatever she undertook to foretel (a). She was looked on as a Fool, before her Predictions were fulfilled; and allowed to be a wife Woman only after their Accomplishment (b). Servius relates after what manner they were rendered useless [B]. Others give another account of it [C]. However [A] Apollo promised her the Gift of Prophecy, provided she would give him her Maiden-head. I have observed often before, that nothing can be worse concerted than the System of the ancient Heathens. We have a Proof of it before us: It was a received Doctrine among them, that the Priestesses of Apollo at Delphos was to be a Virgin; otherwise she was incapable of being inspired (1). It could not be therefore supposed, after this, that Apollo would offer a Virgin the Gift of Prophecy, provided she would give up her Maiden-head. Some observe from hence the Artifices of the Devil, and his profound Malice (2); but this is to suppose it a true History, when it is no more than a Poetical Fiction. The Author, I am now speaking of, has committed another Fault. He supposes, that the Sybil of Cumæ was tempted by Apollo in the same manner with Cassandra; for a Confirmation of which (3) he quotes some Verses of Ovid (4), which mention no Promise of Prophecy. To find an exact Conformity between these two Temptations, it must be said, that Apollo made an Offer in general to Cassandra of whatever she thought fit to demand; for so he did to the Sybil (5). A modern Author supposes, that, in effect, the Promises to Cassandra were confined to nothing, and that she made choice of Prophecy (6): but the Authority of Apollodorus and Servius allow not of this Supposition. These two Authors say, the one that Apollo promised Cassandra to make her a Prophetess (7); the other, that he promised her nothing; but, that Cassandra, having demanded the Gift of Prophecy as the Price of her Maiden-head, was taken at her word (8). The Sybil, being left to her own choice, to ask all the advantages she would, demanded a long Life; and, forgetting to add a perpetual Youth, she might have obtained that likewise for the Loss of her Maiden-head.

Excidit ut peterem juvenes quoque prolixus annos;
Hos tamen ille mihi dabat, æternamque juventam
Si venerem paterer (9).

Unmindful of the sad Effects of Time,
Thoughtless, I bargain'd not for youthful Prime;
The amorous God wou'd have bestow'd even This,
Nor thought too dear a Purchase for the Bliss.

But she considered it would be too dear a Purchase she valued her Honour therefore at a high rate.

[B] Servius relates after what manner the Predictions of Cassandra were rendered useless. It was effected by Apollo's Spittle; the Operation of which was so effectual, that Cassandra's words met with no belief. He was angry to see the Lady deny her Promise, but concealed his Resentment, and begged at least the Favour of a Kiss from her: His Request was granted; upon which he spit upon her Mouth, and thereby rendered the Talent he had given her of no use to her. 'Apollo, cum amasset Cassandra, petit ab ea ejus concubitus copiam: illa hac conditione promissit, si sibi ab eo futurorum scientia præstaretur: quam cum Apollo tribuisset, ab illa promissus coitus denegatus est; sed Apollo, dissimulata paulisper ira, petit ab ea, ut sibi osculum saltem præstaret, quod cum illa fecisset, Apollo os ejus inspuavit; & quia eripere Deo semel tributum munus non conveniebat, effectum ut illa quidem vera vaticinaretur, sed fides non haberetur (10). This is Servius's Account in his Comment upon these words of Virgil:

Tunc etiam fatis aperit Cassandra futuris
Ora, dei jussu non unquam credita Teucris (11).

[C] Others give another account of it. Which is, that Helenus and Cassandra, being Twins, were carried in their Infancy to the Temple of Apollo, where they were left a whole Night, either through Forgetfulness, or out of Custom. The next Morning two Serpents were found twisted round their Bodies, dies, and licking their Ears, by which both of them were endowed with the Gift of Prophecy (12). This puts me in mind of Melampus's Adventure: One Day, whilst he was sleeping, two Serpents came, and licked his Ears: when he awaked, he was surprized to find he understood the Language of Birds, by which means he was able to foretel a great many things (13).

[D] She fled into the Temple of Minerva, which secured her Life, but not her Honour. Virgil thought not fit to affirm that she was ravished (14); he contents himself with representing the condition she was in when dragged out of the Temple.

Ecce trahebatur passis Priameia virgo
Crinibus à templo Cassandra adytique Minervæ,
Ad cœlum tendens ardentia lumina frustra;
Lumina, nam teneras arcebant vincula palmas.

Behold the Royal Prophetess, the Fair
Cassandra, dragg'd by her dishevell'd Hair;
Whom not Minerva's Shrine, nor sacred Bands,
In safety cou'd protect from sacrilegious hands.
On Heav'n she cast her Eyes, she sigh'd, she cry'd, (Twos all she cou'd); her tender Arms were ty'd.

DRYDEN.

Quintus Calaber is not so reserved; he tells us plainly, that Ajax, Son of Oileus, ravished her in the very Temple of Minerva (15). This is the general Tradition (16); to which many public Monuments, in several Cities of Greece, served for Witnesses (17). See the Article of This A J A X. Some say, Cassandra was Minerva's Priestess (18); others, that she was Apollon's (19); yet, if we will believe Virgil, she had been betrothed to Choræbus.

— Juvenisque Coræbus, Mygdonides. Illis ad Trojam fortè diebus
Venerat, infans Cassandra incensus amore,
Et Gener auxilium Priamo Phrygibusque ferebat, Infelix qui non Sponse præcepta furentis Audierit (20).

— young Coræbus, who by Love was led
To win renown, and fair Cassandra's Bed:
And lately brought his Troops to Priam's Aid:
Forewarn'd in vain by the Prophetic Maid.

DRYDEN.

Homer makes mention of a Prince, who came to demand Cassandra in Marriage, and promised upon that condition to raise the Siege of Troy, demanding no Fortune, he being contented with Cassandra's Beauty.

Ἦτις δὲ Πριάμοιο θυγάτηρ εἶδος ἀρίστην
Κασσάνδην ἀνέειπον. ὑπὸ στήθεσσι δὲ μέγα

Ἐκ Τρώϊος ἀέκοντος ἀπώσμεν ἦς Ἀχαιῶν

Cassandra's Love he sought, with Bosoms of Pow'r,
And promis'd Conquest was the proffer'd Dow'r.

POPE.

Whereupon Priam consented to the Match. Homer calls this Priam's Son-in-law, that was to be, Othryoneus, and makes him die in a Combat. Virgil likewise makes Coræbus to be slain the Night Troy was taken. Pausanias makes mention of this Coræbus, as of one, who was to marry Cassandra (22).

[E] We shall observe — some things relating to the Punishment that followed this obscene Impiety. Plutarch observes, that it was not long before his time, that the Locrians had left off sending Maids to Troy, to expiate that lewd Action of Ajax (23). There did these Wretches spend their Lives in sweep- ing the Temple of Minerva. Here is a Representation of their Employment, and their Equipage, according to Amior's Translation.

Où les pieds nus, sans aucune vesture,
Sans voile aucun, ni honneste coiffure,
Ne plus ne moins qu' esclaves, tout le jour
Des le matin elles font sans séjour
A ballier de Pallas la Déesse
Le temple saint jusques en leur vieillesse.

Where when the tributary Virgins come,
They attend the daily Drudgery of the Dome.
A Load of Sorrow in their Looks they wear,
Naked their Feet, dishevell'd is their Hair;
Nor dare they, but by Night, to th' awful Shrine repair.

From Youth to Age, in sad Restraint they live,
'Till welcome Death brings them a late Reprieve.

To this let me add Vigener's Prose, which will give us a more particular Account of the Punishment which Ajax's Impiety drew upon the Locrians. Timæus the Sicilian, and Callimæchus, are more particular in this matter, informing us, that, about three Years after Ajax's Death, the Plague broke violently out upon his account over all Locria. The People hereupon consulted the Oracle, which told them, that, for a thousand Years following, they were to appease Minerva of Troy, and send her every Year two Virgins, that were to be chosen by Lot. These poor Wretches were obliged to go privately by night through the most secret unfrequented ways they could find out, and in a disguise, to throw themselves, if possible, into the Temple; where if they arrived in Safety, they were detained to sweep and wash the Temple; from whence they never dared depart, nor approach the holy Shrine but by night; being moreover shaved, and clothed in an ill favoured Robe, and bare-legged: though very few of them were so happy as this; for, as soon as the Trojans were acquainted with their setting out from Locria, which was usually at certain Seasons of the Year, they lay in wait for them; and, if by chance they fell into their hands, they were sure to be murdered by Stones or Swords without any mercy: which done, they burned their Corps upon the place with barren Wood, and threw the Ashes from off the top of Mount Tracon (24) into the Sea. So severely could the Gods of the Gentiles punish those, who offended them (25).

Vigener quotes Timæus the Historian, and Callimæchus the Poet, as formally, as if the Pieces, in which they left us these Accounts, were still extant; but this is to impose upon us: He had dealt more honestly and ingenuously, if he had quoted Lycophron's Scholiast; for it is he who gives us this Relation, upon the Authority of those two Authors. He observes (26), that Peribœa and Cleopatra were the two first Maids that were sent by the Locrians; and that, in time, the Locrians made some small Variations in the Method of their Choice: at first they sent two Virgins of full Age, afterwards Infants a Year old, with their Nurses. If the Trojans murdered them before they could arrive at the Temple, the Locrians were obliged to proceed to a new Choice. This Custom expired a thousand Years after the Trojan War. Χιλίων δ' ἐτῶν παρελθόντων μετὰ τὸν Τρωϊκὸν πόλεμον ἐπαύσαντο τῆς τοιαύτης θυσίας. Ex alii mille annis à bello Trojano, abstinuerunt ab ejusmodi piaculo. It ought to be read Τρωϊκὸν, and not, as some Editions have it, Φωκικὸν. The learned Casaubon had better have given the Text this Correction, than have criticized Timæus, upon Pre- tence

Injury; for the Locrians were obliged every Year to send some of their young Maids to Troy, where they led a very indifferent Life. This lasted for many Ages, and not one of those poor Girls was ever known to have forfeited her Honour (d). Theon the Sophist has made an Observation, of which I intend to say something [F]. Cassandra, in the Division of the Spoils, fell to Agamemnon's Share: This Prince was not displeased with her [G]; which, they say, made Clytemnestra

tence that there were not much more than Eight hundred forty Years between the Trojan and the end of the Phocian War (27). Observe, that he makes this Reflexion in his Comment upon an Author, who is proving how difficult it is to take Precautions enough against those, who undertake to find out a secret unforeseen Entry for any thing into a City. Of this he produces the Trojans as an Example, who employed all imaginable care to hinder the Locrian Virgins Entrance into Troy, and all to no purpose. You may see he speaks of that Custom under the Time present, which is a strong Proof that it was then in being (28). Μαγνέσιον δὲ ἔτι τὰ εἰσπεμπομένα μετ' ἐπικυλῆς χαλεπὸν φυλάττει. Οἱ γὰρ περὶ Ἰλίου ἀνθρώποι ἐκ τούτου χρόνου καὶ οὗτω διατρίβοντες, ἔτι δύνανται φυλάττει μὴ εἰσελθεῖν αὐτοῖς τὰς Λοκρίδας. Καὶ τοὶ τούτων αὐτοῖς ἐστὶν ἡ σπουδὴ καὶ ἡ φυλακὴ. Ἀλλ' ὀλίγοι προσέχοντες τῷ λαθεῖν λανθάνει, πολλὰ εἰσάγοντες σάμαλα. Quod autem ejus rei quæ subdole immittitur, difficilis cautio fit, testimonio probari potest. Nam qui Ilium colunt homines a tanto tempore in eo laborantes, & tanta diligentia ad hoc dispositi, nondum cavere possunt, quo minus Locrides Ilium ingrediantur: qui tamen in eam rem studii tantum impendant, & tanta cautione utantur. Sed nimirum pauci ad fallendum attentiores fallunt, & ita multas in urbem Locridas inducunt. — That it is difficult to prevent the clandestine Entrance of a thing, may be proved by example. For the Trojans, notwithstanding all their Care and Circumspection, cannot yet prevent the Locrian Virgins from entering into Troy. If this Author were now living, he might confirm his Aphorism by the Example of a Multitude of People, who retired out of France for the Sake of their Religion, in spite of the best concerted Measures to prevent their Escape. I say nothing of those successful Wiles, by which contraband Goods are brought in, in the Face of a thousand Custom-houses, and as many Officers, and notwithstanding Colbert's greatest Precautions (29).

Cassaubon has made a considerable Mistake in his Translation of that Passage in Polybius, where he says, that there were a hundred noble Families among the Locrians, distinguished by several Prerogatives, out of which the Virgins, sent every Year to Troy, were to be chosen. Ἐξ ἑνὸς μὲλλον οἱ Λοκροὶ κατὰ τὸν χρόνον κληρὸν τὰς ἀποσταλίσσόμενας παρθένους εἰς Ἰλίον (30). E quibus, according to Cassaubon's Version, Locrenses illas centum virgines sorte legere ex oraculi responsu tenebantur, quæ erant quotannis ad Ilium mittendæ. This Latin plainly signifies, that the Locrians had sent every Year a hundred Virgins to Troy; but Polybius says nothing of this, nor mentions the Number they sent. Let us add here this Passage of St Jerom: 'Iustum est & Locras virgines non tacere, quæ cum Ilium mit- terentur ex more per annos circiter mille, nulla obsecni rumoris & pollutæ virginitatis ullam fabulam dedit (31). — Nor ought we to forget the Locrian Virgins, who were sent to Troy, according to a Custom, which continued about a thousand Years; none of whom were ever censured as having suffered their Chastity to be violated.' He does not pretend to commend these Virgins for that none of them were ravished, but for that no one of them ever suffered herself to be debauched, which, without doubt, is very remarkable, considering the length of the way, and the Continuance of the Custom. That the Trojans never thought of enjoying them in their Passage, is no wonder; they considered them as Victims accursed; they looked on them as unclean Animals, fit for nothing, but to be first murdered, and then burnt, and whose Ashes were to be scattered in the Air (32), as a means of Expiation. Tzetzes (33) observes, that one of them died upon the Mountain Traron, near the City of Troy, and that the Locrians buried her, and said nothing, but, from that time, omitted sending any more, because they thought the Space of Time, which the Oracle required, was complet. In this they found themselves deceived; the Famine began again in their Country, and they saw themselves constrained to renew the Custom they had discontinued; though, instead of two, they sent but one, imagining, that for the Future one would suffice for the Expiation of Ajax's Fault. The Scholiast pretends they put a wrong Interpretation upon the Oracle, since Apollo, without prescribing any set time, had commanded them to send two Virgins to expiate the outrage committed upon Cassandra. This Observation is of no weight; he had been just before saying himself, that the Oracle had prescribed a thousand Years (34), and in this several other Authors agree (35). It is true, Ælian supposes, that the Oracle imposed this Punishment in general till the Trojan Minerva was satisfied (36). Let us not forget what Strabo assures us of, which is, that, in his Time, it was discontinued in Troy, that the Greeks had never totally ruined that City (37); for a Proof of which, they urged, that the Locrians began to send their Daughters thither almost immediately after. To this Strabo answers two things. I. That Homer makes no mention of Cassandra's being ravished. II. That the Locrians began not to send their Virgins till the Times of the Persian Monarchy. There is a gross Mistake in the Translation of these Words of Strabo: Αἱ γὰρ Λοκρίδες παρθένοι μικρὸν ὕστερον ἀρξάμεναι ἐπέμποιον κατ' ἔτος (38); for instead of Locrenses quidem virginis paulo post ceperunt Ilium mitti quotannis, the Translator has it Locrenses, &c. mitti more usitato: Which signifies that this Custom was more ancient than the War of Troy. And this in short is a Blunder of the Translator.

[F] Theon, the Sophist, has made an Observation, of which I intend to say something. This Observation is a Precept in Rhetoric, touching the manner of refusing a Narration. The Matter of Fact, says he, ought to be denied, either in affirming it to be a Thing impossible, or very unlikely; but, if it is manifestly true, we must then go another way to work, and enquire if the Narration be perfect in all its Parts, or whether it contains something needless, or if one Part of it does not contradict another. If it can stand this Scrutiny, see whether it be attended with Decency and Utility: for, as certain Actions ought not to have been committed, so after Commission ought they not to be reported, but lie buried in Silence. How unlearnedly would it therefore be, after having represented Ajax guilty of that Impiety, he is said to have committed, to add, that he suffered no Misfortunes thereupon either by Sea or at home, but lived to a good old Age. It is easy to conceive, that Theon means, that, if some Orators had related Ajax's Adventures, without breaking the Rules but in this one particular, viz. of not suppressing the good Fortune which attended his Impiety; there would be no other Means left of refusing their Narration, but to object, that they were not silent in a Point, wherein they ought to have been so. The Common-Place of Usefulness and Decorum would be the only Weapon to be opposed against them: They would be liable to censure, only for having exposed to the Eyes of the Public a fortunate Impiety; a thing which is repugnant to Decency, and may prejudice good Manners. I must give the Reader this Greek Sophist's own Words; for they have something very surprizing in them, and are little conformable to the Laws of History, or to Sincerity; but Rhetoric has some peculiar Rules of its own (39). Εἰ δὲ τὰ αὐτὰ πάντα κατὰ τὸν τρόπον εἴη διαβεβαιωμένα, ἀλλ' ὡς ἀπρεπὲς τε, καὶ ἀσύμφορον δεκτικόν. Ἐστὶ γὰρ τῶν πραγμάτων, ἀπερχομένων μὲν ἐν ἐχθρῶν, φθάσαντα δὲ περὶ χεῖρας, σιωπᾶσθαι συμφέρον, οἷον, εἰ τις τὸν Λοκρὸν Αἰαντᾶ τοιαῦτα εἰπὼν εἰς τὴν Ἀθηνᾶν ἀσεβῆσαι, οἷα λέγεται, ἔπειτα ὑπόδοξο, μήτε ἐν τῇ θαλάττῃ, μήτε temnestra jealous, and was one of the Reasons that provoked her to murder her Husband (e) [H]. Cassandra was not spared: she was massacred at the same time. In the same manner they treated two Boys, Twins, which she had by Agamemnon (f). She was very handsome, and had been sought for in Marriage by great Men (g). Her Sepulchre proved a Subject of Dispute between the City of Mycenæ, and that of Amyclæ (h). Each of them pretended they had it. She had a Temple erected to her at Leuëira, where her Statue was worshipped, under the Name of Alexandra (i) [I].

Lycophron speaks of a Temple built to Cassandra by the Daunians, and by the Inhabitants of Dardania, where her Statue served for an Asylum to those Virgins, who had no mind to marry, and who founded their Denial upon the Homeliness, or mean Extraction, of the Gallants that courted them. The Remedy they made use of on this Occasion, was to embrace the Statue of Cassandra. But they were first to dress themselves up like Furies, and change their Complexion, by the Application of some Drugs designed for that Purpose. They devoted themselves, after a very particular manner, to the Worship of Cassandra, and adored her as a Deity (k). This Passage in Lycophron is one of those he has expressed with the greatest Clearness [K]; and yet it is impossible for us to find any Authority for it in the Authors now remaining. Hence it is, that the Commentaries of our Critics are very dry upon that Place.

Plutarch tells us, that there was, at Tbaleme (l), an Oracle of Pasiphaë, and that some were of Opinion that Cassandra died in that Place, and had the Surname Pasiphaë given her, because she uttered Oracles to every one (m).

μήτε οἶκος κακὸν τι αὐτὸν πεποδῶτα, ἐν γῆρᾳ μετ' ἐνδαιμονίας τελευτηκῆναι. Quæ omnia si, quemadmodum oportet, se habebunt, ad indecorum & inutile deveniemus. Sunt enim quedam, quæ quemadmodum fieri non debent, ita postquam facta sunt, silentio involvi præstat. Ut si quis Ajaetem Locrensem ita impium fuisse erga Minervæ numen, ut fertur, ostendat: ac deinde neque in navigatione, neque domi quicquam illi triste accidisse, senemque vita feliciter defunctum probet (40). However, this makes for the Tradition of the Punishment inflicted on Cassandra's Ravisher.

[G] Agamemnon was not displeased with Cassandra. [H] He fell in love with her, if Euripides may be credited (41), and obtained her from the Greeks, as a particular Distinction. She was not disposed of by Lot, but set a-part as a Present for that King (42), who made her his Concubine (43). I have elsewhere taken notice of Horace's wrong Argument. It is under the Article BRISEIS (44): The Poet would prove, that his Friend has no reason to be ashamed of loving a Servant Maid, since Agamemnon thought it no Disgrace to him to be in love with King Priam's Daughter:

Arsit Atreides medio in triumpho Virgine raptâ (45).

Amidst the Triumph of his conquering Arms,
Atreides sig'd for fair Cassandra's Charm.

Hyginus should not have said, that Oeax, to revenge his Brother Palamedes's Death, told Clytemnestra a Lie, assuring her, without any Grounds for it, that her Husband was bringing a Rival, or rather a Concubine, home with him, meaning Cassandra (46); for it was no more than what was true. Pausanias tells us, that Cassandra was with Child by Agamemnon, and was actually delivered of Twins, who were murdered, by Ægistheus, upon their Father's Tomb (47).

[H] Clytemnestra was jealous, and it was one of the Reasons that provoked her to murder her Husband. [I] Hyginus, in the Place before quoted, says, that the Discourse of Palamedes's Brother had the desired Effect. Clytemnestra, being informed that her Husband was bringing Cassandra home, was resolved to get rid of them both, and did it accordingly. She confesses, in Euripides, that the Injury, her Husband did her in sacrificing Iphigenia, would not have provoked her to murder him; but he returned, said she, with a fanatical Wench, whom he placed in my Bed, so that we were two Brides under one Roof.

Ἄλλ' ἢ λυθ' ἔχων μοι Μαῖνᾶδ' ἐνθεον κόρην
Λύκτροις τ' ἐπισφῆρκε, καὶ νύμφα δῶω
Ἐν τοῖς αὐτοῖς δωμασὶ κατέχομεν.

Sed venit adducens mihi Menadem, afflatam numine puellam, & lestris intulit, & sponsæ duæ in iisdem ædibus continebantur (48). Meziriæ imagines, that Pindar assigned these two Reasons for Clytemnestra's Attempt; but he is mistaken: Pindar's two Reasons are, the Remembrance of Iphigenia's Sacrifice, and the Apprehension of Agamemnon's Anger. She had been leading a very dissolute Life in his Absence (49), which she thought could not long be kept concealed, nor go unpunished: This is manifestly Pindar's Sense; and I wonder it escaped Meziriæ's Eyes. See his Notes upon Ovid's Epistles, p. 891.

[I] She was worshipped under the Name of Alexandra. [J] She was known as well by this, as That of Cassandra; witness Lycophron's Poem; it is called Alexandra, because it is a Prophecy, which the Poet ascribes to Cassandra. Tzetzes's Conceit is very pleasant; he would have her called Alexandra, παρὰ τὸ ἀλύξαι τὴν ἀνδρῶν συνουσίαν, because she avoided Copulation, or, to express myself in Meziriæ's Terms, because she avoided a carnal Conjunction with Men. I believe she as heartily avoided Fire, Water, and Precipices. So that the Etymology of her Name might as well be drawn from thence.

[K] Lycophron speaks of a Temple of Cassandra, This Passage is one of those he has expressed with the greatest Clearness. And yet the Disposition of his Words admit of a great many Doubts. For we cannot tell whether he means, that these honest Girls were to be secured from Matrimony, by virtue of Cassandra's Statue, or whether he ascribes that Virtue to the Habits they should wear, and to the Ointments with which they should change their Complexions. The latter Sense is not absurd; for it is easy to imagine, that their new Equipage was a Remedy for Love. Observe the Words of this Poet:

Ἐμὲν περιπτύξουσιν ὠλέαναις βρέτας
Ἀλλὰς μέγιστον κτώμεναι νυμφευμάτων
Ἐεννύων ἐσθῆτα καὶ ῥέβος βαρὺς
Πεπαμῆναι θρόνοις φαρμακῆνρῖοις.

Meam ulnis amplectentur statuam, Remedium nuptiarum habituræ maximum,
Furiarum vestem & faciei tincturam
Coloribus adeptæ medicatis (50).

They shall embrace my Statue, and meet with the surest Remedy against Matrimony, having obtained the Garb of the Furies, and a Complexion altered by Ointments. This sort of Asylum was very rare; it was found, doubtless, to be of no use. This, perhaps, is the only one to be met withal; yet it was unknown to the Historians and Geographers.

CASSIUS

CASSIUS, the Name of a Roman Family. They, who are contented to say that it was Patrician, are as much out as they who absolutely affirm it to have been no other than Plebeian (a) [A]. Antonius Augustinus (b), and Corradus (c), say, upon better Grounds, that there were two Families of this Name, the one Patrician, and the other Plebeian. For we meet with one Cassius, who was Consul a few Years after the Extinction of the Royalty, and a long time before the Plebeians had obtained, in the Year of Rome 387, to be admitted to the Consular Dignity. So likewise we read of another Cassius, Tribune of the People, an Office conferred on none but Plebeians. This Cassius was Tribune about the beginning of the VIIth Century of the Republic. Wherefore it follows, that either there were two Families of the Cassii, one Patrician, the other Plebeian, as Suetonius has observed in That of the Claudii (d); or, that the same Family, Cassia, which was Patrician at first, became afterwards Plebeian, as it has happened to several others. However, I think it no easy thing to determine the Matter [B]. The ancient Authors are not over clear in this Point. It seems Tacitus knew of no other Family Cassia, but the Plebeian [C], or else he knew that the Plebeian was no ways descended from the Cassii Patricians.

(a) Glandorp. Onomastic pag. 202.

(b) In Famil. Romanis.

(c) In Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 178; but he is mistaken in saying there were several Cassii among the first Consuls; for there was but one.

(d) In Tiberio, init.

[A] They, who are contented to say it was Patrician, are as much mistaken, as they, who affirm it was only Plebeian. Richard Streinnius (1) ought not to have ranked this Family with the Patricians, without some Distinction. For, among all the Cassii, he speaks of, there is but one, who was undoubtedly a Patrician; the rest being of the same Family with That L. Cassius Longinus, whom he makes Tribune of the People in the Year of Rome 616. He knew how to reprove Valerius Maximus for having made a Cassius, who was both Patrician and Consular, Tribune of the People (2); but in the same Page he does something like it. Glandorp commits a quite contrary Fault; for, after having said, that the Cassii were Plebeians, he begins the Catalogue of the Men of that Name with him, who was condemned to Death for High-Treason, in the Year of Rome 269, after he had been thrice Consul (3). There were no Consuls chosen from among the Plebeian Families, till after the Year 387; nor were there ever any Tribunes of the People among the Patricians, purely as Patricians.

(1) In Stemmat. Gent. & Famili. ar. Romanar.

(2) Val. Maxim. lib. v, cap. viii.

(3) Glandorp. Onomastic pag. 202.

[B] Either there were two Families of the Cassii — or the Cassian Family, which was Patrician at first, became Plebeian. I think it no easy thing to determine the Matter. Cicero seems to set us right, when he says, that Cassius, Julius Caesar's Assassin, was born of a Family, that could not endure the supreme Dominion, nor so much as a great Power in any one Man whatsoever (4). Without doubt, he had then in his Eye That Spurius Cassius, who was condemned by his own Father, in the Year of Rome 269, for having aspired to the Royalty. Now it is most certain, that the Cassii Longini, of whom he, who conspired against Caesar, was one, were Plebeians: since therefore he was of that Family, natus in ea familia, that could not endure the Ambition of Spurius Cassius; may we not from thence conclude, that the Plebeian Family of the Cassii was descended from the Patrician? But it may be answered, That Cicero, in this Place, is no sufficient

Witness; for, besides that he speaks cursorily and obscurely of Spurius Cassius's Adventure, which he could never have done, had he been certain of the Matter, we may observe he supposes in the same Place, that Brutus, Julius Caesar's Murderer, was descended from him, who expelled Tarquin; which, notwithstanding, is a thing very much to be doubted (5). We may therefore say, that Cicero behaved himself then like an artful Advocate, who lays hold of every thing he thinks advantageous to his Cause. See Corradus upon these Words in Cicero's Brutus: 'Concessum est Rhetoribus ementiri in historiis ut aliquid dicere possint argutius. — Rhetoricians are allowed to falsify in History, for the sake of a smart Expression.' Brutus and Cassius were not displeased to have it thought they were descended from those of the same Name, who had so eminently distinguished themselves; and, without doubt, their Adherents took care to have it spread abroad upon Occasion. There was likewise a Report, tho' less probable, that Spurius Cassius received his Punishment from his own Father's Hand. Cicero found this would be of Service to his Cause; and therefore he laid hold of it. Which an Orator might do, tho' those things were very uncertain; so that Cicero's Authority in this Place does not remove the Uncertainty.

[C] It seems Tacitus knew of no other Family of the Cassii, but the Plebeian. For, speaking of L. Cassius, who was married to Drusilla, Germanicus's Daughter, he speaks of him as being of a Plebeian Family, but a Family very ancient and illustrious by their Office (6). Plebei Romæ generis, verum antiqui honoratique (7). If Streinnius had thought of this Passage, he had changed the Situation of this Family in his Book, or made himself better understood. The Cassii Longini were, without doubt, all Plebeians. It is therefore a Mistake in William Grotius (8), to say, that Caius Cassius Longinus was of a Patrician Family.

CASSIUS VISCCELLINUS (SPURIUS), after having been thrice Consul, once General of the Horse (a), under the first Dictator Rome ever had, and twice honoured with a Triumph, was condemned to Death, An. Rom. 269, for having aspired to the Royalty (b). Mr Moreri gives us here two Articles, instead of one [A]; and, besides that, is guilty of four Errors [B]. He knew not how

(b) See Remark [A].

VALERIUS Maximus, not over exact, is misfunderford by Moreri.

[A] Mr Moreri is pleased to present us with two Articles instead of one. He has chosen the worst Method he could take in regard to our Spurius Cassius, whom he distinguishes from him spoken of in the fifth Book and eighth Chapter of Valerius Maximus. It is very easy to perceive, if we diligently examine the Originals, that He, whom Valerius Maximus speaks of in this Place, is the same with Him, whose Punishment he takes notice of in another (1), and whose History is handed down to us by Livy and Dionysius Halicarnassus. There is nothing there but the Punishment of one and the same Man; but, because the Circumstances are differently related, and Valerius Maximus, who is far from being an exact Compiler, speaks of it sometimes after one manner, sometimes after another, Mr Moreri chose rather to multiply Beings, without any Necessity, than to keep to the most reasonable, or rather, if I dare say so, the only reasonable Opinion, viz. That which reduces the whole Matter to the only Fact mentioned in the Text of this Article. Let us examine into the Grounds of these Confusions.

Dionysius Halicarnassus (2) and Livy (3) allow, that the most probable Opinion is, that the two Quæstors accused Spurius Cassius before the People, and, having obtained Sentence of Death against him, caused him to be executed. Livy, however, tell us, as a less likely Tradition, that Cassius had no other Judge but his own Father, who, having DIFFERENT Accounts of this Cassius's Condemnation.

to rectify Valerius Maximus. No more did That Author's Commentators [C]. All things called his Son to a Trial in his own House, caused him to be whipped, and put to Death; after which he consecrated to Ceres his Son's Peculium. Dionysius Halicarnassensis gives us a second Tradition, though not so probable, yet delivered in Books worthy our Belief; which is, That Cassius's Father, having first suspected his Son, examined into the bottom of the Affair, acquainted the Senate with it, and produced those Proofs; upon whose Authority his Son received Sentence of Death from them; after which his Father carried the condemned Criminal home, and put him to death. Among other Reasons, for which Dionysius Halicarnassensis opposes this Tradition, this is one; viz. That, even in his Time, the Place, where Cassius's House stood, was to be seen near the Temple of the Earth, which House had been razed after his Punishment. He adds, That, in process of time, part of the Ground was allotted out to build the Temple of the Earth upon, and that the other part thereof was left empty and open. I would not relate these Circumstances, but only to make it more plainly appear, that Mr Moreri did not well understand those Authors, whose Authority he produces to prove there were two Cassii put to death.

For, if he had judiciously compared Valerius Maximus, the main Cause that led him into his Mistake, with the two Historians I have quoted, he would have found, that this Author speaks only of the Spurius Cassius Viscellinus, mentioned by those two Historians. In effect, what says Valerius Maximus in the eighth Chapter of his fifth Book? That Cassius, imitating Brutus's Example, and, knowing that his Son, Tribune of the People, had proposed a Law never heard of before (it was the Lex Agraria), and that he gained himself a strong Party by his factious and popular Intrigues, condemned him in his own House, assisted by his Friends and Relations, for having a Design to make himself King; that he ordered him, after he had been whipped, to be put to death, and consecrated his Peculium to Ceres. In the third Chapter of his fifth Book he tells us how enraged the People were at Spurius Cassius, and that they had less regard to his two Triumphs, and three Consulates, than the Apprehensions of his Ambition, and that the Senate and People, not contented with his Death, pulled down his House, and raised, in the room of it, a Temple to the Earth. It is very plain, that all he says in both these Places, except the gross Mistake of having made one of the Cassian Family Tribune of the People at that time (4), agrees with Spurius Cassius Viscellinus, according to the different Circumstances of his Trial, as related by Livy and Dionysius Halicarnassensis. I own he there seems to be deceived, and that it is better, since he cannot be altogether excused, to allow, that of one and the same Matter of Fact he made up two, than to say, He falsified the Circumstances of a Trial, with an Intent, in one Place, to shew the Severity of a Father, and in another that of the People. But Mr Moreri should have corrected this Author by the Authority of good Historians.

[B] And besides that, he is guilty of four Errors.] I. He would find it a hard Task to prove, that the Father of our Cassius was called Spurius. II. He has placed the pretended Spurius Cassius very injudiciously in the Year of Rome 230; for, since he is not taken notice of but for his Severity to his Son, it follows, that this Severity was exercised very near that time. If so, Cassius must of necessity have punished his Son in Tarquin's Time, and there must have been Tribunes of the People before the Expulsion of Tarquin, than which nothing can be more false and absurd. Therefore that Chronology concerning the Year 230 of Rome is wrong. Let us add, in the third place, That it only serves to confound the Author that makes use of it; for, if Spurius Cassius was living at that time, his Son must have been Tribune of the People very near the Time, to which Livy and Dionysius Halicarnassensis refer the Punishment of Spurius Cassius Viscellinus, viz. in the Year of Rome, 269; which proves, that Moreri had no reason to conceive two Cassii punished almost at the same time, one by his own Father, the other by the People, for aiming at the Throne, by means of the Lex Agraria.

For two such Examples almost at the same time, in two Persons of the same Name, and for the same Offence, would never have escaped the Observation of so many Historians, who have not left us one Word of it. But, fourthly, he should not have barely said Cassius had a Son who was Tribune, but that he was Tribune of the People, and have refuted the pretended Dignity Valerius Maximus confers upon him. The learned Manutius has suffered himself to be misguided in this Point by Valerius Maximus (5).

[C] No more did that Author's Commentators.] The Valerius Maximus Variorum (6) gives us no reason to think they were sensible of their Author's Blunders. No body enquires if his Cassius, in the fifth Book, be the same with him in the sixth, or thinks it strange that the Sentence and Execution in the fifth Book, should be a Domestic Affair, and in the sixth the Affair of the Senate and People. One of these Commentators refers the Cassius of the Sixth Book to the Year of Rome 668, which is only Four hundred Years lower than it ought to be. Father Cantel, the Dauphin's Scholiast, thinks it enough to observe, on the Passage in the fifth Book, that the Author agrees neither with Livy, nor Dionysius Halicarnassensis; but he ought also to have observed, either there or on the sixth Book, that he is inconsistent with himself. As to this last Passage, he refers us to Places that are nothing to the purpose. We ought to be more careful of Numbers, in Works designed for the Instruction of Youth.

The same Commentators are so favourable to their Author, as not to reproach him for having spoken too negligently of the Temple of the Earth. His Expressions about it make it appear he was willing we should think the Building of this Temple was one of the Articles of the Sentence pronounced against Cassius, and one of the chief Reasons of his Punishment. 'Senatus Populusque Romanus, says he (7), non contentus capitali cum supplicio afficere, interempto domum superjecit, ut Penatium quoque strage puniretur, in solo autem aedem Telluris fecit. Itaque quod prius domicilium impotentis viri fuerat, nunc religiosae severitatis monumentum est. — The Senate and People of Rome, not satisfied with putting him to death, pulled down his House, that he might be punished likewise in the Destruction of his Penates, and upon the Spot built the Temple of the Earth. What therefore was formerly the Habitation of a weak Man, is now a Monument of religious Severity.' It is plain he looks on the building of this Temple as part of the Punishment inflicted on Cassius. This a Commentator ought to have censured, since it was observed before, upon the same Subject (8), that the Temple of the Earth, vowed by T. Sempronius, was built, according to Servius, in That Part of the City, which was called Carinae; for it appears from Dionysius Halicarnassensis, that the Temple of the Earth, built on part of the Ground, where Cassius's House stood formerly, was towards That Part of the City. Wherefore That Temple was not built till near Two hundred Years after Cassius's Execution (9), and therefore was not designed to aggravate his Punishment: and indeed they would have thought of it very late; accordingly we see that Dionysius Halicarnassensis makes no Connexion between that Punishment and the building of the Temple, but looks on them as two Things of very different Dates.

The Temple of the Earth, which Pliny takes notice of (10), was built long before That vowed by Sempronius. But this will not serve to justify Valerius Maximus; for, if the Dispute was to be determined by this Passage, it must be confessed, that this Temple of the Earth preceded Cassius's Punishment. In effect, Pliny's Words imply, that, Anno 596, the Censors ordered several Statues to be removed, and even That of Spurius Cassius, who had aimed at the Royalty, and which he had erected in the Temple of the Earth, to be melted down. Perhaps, instead of the Temple of the Earth, it ought to have been said the Temple of Ceres: for, as it was Spurius Cassius, who, during his second Consulship, dedicated the Temple of Ceres (11), which follows that Tradition likewise,

lib. i. cap. xxvi.

I shall observe, by the by, that Pliny follows the Tradition, according to which the Father condemned and punished his Son in his own House (12); and one would think that Father Hardouin was tender of Pliny's Honour, in his Note upon the Passage of that Author. For, having quoted the Words of Livy, who says, that the Thing was related by some in the same manner, he adds, that Valerius Maximus and Dionysius Halicarnassensis affirm it likewise, and that others maintain that Cassius was precipitated. No body would be able to guess, by this, what was the true Opinion of Livy and Dionysius Halicarnassensis, which does not at all agree with Pliny's. If this Account be not altogether exact, we may very well excuse the Author, whose learned Commentary is the Effect of an uncommon Vigilance and Application.

[D] Mr Hoffman is, at least, as much in the wrong, as Mr Moreri.] For if, on one side, Mr Mo-

reris is mistaken, when he makes Spurius Cassius's Father flourish in the Year of Rome 230, Hoffman, on the other, is as much deceived, when he supposes Valerius Maximus to have said, that, after the Son had been whipped, and executed, by his Father's Order, the Booty was applied to the building a Temple to Ceres. Templo dein Ceresis ex prædâ extructo. We have already observed (13), that Cassius dedicated this Temple, and therefore it could not be built after his Death. Besides, a Rebel's confiscated Estate was never called a Booty. To conclude, If he had a mind to cavil upon the Account of the many Temples built to Ceres; we might at least urge the Words of that antient Author against him; 'Verberibus affectum necari iussit, ac peculium ejus Ceresi consecravit' (14). — He ordered 'him to be whipped, and then put to death, and dedicated his Effects to Ceres.' Do these Words imply the building a Temple to Ceres? And, since he was willing to specify the Use that was to be made of this Peculium consecrated to Ceres, why did he not consult Livy (15), Dionysius Halicarnassensis (16), and Pliny (17), who all tell us that they made a brazen Statue out of it.

CASSIUS LONGINUS (LUCIUS), lived in the VIIth Century of Rome. He was a Judge of such inflexible Severity, that his Tribunal was called the Rock of the Accused [A]. I am of Opinion that he ought to be distinguished from That Lucius Cassius, of whom Cicero speaks in his Book of the famous Orators, and in his third Book de Legibus [B], but not from him who brought that famous Maxim

[A] His Tribunal was called The Rock of the Accused. It is not to Cicero that we are obliged for this Particular, as Julian Brodeau imagined, and for which he is, with as much Modesty as Justice, reprehended by Mr Menage (1), but to Valerius Maximus (2), who did it by way of Complement to Marc Antony, the Triumvir's Grandfather. This Marc Antony was one of the best Orators in his Time. Whilst he was going into Asia, in Quality of Questor, he heard that he was summoned to appear before the dreadful Tribunal of L. Cassius the Pretor, which Tribunal was called Scopulum Reorum, there to answer to the Crime of Incest alledged against him. He, waving the Benefit of the Laws, which forbid any Process against those, who were absent Reipublicæ causa, returned to Rome, appeared, and was acquitted (3). A modern Author imagines, that Caius Aquilius was the Man, whose Tribunal was called The Rock of the Accused (4). This Aquilius was Pretor at the same time with Cicero (5).

[B] He ought to be distinguished from That Lucius Cassius, whom Cicero mentions in his Treatise of Illustrious Orators, and in his Third Book de Legibus. Cicero's Description of him makes it evident, that he is speaking of L. Cassius, Tribune of the People, Anno 616; for he attributes to him the Lex Tabellaria (6), enacted under the Consulate of M. Lepidus and C. Mancinus. There is no doubt that Lucius Cassius, Consul in the Year 626, and Censor in 628, is the same with him who was Tribune of the People in 616. It is not likely therefore that his Tribunal was called The Rock of the Accused; for then we must suppose, that, after having attained to the highest Employment in the Republic, he re-descended to the Pretorship about twelve or thirteen Years after; since the Pretor, of whom Valerius Maximus speaks in relation to Marc Antony's Cause, must needs have been in that Office about the Year 640; otherwise we must suppose That Author not to have been so exact as he ought, when he expressed the Qualities of L. Cassius.

Father Cantel, in his Notes upon the Valerius Maximus in usum Delphini (7), removes the whole Difficulty at once: He tells us, that L. Cassius, by an extraordinary Creation made Pretor, after he had been both Consul and Censor, because he had the Reputation of being a very severe Man, obtained, by an Order of the People, an Authority of enquiring into Crimes of Incest, at a Time when the Priests were complained of for having proceeded too gently against the Vestal Virgins accused of Uncleanness. The Mischiefs is, that neither Livy's Abridgment, nor Africanus Pedianus, both which the Father quotes, speak one word of the Matter. The Abridgment of Livy says only (8), that Æmilia, Licinia, and Martia, Vestal Virgins, were condemned for Incest, and that there was an Account how this Incest had been committed, discovered, and punished. A noble Piece of History lost! What a Misfortune is it that we cannot hear the Grave, Majestic Livy upon it! It is pity likewise that we do not know all that Dion wrote concerning the Process of these Vestals. We meet with something of it in the Excerpta published by Valesius in 1636 (9). But let us examine Africanus Pedianus's Words; he is something particular, especially in what relates to L. Cassius. 'When Sextus Peduceus, says he (10), Tribune of the People, accused L. Metellus, High Priest, and the whole College of the Priests, for not having found the Vestals guilty of Incest, punishing only Æmilia, and suffering the other two, Marcia and Licinia, to be acquitted; the People deputed L. Cassius, a Man of extraordinary Severity, to take out a fresh Information against them, who not only condemned those two, but several others with them; for which it was thought he behaved with too much Rigour in the matter.'

It does not in the least appear from this Passage, that L. Cassius had before this been Consul and Censor, nor that the Pretorship had been conferred upon him after an extraordinary manner: however, it may be inferred from hence, by making some allowance, that he obtained then from the People an extraordinary and special Commission, such as those of the Grand-jours in France, or Mr Boucherat's Commission (11), by virtue of which he took cognizance of Poisoners and Witches in 1680. So that, provided we suppose Valerius Maximus to have expressed himself very ill in representing to us That Man as a simple Pretor, who had already discharged the highest Employments of the Common-wealth, and who was at that time invested with an extraordinary Authority, that he might enquire into some very important Causes; we may allow L. Cassius, Tribune of the People in 616, Consul in 626, and Censor in 628, to have presided at a Trial of Incest about the Year 640, and to have been Marc Antony the the Orator's Judge. According to the Character Cicero has left of him (12), he will appear a fit Man to acquire the Reputation of being the Rock of the Accused: though, on the other hand, Severity was a Quality so customary in that Family, that it is not easy to decide, if he, who had this terrible Reputation, was the Tribune of the Year 616, or his Son, or his Brother, or his Nephew, or his Cousin. L. Cassius ex familia tum ad ceteras res tum ad iudicandum severissima (13). — Lucius Cassius of a Family remarkable for its Severity in every thing, particularly in Judgment. Add to this a Passage in Tacitus: Ita dignum maioribus suis & familia Cassia per illas quoque gentes celebrata (14). — Thus worthy of his Ancestors, and the Cassian Family, famous likewise among those People.

This Question is as far from being determined from this Observation, viz. that Cicero, who several times takes notice of the Maxim cui bono, introduced by one L. Cassius a very severe Judge, the same no doubt with him, whose Tribunal was called Scopulus Reorum, takes no notice that he had ever been Consul and Censor: for to this it may be answered, that his Business being only to represent the Qualities of a good Judge, it was unnecessary to name his other Employments; and that otherwise one might pretend that L. Cassius, Tribune of the People in 616, of whom Cicero speaks in his Book of the famous Orators, never was Consul nor Pretor, because Cicero mentions not a word of it. If I should be asked upon what grounds I pretend, that the Maxim cui bono was introduced by L. Cassius, the Rock of the Accused; I would produce that beautiful Passage in the Oration pro Roscio Amerino. — L. Cassius ille quem populus Romanus verissimum & sapientissimum iudicem putabat, identidem in causis querere solebat cui bono fuisset (15). Sic vita hominum est, ut ad maleficium nemo conetur sine spe & atque emolumento accedere. Hunc quaesitorem ac iudicem fugiebant atque horrebant ii quibus periculum creabatur; ideo quod tametsi veritatis erat amicus, tamen naturam non tam propensum ad misericordiam, quam impudens ad severitatem videbatur. Ego — facile me paterer vel illo ipso acerrimo iudice querente, vel apud CASSIANOS iudices, quorum etiam nunc illi, quibus causa dicenda est, nomen ipsum reformidant, pro Sex. Roscio dicere. — Lucius Cassius, He, whom the Roman People esteemed to be the best and wisest of Judges, was wont, upon Causes, to enquire, who is the Gainer? Such is the nature of Mankind, that no one is wicked without the prospect of Advantage. They, who were in danger, fled from and dreaded this Inquisitor and Judge; for, though he was a Friend to Truth, yet he was naturally more inclined to Severity, than Mercy. For my own part — I should not be afraid to plead the Cause of Sextus Roscius before that severe Judge himself, or any Cassian Judge, whose very Name now affrights those, whose Cause is to be pleaded.

I have mentioned a thing, which requires a Digression. I supposed, that they, who had exercised the highest Offices of the Republic, never descended to the Employment of a Pretor: and yet a Return to this Charge, after the Possession of the Consulate, is not without example; but this is a Case, which will not affect our L. Cassius. They, who had the Misfortune to be degraded, retired thither for a Rehabilitation. This we have from Plutarch (16), speaking of Cornelius Lentulus Sura, who was expelled the Senate after he had been Consul, and could not be restored till he had been a second time Pretor. Dio makes the same Observation upon this Lentulus (17); and, in another place (18), tells us, that Salust was made Pretor An. Rom. 706, that he might be re-admitted into the Senate. It was, without doubt, upon this very Motive, that the Triumvirs made Ventidius Pretor again (19), he, together with Marc Antony, having been declared Enemies to the Republic. This Office may, without this Reason, have been conferred twice upon the same Person; for we learn from Africanus Pedianus (20), that Marius Gratidianus was twice Pretor; and the Reason is, because he was extremely beloved by the People: but it is likely there was no Interposition of the Consulate and Censorship between his two Pretorships: so that this Instance is not sufficient to illustrate what relates to our Cassius. The Example of Mancinus, who was made Pretor after all the Disgraces he suffered before Numantia, whilst he was Consul (21), amounts to nothing more than That of Lentulus Sura: But Metellus Pius's carrying the Pretorship and Pontifical Dignity from his Consular Competitors would be of some weight, if it might not be alleged, that these words in Aurelius Victor, Adolescens in petitione Præturæ & Pontificatus, Consulibus viris prælatum est (22), signify no more than that he had Consular Competitors for the Pontificate. We are not to imagine, that Aurelius Victor, nor those superior to him, observe, in their Narrations, that Logical Rule, viz. That a Proposition, compounded of several Subjects, is false, if the Attribute agrees not to each Subject, distinctly and separately taken. As for the Questorship, a Dignity inferior to That of Pretor, I cannot deny but it had been enjoyed by some, who before that had been Consuls; and let us see here what a learned Man has observed upon it: 'Though the Questors had no Right of Jurisdiction, no Power to summon any before them, or imprison them, neque vocationem neque prebensionem haberent, yet it was a Dignity, that Men, who had been Consuls, thought not fit to decline. T. Quinctius Capitolinus was Questor with Martius Valerius, after he had been thrice Consul; and so was Cato the elder, after he had triumphed, and gone through all Offices; nay, the Lex Pompeia provided, that none but Men of Consular Dignity should execute that Charge (23). But since the Pretorship has no Instance of the same nature, I have reason to suppose there was a Difference in this respect between those two Offices.

[C] — But not from Him, who brought into Credit the famous Maxim CUI BONO.] The Passage in the Oration pro Roscio Amerino, which I have quoted in the foregoing Remark, shews what this Maxim meant, and the use the Pretor L. Cassius made of it. I add here, that it contains a great deal of Sense in it, and that it is founded upon a Principle, which meets with but few Exceptions in the World, viz. That no one transgresses without the Prospect of an Advantage; and that in criminal matters Presumption is against those who are Gainers by them. I speak of Crimes punishable by earthly Judges. For which reason Cassius the Pretor thought, upon good grounds, that, in criminal Trials, the Judge went a great way, if he could discover of what Advantage the Crime in question might be to the Accused. Not but there are some, whom no Advantage can induce to commit a Crime (24), as there are others, who will do it for a very little Profit, or even not to break a Custom of being wicked (25): However, this no ways weakens Cassius's Maxim; we know very well, that, in things of this nature, there can be no Rules of a metaphysical or even physical Generality. See the Use Hobbs makes of this Maxim in the Fifty seventh Chapter of his Leviathan; la Motte le Vayer in his Discourse upon History, p. 201. Tom. ii. of the Edition in 12^o, and the Author of divers Thoughts upon Comets, p. 683.

[D] — nor from Him, who, according to Salust, was Pretor An. Rom. 642.] This Pretor may very well be the Author of the Maxim cui bono; and the Rock of the Accused; for Salust represents him as a Man of such extraordinary Probity, that his private Word went as far as the public Faith; which Consideration prevailed with Jugurtha to deliver himself up to the Mercy of the Romans; Cassius, who was sent to persuade him to come to Rome, having not only given him a safe Conduct from the Republic, but also his own Word. Privatim præterea, says Salust, fidem suam interponit, quam ille (Jugurtha) non minoris quam publicam ducebat. Talis ea tempestate fama de Cassio erat (26). If this be the same with Him, of whom Valerius Maximus speaks in relation to Marc Antony the Orator, he must be a different Man from the Tribune of the People in 616; for it is very unlikely, that a Man, who

who had been Censor in 628, should be no more than meer Pretor in 642.

The Variarum Comment upon Salust, published by Thyffius at Leyden in 1656, mentions two very opposite Opinions. Some maintain, that Cassius the Pretor, who was dispatched to Jugurtha, was the same with him, who, when he was Tribune, made the Lex Tabellaria be ratified: Others say it was he, who, being Consul, some time after the Numidian Expedition (27), and commanding an Army against the Gauls, was cut to Pieces by the Tigurini (28). This last Opinion, to which Sigonius (24) and Glandorp assent, seems the most probable; for, if L. Cassius, who was overthrown by the Tigurini in 646, had been Tribune of the People in 616, he must have been the second time Consul in 646, of which the Consular Tables take no notice. He was rather, as Sigonius conceives, the Son of That Tribune, than the Tribune himself.

This to me appears very certain, that the L. Cassius, Author of the Maxim cui bono, and who was Reorum Scopulus, was he, who was Tribune of the People in 616; or he, who, being Pretor in 642, was sent to Jugurtha. The Delphin Commentator on Cicero's Orations, is of this last Opinion; to which Valesius (30) agreed before him, but without reprehending Lindenbrogius, who holds to the other side, and whom he has reproved upon another account in the very same Note. Corradus, in his Commentary upon Cicero's Brutus, and the Delphin Scholiast upon the same Book, Glandorp, and several others, are of Lindenbrogius's Opinion. I hope this will excite the Learned to search into the Bottom of the Question.

[E] His Severity made all rigid Judges be called Cassiani. This we have learned already from a Passage in Cicero (31): the Reader has here another of the same Author (32). Non quæro iudices Cassianos, veterem iudiciorum severitatem non requiro. . . . I want not Cassian Judges, I require not the ancient judicial Severity. Cicero had a little before said ironically; etiam illum ipsum quem tu in cohorte tua Cassianum iudicem habebas. . . . Even He, the Cassian Judge, whom you had in your Cohort. To this relates the Passage in Ammianus Marcellinus's Twenty sixth Book: Jura quidem præstentur & leges, & Catonianæ, vel Cassianæ sententiæ, suo periti resident iudices; . . . There is indeed a specious Pretence of Law, and of Catonian or Cassian Determinations; and there is a formal Appearance of Judges. And this other of Marcus Aurelius (33). Pato me non errasse, siquidem & tu notum habes Cassium, hominem Cassianæ severitatis, & disciplinæ. . . . I believe I was not mistaken, since even you are acquainted with Cassius, a Man of Cassian Severity and Discipline. To all this may be added a Passage in the same Marcellinus's Thirtieth Book concerning the Emperor Valentinian. Judices nunquam consulto malignos elegit: sed si semel promotos agere didicet immaniter, Lycurgos invenisse se prædicabat & Cassios, columina justitiæ præcæ, scribensque hortabatur assidue ut noxas vel leves acerbius vindicarent. . . . He never purposely chose austere Judges: But if, when once promoted, he found, that they behaved with cruelty, he gave out, that he had met with Lycurgus's, and Cassius's, the supports of ancient

Justice; and he was perpetually exhorting them by Letter to animadvert even severely on slight Offences. Observe, that Lindenbrogius refers Marcellinus's first Passage not to Lucius Cassius, but Caius Cassius, who lived in and after Tiberius's Reign, and who was chief of the Cassian Sect among the Civilians. He ought to have remembered, that, upon these words in the Twenty second Book of the same Historian, Judicibus Cassiis tristior & Lycurgis, he had observed, that the Judices Cassiani were so called from L. Cassius, of whom Cicero speaks in his Brutus, and of whom he pretends Marcellinus spoke in that place.

[F] The President Bertrand has ignorantly transferred this Honour to another Cassius Longinus. The Passages before quoted make up one of the greatest Elogies Posterity could find to render Justice to the Integrity of L. Cassius, and to immortalize that Passion he had to make the rigour of the Laws prevail in his Age. The President Bertrand is very much out here (34). He observes from Suetonius, that Caius Cassius Longinus, who lived under Nero's Reign, was blind, and he pretends that to be a signal Mark of an extreme Severity, which he proves in the Instances of Cæcilius, Appius, and Catulus Messalinus. He adds, that this Cassius was so severe a Judge, that his Bar was called Scopulus Reorum. There lies the Mistake; for he, whose Tribunal was so called, lived in the days of Marc Antony the Orator, about the Year of Rome 640, and more than One hundred and fifty Years before Nero's Reign. Menage (35) has observed it; as did likewise William Grotius, Brother to the great Hugo Grotius, long before (36). It is true he makes Bertrand say, that Cassius drew That Character upon him by his too great Cruelty; propter nimiam sævitiam; whereas Bertrand makes use of the Term severitas; but perhaps the least Criticism upon this would be to renew the Cassian Severity.

[G] I shall not forget a Mistake of Corradus. I have produced a Passage in Cicero, where he speaks of one L. Cassius, who, having been elected Military Tribune, could not have sat as Verres's Judge, if the Cause had been adjourned to the Year following. Corradus (37) imagined, either that Africanus Pedianus's Notes upon the Place had been falsified, or that the Commentator was mistaken in supposing, that Cicero was speaking of the same L. Cassius, who brought in the Lex Tabellaria in 617 (38). If Africanus had had that Thought, he had fallen into a very childish Error; for there being, according to Corradus's Computation, Sixty seven Years at least between the passing of that Law, and Verres's Trial, what a Blunder must it be, to imagine, that a Man should be elected Military Tribune, Sixty seven Years after he had been Tribune of the People, and when he must be near a hundred Years old? But there is nothing of this in Africanus's Notes; and Corradus could not rightly understand them. Africanus (39), endeavouring to prove, that Cicero was in the right, when he said, that the Cassian Family was always observed to have been very severe, as well in judicial Matters, as upon other Accounts, observes, that from that Family sprung the Leges Tabellariæ, and That Cassius, who asked the Question cui bono.

CASSIUS LONGINUS (CAIUS), one of the Murderers of Julius Cæsar, and he who said to one of his Accomplices, Strike, though your Dagger pass through my Body (a), was one of the greatest Men of his Age. It is true he was a little violent, and to him are ascribed the Counsels which sometimes carried Brutus too far (b). He was a thorough-paced Epicurean, and yet behaved himself better, and lived up to the Rules of Morality with more Exactness, than the greatest part of the Heathens. He never drank any Wine (c). Every one knows that he had this Encomium given him, that he was called the last of the Romans (d). He married Junia, Brutus's Sister, and, as it is thought, had great reason to distrust her Conduct [A]. He was an excellent Commander, as he made appear to the World, after Cassius's Defeat. The Parthians, in pursuit of their Victory, made an Irruption into Syria, and sat down before Antioch. Cassius repulsed them so warmly, that he constrained them to raise the Siege, and took such effectual Measures to beat their Parties, and draw their Army into a disadvantageous Place, that he routed it, killed Osaces their General, and obliged Pacorus, the King's Son, to abandon Syria (e). These things being rightly considered, the greatest part of Glandorpius's Criticisms on Rutilius falls to the Ground [B]; as will appear in the Remarks. Marc Antony began to be sure of the Victory, as soon as he heard that Cassius was dead (f). (1). — Servilia, the Mother of Marcus Brutus, having purchased a valuable Farm, at a small price, from Cæsar, who exposed the Goods of the Citizens to sale, could not escape This Saying of Cicero. That you may judge of the Cheapness of the Bargain, you must know that Servilia procured this Farm for a THIRD part less than the Value. Now JUNIA TERTIA was the Daughter of Servilia, and Wife of C. Cassius; and the Intrigue of the Dictator with both Mother and Daughter was the Conversation and Jest of the whole Town. Glandorpius refers us to this Passage in Macrobii; and yet he does not know which of Servilia's two Daughters Cicero's Raillery strikes at; whether at Junia, Lepidus the Triumvir's Wife, or Junia the Wife of Cassius. Ultra Tertia fuerit in quam jocus est Cicero (locus est apud Macrobium lib. ii. Saturnal. cap. ii.) non facile dixerim (2). Can any Man that reads the whole Passage doubt which it was? Observe, that Cassius's Wife survived her Husband Sixty four Years (3).

[B] When we consider — that he defeated the Parthians — and slew their General — Glandorp's Criticisms upon Rutilius fall to the Ground.] Almost his whole Criticism (4) upon a Passage in Bernardin Rutilius (5), in which Cassius, Pompey's Lieutenant and Governor of Syria, is said to have warred with the Parthians, is ill grounded. The Error in the Passage vanishes, if those two words, Pompey's Lieutenant, be suppressed: for in most of the rest we may agree with Rutilius. In effect, Dio says, that, tho' Cassius had not accepted the Command of the Army, which was offered him by the Soldiers, and to which Cassius had consented, he nevertheless took upon him the Government of Syria (6), after Cassius's Defeat, and the Parthian Invasion had made it absolutely necessary. It has been already shewn, with what success he managed the War, and how he drove the Parthians out of the Province, where he commanded. Glandorpius was not ignorant of this in pag. 205 (7). So that I cannot comprehend the Reason which he urges against Rutilius in pag. 470. It is true, said he, after Cassius's Defeat, the Quæstor Cassius, finding himself blocked up in Antioch, made several successful Sallies upon the Parthians; but this was without any formal Declaration of War; Bellum nullum justum aut indictum cum illis gessit. Was it not sufficient that this was a Continuation of that War, which Cassius had carried into their Country? What War can be more formal, than that one, commanding in a Province, should fight with those, who with an armed force had broken into it, in consequence of a Victory gained over the Aggressors? If Glandorpius had not made use of this Reason, which has spoiled his Criticism, but had satisfied himself with supposing, that Rutilius had in view the Wars between Cæsar and Pompey, his Reflexion had been effectual. Let us see Cicero's Account of Cassius's Exploits in Syria after Cassius's Overthrow. 'Negue vero classes decerunt: tanti Tyrii Cassium faciunt, tantum ejus in Syria nomen atque Phœnice est. Paratum habet Imperatorem C. Cassium P. C. Respublica contra Dolabellam, nec paratum solum sed peritum, atque fortem. Magnas ille res gessit ante Bibuli summi viri adventum, cum Parthorum nobilissimos duces maximaque copias fudit, Syriamque immani Parthorum impetu liberavit (8). — Nor will Flecti be wanting: so highly do the Tyrians esteem Cassius, and so great is his Renown in Syria and Phœnicia. The Common wealth, Fathers Conscript, has a General, C. Cassius, ready against Dolabella, nor ready only, but skillful and valiant. Great Things did he perform, before the Arrival of Bibulus, having defeated the bravest Commanders, and gallantest Armies of the Parthians, and delivered Syria from the violent Attacks of That People. See him likewise in the twentieth Letter of his fifth Book to Atticus, where he pretends to have alarmed the Parthians, and encouraged Cassius by his March. 'Ru- more adventus nostri, & Cassio, qui Antiochia tenebatur, animus accessit, & Parthis timor injectus est. Itaque eos cedentes ab oppido Cassius insequutus rem bene gessit, qua in fuga magna auctoritate Osaces dux Parthorum vulnus accepit, eoque interit paucis post diebus. — Upon the rumour of my Approach, Cassius, who was shut up in Antioch, took Heart, and the Parthians began to fear. They drew off from before the City, and Cassius, pursuing them, gained a Victory; in which Flight, Osaces, a Man of great Authority, and General of the Parthians, received a Wound, of which he died a few Days after. See also Josephus cap. 12. lib. 14. Antiq. Judaic.

[C] Mr Moreri's Faults — are not very many. He says Cassius was overcome by Cæsar, which is false. Cassius, after Pompey's Defeat, submitted to the Conqueror, and, without any Blows, delivered him up the Fleet under his Command. He had even then a mischievous Design upon Cæsar's Life. 'C. Cassius — me auctorem, credo, desideravit: qui etiam sine his clarissimis viris hanc rem in Cilicia ad ostium fluminis Cydni consecisset, si ille ad eam ripam quam constituerat, non ad contrariam navim appulisset (9). Nor is it more true, that, when Augustus, Marc Antony, and Lepidus entered into a Combination to revenge Cæsar's Death, Cassius upon that retired into Syria; for both he and Brutus had, before that, secured those Countries which they thought most convenient for their Affairs. As soon as they saw Marc Antony and young Octavius grown too strong for Cæsar's Assassins in Italy, they left it, not to go to those Provinces the Senate had assigned them, but to make sure of better: to which end Cassius, who was very well known and esteemed in Syria, made choice of that, whilst Brutus secured Macedonia. This we have from Dio, Plutarch, and several other Historians. I omit saying, that Moreri ought to have quoted Florus in his fourth Book and seventh Chapter, and not the sixth Chapter of the third Book: He has likewise quoted the first Book of Epicurus's Life, written by Gassendus, instead of the second. He calls Cassius's Freed-man Dandorus, though Plutarch and Dio call him Pindarus (10).

[D] Mr Furetiere has committed a very great Mistake in relation to Cassius.] I dare venture to say, that these words in Aulus Gellius were at least the remote cause of it: Eum Cassium postea satis notum est visis Parthis suoque exercitu suo miseram mortem oppetuisse (11). Aulus Gellius is speaking of a certain Fatality, which was said to attend the Horse of Sejanus, which ever brought those, who were in Possession of him, to an untimely end; and, among other Instances brought to prove it, he alleges that of Caius Cassius, into whose hands the Horse fell after Dolabella's violent Death. Then he adds, that it

me to contradict himself, touching the Death of this illustrious Roman [E]; and Dio's Reasoning is not just [F]. Eusebius's Chronicle wants a little Correction in this Place [G]. I wonder that Plutarch, and the rest of the Historians, have omitted an Apparition of Julius Cæsar to Cassius [H].

Here is one thing worthy our Observation. Cassius, according to Epicurus's Principles, believed the Soul to be mortal; and yet, on the Day in which Julius Cæsar was assassinated, he addressed his Prayers to the Manes of Pompey the Great [I]. He had, upon this occasion, forgot his Philosophy: Nature was more prevalent in him than Art. It was not so with him, when Brutus told him, that a Spectre had appeared to him; for, though he ought to have been uneasy under the Apprehension of the Success that attended their Undertaking, he philosophized coolly it was well known, that Cassius died a very miserable Death after having overthrown the Partians (12), and after the loss of his own Army. Nothing could be more improper, than to mention, on such an occasion, Cassius's Advantages over the Partians so long before. Either this Passage has been corrupted, and Partis is put for Partibus (13), or else Aulus Gellius did not think of what he was saying. Besides, Mr Furetiere, who says, that Cassius, Master of this Horse, after Dolabella's Death, died in a War against the Partians (14), took it upon trust, or did not consider Aulus Gellius's Words: for, if he had in the least considered it, he would have found that he means That Cassius, who was Cæsar's Murderer: and every body knows, that That Cassius died not in the Partian War, but in the Battle of Philippi, where Marc Antony got the Day, as may be seen in Moreri.

[E] Plutarch contradicts himself touching the Death of this illustrious Roman. He says in one place, that Cassius killed himself with the very Dagger he had used against Cæsar, and looks on it as a sort of Mystery (15): in another place he only says, that Cassius made his Freed-man Pindarus kill him (16), and even observes, that Pindarus did this Business by cutting off his Head (17). This is confirmed by Velleius Paterculus: 'Lacerna caput circumdedit, extantque cervicem interitus liberto præbuit. Deciderat Cassii caput cum, &c. (18). — He covered his Head with his Cloak, and fearlessly stretched out his Neck to his Freed-man. He had cut off the Head of Cassius, when, &c.' Now a Dagger is not very proper for such an Execution; and it is certain, most of Cæsar's Murderers made use of Daggers (19). The way for Plutarch to have kept up to some Uniformity, had been to say, either that Cassius recommended that Dagger to his Freed-man, or that the Freed-man had no other (20).

[F] Dio's reasoning is not just. Having said, towards the end of his Forty seventh Book, that Cassius made Pindarus kill him, and that Brutus would be killed likewise by one of his Followers, he begins his Forty eighth Book with saying: 'Ο μὲν ἄνδρ' ὅτε Κάσσιον ἔως ἀπὸ λονῆς ἐξέτισιν οἷς τὸν Κάισαρος ἀπεχρήσαντο σφαγίνης (21). Ad hunc igitur modum Brutus & Cassius oppetierunt iis quibus Cæsarem interfecerant gladiis confossi. — Thus fell Brutus and Cassius, stabbed with the very Swords, with which they had killed Cæsar. But, with the Respect due to the ancient Historians, we may say this Narration is a little imperfect, and that no considerate Reader will find any good consequence in it. Brutus and Cassius were killed by some of their Retinue; they fell, therefore, by the very Swords, with which they had murdered Cæsar. This would be more credible, if it appeared they had killed themselves. Suetonius indeed says, that some of these Assassins killed themselves with the same Daggers; but he names none of them. Nonnulli semet eodem illo pugione quo Cæsarem violenter interemerunt (22).

[G] Eusebius's Chronicle wants a little Correction. We find there, that Cassius seized on Judæa, and pillaged the Temple of Jerusalem before Cæsar's Death (23); which is false on several Accounts. There was no need of securing Judæa at that time; for the Jews lived peaceable in Subjection to the Romans. Cassius never plundered the Temple of Jerusalem; if he had, Josephus would not have let such an Action pass in Silence, nor contented himself with saying only, that Cassius exacted a large Sum of Money from the Jews. This was done after Cæsar's Death, when he went to make sure of Syria (24). Eusebius had been in the right, if he had said, that Cassius pillaged the Temples at Rhodes; though That ought not to be placed, as it is in his Chronicle, two Years after Cæsar's Death. Scaliger says (25), he has mistaken two Years; to me it appears to be but one. However it be, Cassius, having defeated the Rhodian Fleet, took away their Ships and Money, and pillaged their Temples: He left them nothing but the Chariot of the Sun; and had used them more roughly, but that he remembered the time, when he studied among them. They thought themselves so sure of the Victory, that they shewed him the Chains they had prepared for the Romans they should take Prisoners (26). See how Valerius Maximus, that he might the better vent some mysterious witty Conceits, has handled what relates to the Chariot of the Sun (27).

[H] Plutarch, and other Historians, have omitted an Apparition of Julius Cæsar to Cassius. I wonder at this Silence in Plutarch, who has so carefully recorded all the Prodigies relating to the War with Brutus and Cassius, and that in so great a number, that he thought himself obliged to tell us, that Cassius began to waver in his Epicurean Principles (28). Dio, who is as careful and industrious upon this Head, as Plutarch, takes no more notice of this memorable Apparition than he; and I know none but Valerius Maximus, who does. During the Battle at Philippi, says he (29), Cassius, pushing on with extremest Ardor, saw Cæsar, who with a Mein more than human, and an angry menacing Countenance, came up full speed to charge him. This Spectacle so amazed him, that he turned his Back, saying, It is time to give over; what is there more to be done, if to have killed him be not sufficient? Quid enim amplius agas si occidisse parum est? I should be more surprized to meet with this Adventure in no more than one Author, if I did not know, that there are many things remarkable for their Singularity, which we have but from a single hand; and even sometimes it happens that this single Witness speaks of it but occasionally, and that a long time after the Business is over. Of this the Reader finds several Examples here and there in this Work: Here is one. We are told only by Ammianus Marcellinus the Expedient which Alexander made use of to expel Sleep (30); and in all likelihood we had never known it, but that he had a mind to give Julian, the Apostate, some Superiority over Alexander.

[I] He believed the Mortality of the Soul; and yet on the Day, wherein Julius Cæsar was assassinated, he addressed his Prayers to the Manes of Pompey. Plutarch adds to this Relation, a Reflexion of his own: He says, the Greatness of the Enterprize, and the Dangers, with which it was surrounded, threw Cassius into a sort of Enthusiasm, which made him forget his Principles of Philosophy. Καὶ γὰρ ἐν καὶ λέγεσθαι Κάσσιον εἰς τὸν ἀνδρείωλτα τὸ Πομπηίου περὶ τῆς ἐξουσίης ἀποβλέπον, ἐπικαλεῖσθαι σωτῆρ, καί ποτε καὶ ἀλλότριον ὢν τὸν Ἐπικύρου λόγον. ἀλλ' ὁ καὶ οὐδὲν (ὡς εἰκεν) ἦν τὸ δυνάμει παρῆσθαι, ἐνθουσιασμον ἐνεποίη καὶ παρῆσθαι, ἀντὶ τὸν περὶ τῶν λογισμῶν. Quin etiam Cassius fertur, quoniam ab Epicuri doctrina non abhorreret, eam statuam ante agressionem respiciens tacitus, Pompeium invocasse. Verum articulus ille, utpote tanto jam ingruenti discrimine, amotis prioribus rationibus, fanaticum eum & commotum reddidit (31).

coolly upon the Matter, and ended with a Wifh, that the vulgar Opinion touching the Exiftence of Genii were true [K]. The Reason he urged was capable of reviving his Friend's Hopes, and fhews us at the fame time, that Unbelievers are not always induced to Unbelief by the Motives of Self-love (g). [K] When Brutus gave him an account of an Apparition — he philofophized coolly upon the matter, and ended with faying, he wifhed the vulgar Opinion touching the Exiftence of Genii were true.] This we have from Plutarch. Δαίμονας δ' ἢ εἶναι περὶ τὸν αὐτὸν, ἢ ὄντας ἀνθρώπων ἔχειν εἰδέναι, ἢ φανέν, ἢ δύναμιν, εἰς ἡμᾶς δεικνύσαν. ὡς ἔγωγε ἂν ἐβουλόμην ἵνα μὴ μόνον ὅπλοις καὶ ἵπποις καὶ ναυσὶ τοσαύταις, ἀλλὰ καὶ θεῶν ἀρωγαῖς ἐπεβαρύνμεν, ὁσιώσαντες ἔργων καὶ καλλίστων ἡγεμόνες ἐνέσμεν. Genios porro neque effe credible eft: neque fi fint, hominum habere figuram vel vocem vel vim quæ ad nos pertingat. Nam equidem ita effe velim, ne tantum equitatu, peditatu, & tanta claffe, verum etiam deorum ope freti sanctiffimorum & pulcherrimorum duces factorem effemus (32). — It is not credible, that there are Genii: or, if there be, that they have the Shape or Voice of a Man, or a Force fuitable to us: For fuch I fhould wifh them to be; that, depending not only on our Horfe and Foot, and fuch a great Fleet, but relying likewife on the Affiftance of the Gods, we might perform the nobleft and moft gallant Actions. Mr Balzac found fo much Beauty in this Difcourfe of Cassius, that he paraphrafed upon it, on purpofe to give us a great Idea of the Roman Converfation. See, fays he (33), how Cassius handles a bufiness fo difagreeable, and how he improves it for the Benefit of Converfation. Without being a ftupid Admirer, or an incredulous Opiniator, he fays pleafantly to his Friend, That the Cares of his Soul, the Diftractions of his Mind, the Wearinefs of his Body, and Darknefs of the Night, might very well create that strange Vision, and prefent it to his Eyes: That, for his Part, the Principles of the Philofophy he professed would not allow him to believe there were any Genii, and much lefs that they were vifible: That, notwithstanding, he wifhed there were, and that his Philofophy were falfe: Because, in all appearance, thefe incorporeal Spirits being juft and virtuous, the Action of the Ides of March was fo honourable, and their Cause fo honeft, that they muft needs be of their Party. If fo, the Common-wealth would find Friends and Allies, of whom they never dreamed, ready to fight with and fupport them upon occafion. And then they were not to reckon only on their fide fo many Companies of Foot, fo many Troops of Horfe, fo many Legions, and Ships: for there was an immortal People, victorious Armies ready, without any Pay, to declare for the Juftice of their Cause, whom nothing could tempt to ferve Antony againft Brutus, or prefer Tyranny to Liberty. Thefe, Madam, were the dying words of the Republic; which after he had pronounced, he expired. This was the Roman Spirit, and the natural Language of Majesty. And do not you think Cassius expreffed himfelf very eloquently in it? Should you not be glad to have a more intimate Acquaintance with this excellent Man, and to hear him in fome other of his Converfations, upon Subjects more agreeable, and at another time than the Day before the Battle of Philippi (34)?

(34) Here Balzac is miftaken; for Plutarch, ubi fupra, fays, that this Difcourfe between Brutus and Cassius was the Day after the Apparition, and that they were not then paffed out of Asia into Europe.

CASSIUS LONGINUS (CAIUS), a great Civilian in Nero's Reign. Some Critics pretend, that Pomponius (a) has confounded him with L. Cassius Longinus, who married a Daughter of Germanicus [A]. This is lefs to be wondered at than

[A] Some Critics pretend, that Pomponius has confounded him with Lucius Cassius Longinus, Sen-in-law of Germanicus.] I fhall not enter into a Difpute either for or againft him. They fay that of two Perfons he has made but one, having confounded L. Cassius Longinus with Caius Cassius Longinus; of whom, the firft was Consul An. Rom. 783, and after that married to Drufilla, Germanicus's enough; but fome will fay, did not the Phantom tell Brutus that he was his evil Genius? Does not this deftroy Cassius's Suppofition, that the Genii always proteft the jufteft fide? Now if we have as much to fear from the ill Offices of thefe Genii, as we have to hope from their good ones; what fignifies it whether there be any or no? I anfwer, that, if we only follow the Light of Nature, an Idea of good Genii will be eafier formed to us than of wicked ones; and fo Brutus might more readily be touched by Cassius's Reflexions than by the Difcourfe of the Phantom.

[L] I fhall examine into thofe religious Phrafes, which they fay he ufed in haranguing his Soldiers.] Brutus and Cassius, upon a Review of the Army near the Gulf of Menas (35), forgot not the Custom of haranguing the Soldiers. Cassius, as being the elder Man, made the Speech; and did it fo effectually, that they all cried out, Let us go on, lead us where you please. Ravifhed at this Exclamation, he began afrefh, and that with this Wifh; May the Gods, who prefide over Wars, waged on a juft account, grant you a Reward worthy your Fidelity. Θεοὶ μὲν, ὅσοι πολέμων δικαίων δεσπόται, τῆς πίστεως ὑμᾶς, & συνεργαζώται, καὶ περὶ θυμίας ἀμειβόμενοι (36). Dii quibus iufta bella curæ sunt pro hac fide vobis, commilitones, faxint bene. He then reprefted to them the good condition in which, through the Care of their Generals, who had taken all thofe Meafures, which Prudence and the Art of War could fuggelt, they then were: Thefe, continued he, are the utmoft Precautions of human Forefight; the reft depends upon your Valour, and the divine Bleffing. Τὰ δὲ λοιπὰ αὐτοῖς ἀνάλογον ἀπαρτίσεις παρὰ τὴν ὑμῶν καὶ παρὰ τῶν θεῶν (37). Reliqua τὰ ὑμῶν καὶ παρὰ τῶν θεῶν (37). Reliqua τὰ ὑμῶν καὶ παρὰ τῶν θεῶν (37). Reliqua τὰ ὑμῶν καὶ παρὰ τῶν θεῶν (37). We will juftly pay you all we have promifed you; and as we have already affigned Rewards for your Fidelity, fo will we take care, by the Gods Affiftance (38), to make you Prefents worthy the Greatnefs of the Victory. A Man who talks at this rate muft furely have forgotten Epicurus's Principles. Is it not likely, that Cassius, upon the brink of that important Day, on which depended all his Fortune, had recourfe to thofe very Divinities, whofe Providence he had before been taught to deny? Was he not one of thofe who forget all the Maxims of Infidelity upon a dangerous Crisis? I have two things to anfwer: Firft, It is not certain, that the Speech we find in Appian is the fame, word for word, as he fpoke it. The Hiftorians were Mafters of thefe fort of Harangues; They turned them as they pleafed, and mixt in them whatever of their own they thought neceffary. My fecond Anfwer is, That, fuppofing Cassius continued ftill as firm to the Doctrine of Epicurus as ever, yet might his Difcourfe be fuch as the Hiftorian has reprefted it. He knew well fuch Exprefions as thefe would be very acceptable to the Soldiers. From thence he conceived a great Argument for Hope, which it was his Bufiness to improve. A wife General, upon thefe Occafions, fuits his Language, not to his own Philofophical Opinions, but the inbred Notions of his Army.

than the little Conformity, which appears in the cotemporary Authors, touching the Punishment which Nero inflicted upon our Lawyer [B]. Some of them say that he banished him; others, that he put him to Death. The Commentators have neglected

(1) Lipius in Tacit. Annal. lib. vi, cap. xv.

(2) Cassius Plebei Romæ generis, verum antiqui honore, & severa Patris disciplina eductus, facilitas sepius quam industria commendabatur. Tacit. Ann. lib. vi, cap. xv.

(3) Sueton. in Calig. cap. xxiv.

I shall only observe at present, that, if it be true, as Lipius pretends (1), that he, who was married to Drusilla in 785, had been Consul in 783, it is strange Tacitus should not say one of Word it, when, upon account of this Wedding, he tells us who this Cassius was, whom Tiberius had made Choice of to bestow upon his adopted Grand-daughter; and is so particular as to tell us, That, it is true, his Family was Plebeian, but very ancient, and dignified with several Employments of the Commonwealth, and that this Cassius had been bred up under the severe Discipline of his Father, and was more to be admired for his Affability, than for the Greatness of his Soul (2). Can any Affectation of Brevity, though ever so great, excuse, in such a Case, the mentioning, when the thing is known, that such a Man was a Consul, and how he discharged That Trust. It follows, therefore, either that Cassius was not Consul in 783, or, which is not very likely, that Tacitus knew nothing of it. On the other side, if Pomponius believed his Cassius Longinus had been Consul in 783, how came he to be ignorant of a thing more glorious to him, than the Consulship of Lucius Cassius, and afterwards, when his Hand was in, that he would not give him likewise the Wife of Lucius Cassius.

But it may be alledged, in Lipius's Behalf, that Suetonius says expressly, that Drusilla was married to Lucius Cassius Longinus, a Man of Consular Dignity. To which I answer; Suetonius says no more, than that Caligula took his Sister Drusilla from her Husband Cassius, who had been Consul. Now these two Expressions are very different. There were five Years between Drusilla's Marriage, and Caligula's Reign: In which Interval, L. Cassius might have been Consul by Substitution, and to Drusilla's Husband might be of Consular Dignity when he lost his Wife, though he was not when he married her. See what odd Conclusions some Men draw from Passages, which they quote, and do not weigh with a Cassian Exactness. Suetonius says, Lucio Cassio Longino Consulari collocatam (Drusillam) abduxit (Caligula) (3). Lipius, without taking notice of Caligula or the abduxit, makes Suetonius say, Drusillam collocatam L. Cassio Longino Consulari: Words, which, being propounded after so loose a manner, and as a Proof of Lipius's particular Opinion, naturally bear no other Sense than this: Drusilla was married to L. Cassius Longinus, who had been Consul. Des Cartes has very well observed, that the main Spring, from whence our Errors flow in Philosophical Matters, is, that we crowd more things into our Judgments than our distinct Ideas present to us. We may say likewise, that the multitude of Mistakes, that abound in critical Writings, proceed chiefly from the Licence the Critics take of extending farther than they ought the Authorities upon which they build.

[B] There is but little Conformity in Authors touching the Punishment, which Nero inflicted upon our Lawyer. The Splendor, in which our Caius Cassius Longinus had lived, seems to me to leave no room for those two different Accounts, so directly opposite one to the other, of Nero's Treatment of him. Some say, he put him to death; others, that he banished him into Sardinia. These are two contradictory Opinions; it is saying Nero did put him to death, and he did not put him to death; how comes it about that we should have Authority for the Aye and the No, by virtue of what some Authors, almost cotemporary, have left behind them? It would be not less surprizing, if People should begin to say now, that Barneveldt was only banished, and Mr Fouquet put to death. But, whether we have reason to be surprized or no, all that can be said as certain, is, that on one side several ingenious Men, relying upon the Authority of Suetonius and Juvenal, affirm, that Nero put Caius Cassius to death; on the other, that many learned Men, building upon the Credit of Tacitus and Pomponius, assure us, in the most exprels manner, that he was sent into Banishment.

Let us first hear the Evidence these two last give. 'Tunc Consulo Senatus, says Tacitus (4), Cassio & Silano exsilia decernuntur. — DEPORTATUSQUE IN INSULAM SARDINIAM Cassius, & Senatus jus expectabant (5). — By Decree of the Senate, Cassius and Silanus were sentenced to Banishment. — And Caius Cassius was carried into the Island Sardinia, &c. Here Tacitus leaves him, without telling us what became of him afterwards; but we find in another Author, that he was restored by Vespasian, and died peaceably. 'Plurimum in civitate auctoritatis habuit, eo usque donec eum Cæsar CIVITATE PELLERET; PULSUS AB EO IN SARDINIAM, revocatus à Vespasiano, diem suum obiit' (6). — He had great Authority in the State, 'till Cæsar banished him; and, being driven by Him into Sardinia, and afterwards recalled by Vespasian, he died at Home.' Let us see, whether Suetonius and Juvenal tell us as clearly, that Nero caused him to be put to death. Suetonius, having told us, that Nero put whom he thought fit to death, upon the least Pretence, without having any regard to Persons or Distinction, adds, with respect to four Persons, the Crimes of which they were accused (7). Cassius Longinus, the Civilian, one of the four, was accused, says he, for having preserved Cassius's Picture, one of Cæsar's Murderers, in the Genealogical Table of his Family; quod in vetere gentili stemmate C. Cassii percussoris Cæsaris imagines retinisset. This, according to Tacitus, is one of the Heads of this Great Man's Accusation. 'Obiectavit Cassio (Nero) quod inter imagines majorum etiam C. Cassii effigiem coluisset, ita inscriptam, DUCI PARTIUM' (8). — Nero objected to Cassius, that, among the Pictures of his Ancestors, he respected That of C. Cassius, inscribed thus, TO THE LEADER OF THE PARTY. This proves, that these two Historians speak of the same Cassius; and yet they say very expressly, one, that he was banished, the other, that he was put to death. For Suetonius must have been in a Dream, if he had spoken, as he does, without designing to let us know, that Nero ordered this Civilian to be put to death. As for Juvenal (9), I find him no less positive than Suetonius. Not but that a Banishment into Sardinia, which was looked on as a desolate, unhealthy, Island, might pass with him for a Misfortune bad enough, to say, that Cassius Longinus, whose mighty Riches had brought him to it, was an Example of the Miseries, to which the Rich, and not the Poor, are exposed; which is the Design of the Poet in that Place; but he had before determined what manner of Misfortune he would impute to the Wealthy, and said, that a great many had been strangled by their accumulated Treasures.

Sed plures nimia congesta pecunia curâ
STRANGULAT.

But more have been by Avarice oppress'd,
And Heaps of Money crowded in the Chest.
DRYDEN.

It follows therefore, that the two Examples, viz. of Longinus and Seneca, which follow immediately after, must be Examples of Death.

Temporibus diris igitur, jusque Neronis
Longinum & magnos Senecæ prædixit hortos
Claustit, & egregias Lateranorum obsidet ædes

For this, in Nero's arbitrary Time,
When Virtue was a Guilt, and Wealth a Crime,
A Troop of cut-throat Guards were sent to seize
The Rich Men's Goods, and gut their Palaces.

(5) Lipius looked on these last Words as a Wound incurable; but they have been ingeniously corrected by the President Bertrand, and William Gratius, both lighting almost upon the same Thought; the first reads it nec Senatus jus expectabatur; and the other, nec Senatus jussu expectabatur. Nicolas Heinfus's Conjecture, which Mr Rick, Animadv. ad Tac. pag. 282, takes to be the most probable of all, is, that it ought to be read De Senatus ejus respectabatur. But Don Nicolas Antonio, de juribus Exulium, lib. i, p. 72, pretends, it ought to be ut senex tutius aspectabatur, or depectabatur.

neglected to clear up this Confusion [C]. They, who will have it, that Germanicus's Son-in-law was a Civilian (b), have, I think, no Grounds for it [D]. The Omission of one Word has occasioned a great Mistake in Mr Chevreau's History [E]. It was not corrected in the Edition of the Hague, 1698.

Tacitus observes likewise, that Cassius's Riches were one Cause of his Persecution; from whence it appears, that Juvenal, and he, meant the same Man. 'Nullo crimine, says he, Annal. cap. 7. lib. 16. nisi quod Cassius opibus vetustis & gravitate morum - - - praecebat. — Cassius's only Crime was his great Wealth, and the Gravity of his Manners.' The other Cause of his Persecution, was his Gravity, that Virtue of Severity hereditary in his Family, of which he had given so many Examples, as well in maintaining a Military Discipline in Syria in the very midst of Peace (10), as in affirming, that the Law ought to be observed, which adjudged all That Man's Slaves to death, who had been murdered by any one of them (11).

[C] The Commentators have neglected to clear up this Confusion. It is not easy to conceive why they neglected inquiring either into Tacitus or Pomponius's Mistake, or That of Juvenal and Suetonius. The Commentators upon Juvenal (12) and Suetonius (13) tell us, that Nero put Cassius Longinus to death, and say nothing of Tacitus's Opinion, so very opposite to it. Those upon Tacitus (14) make no mention of the contrary Account, but speak only of his Exile. No more do they, who have written the Lives of the ancient Civilians (15). There are even some Writers, who quote Suetonius, to prove that Cassius was blind (16), but take no notice of what is close to it, that Nero put him to death.

[D] There is no Foundation for saying, that Germanicus's Son-in-law was a Civilian. If he had been so, Tacitus certainly would have added it to the rest of his good Qualities, which he sums up on occasion of his marrying Tiberius's Grand-child. Suetonius, who makes mention of him, and tells us, that Caligula first deprived him of his Wife, and, after that, of his Life (17), would have characterized him to us as a Civilian, if he really had been,

as Glandorpius pretends (18), That Famous Civilian, who succeeded, in the Profession of the Law, Mafurius Sabinus, and whose Mother, Tabero's Daughter, was Sulpitius's Grand daughter, the Oracle of the Law. Suetonius has represented Cassius Longinus as a Civilian, who was really so (19); why therefore was he not as exact in relation to L. Cassius Longinus? Tacitus has not omitted C. Cassius's Skill in the Law. Cæteros ed tempestate Cassius præminebat peritia legum (20).

Mr Hoffman has multiplied these Civilians after another manner; he has made one of him, who was put to death by Nero, according to Suetonius, and another of him, who was only banished into Sardinia by the same Nero, according to Tacitus.

[E] The Omission of a Word has occasioned a great Mistake in Mr Chevreau's History. It is, in all Appearance, an Error of the Press. We find, in the ninth Chapter of the third Book of his History of the World, that Nero put Cassius Longinus to death, for having placed, among the Pictures of his Ancestors, That of Julius Cæsar. The Printer omitted the Murderer of, and the Corrector, not well remembering the Story, and finding, notwithstanding the Omission, a Cause plausible enough for Nero to put any one to death, left the thing as he found it, and they have not thought fit in Holland to rectify it. This Conjecture is very probable, and I wish we found, in the Books that are extant, no greater Errors of the Copyists and Printers than this.

Since the first Impression of this Dictionary, we have had an Edition of Mr Chevreau's Works (21), according to the Alterations, made by him, almost in every Page of the former Editions (22). I find no Alteration in the Passage, relating to our Cassius; so that now I dare not lay the Fault upon the Printers.

CASSIUS HEMINA (LUCIUS), a Roman Historian, who flourished in the beginning of the VIIth Century of Rome. He composed four Books of Annals. By the Passages we find quoted from them (a), we may judge that he went back as far as the Times preceding Romulus, and that he continued it thro' the Kings of Rome, down to his own Times. He described the second Punic War in his last Book (b). They, who say that he lived in Augustus's Reign, are very much mistaken [A], and confound him with Cassius Severus [B]. There is, in Charles Stephens's Dictionary, a wretched Blunder concerning Cassius Hemina [C].

(6) Vossius de Hist. Lat. pag. 110.

[A] They, who say he lived in Augustus's Reign, are very much mistaken. Vossius has discovered the Grounds of their Mistake. Priscian, says he (1), quotes, in one place, Cassius ad Mæcenatem, and, in another, Cassius ad Tiberium; upon this, they imagined it related to Cassius Hemina. Stimler first maintained, in his Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca, that Cassius Hemina had dedicated his History and Annals to Mæcenat and Tiberius. La Popeliniere afterwards affirmed the same thing (2). Guilandin and Dalechamp push the Matter farther; they think Pliny ought not to have called an Author very ancient, vetustissimus, who, as they gather from the Persons, to whom he dedicated his Works, preceded him not above seventy Years; they change therefore vetustissimus into verissimus (3). The Truth of the Matter is, that this Cassius Hemina flourished when the Ludi Sæculares were celebrated for the fourth time, viz. Ann. Rom. 608 or 607. As to Priscian's Cassius, he was Cassius Severus, the Orator, if Vossius (4), and Father Hardouin (5), may be believed.

[B] - - - - and confound him with Cassius Severus. Vossius seems very much in the right, when he charges this Mistake upon Tertullian's Copyists (6). It is, without doubt, better to lay the Charge here, than to throw it upon Tertullian himself. However it be, we find Cassius Severus cited, with Cornelius Nepos, in Tertullian's Apology, and That to justify a Matter, of which it is certain Cassius Hemina treated; whereas it does not certainly appear, that the other Cassius wrote any History, properly speaking. Vossius thinks therefore, that Tertullian quoted only Cassius, meaning Hemina, and that Severus at length crept into the Text, as the Gloss of an ignorant Copyist. He confirms his Conjecture by this Observation; viz. that Minutius Felix, and Laëtantius, repeating Tertullian's Objection, quote Cassius, without adding Severus. It is true, they rank him after Cornelius Nepos; but it does not follow from thence, that they pretend his History to be subsequent to That of Nepos; for then we might, upon as good ground, conclude, that Laëtantius supposed Varro to have lived in the Reign of Tiberius, because he places him after Cassius; Latini Nepos, & Cassius, & Varro (7). It has been observed to those, who run down Calvin, for having added, immediately after he had been speaking of Arius, surrexit postea Sabellius, that a great many, well versed in Ecclesiastical History and Chronology, have sometimes ranked the Heretics preposterously, where there was no occasion to give a precise Account of the Time in which they lived (8).

[C] There is, in Charles Stephens's Dictionary, a wretched Mistake concerning Cassius Hemina. We there find one Cassius Hemina, a Surgeon of Rome, made a Citizen for his great Skill, and gratified with a Shop in the Place called Actia. This is said upon the Credit of Pliny, Chap. 7 of the Twenty fifth Book, and the third of the thirtieth; though though there is nothing of this in either of the fore-cited Places, nor in any other throughout Pliny. All he has said, which bears any Resemblance to it, is in the first Chapter of the Twenty ninth Book. Cassius Hemina, says he, a very ancient Author, assures us, that the first Physician, that ever came to Rome, was Archagatus, the Son of Lysanias, who removed thither out of Peloponnesus in the Year of Rome 535, where he had the Privilege of a Citizen, and had a Shop bought for him, at the public Expence, in the Place called Atilia. The Reader may see plainly the enormous Difference there is between what Pliny is made to say, and what he really does say. And it is very strange

CASSIUS SEVERUS (TITUS), a famous Orator in Augustus's Time, who distinguished himself principally by a satirical Humour, which drove him at length into Banishment, a Misfortune attended with a great many others, which ended not but with his Life (a). Mr Moreri has confounded him with another Cassius, surnamed Parmensis, a great Versifier, and one of Cæsar's Murderers: A Mistake, which has led him into a great many others [B], besides those which

[A] Moreri has confounded him with another Cassius, surnamed Parmensis. I cannot find, that any of the Ancients have given him the Name of Severus; and yet Father Hardouin tells us (1), he was called Cassius Severus Parmensis, and that the Orator, Cassius Severus, to prevent the being confounded with him, was surnamed Longulanus, from Longula, the Place of his Nativity (2). I could wish he had given us Proofs of all this, and told us whether the Poet was surnamed Parmensis, because he was born at Parma. Of this we have reason to doubt, when we consider that Horace calls him Hetruscum (3), Tuscan, and that Parma was then in Gallia Cisalpina; but, since it once belonged to Tuscany, why might not a Man, who was a Native of Parma, be still called Hetruscus? The same Father Hardouin observes, that the preceding Editions of Pliny marked Cassius Severus, Longulanus, as if they had been two different Authors, and that, in effect, Simler, in his Abridgement of Gesner's Bibliothèque, has made Longulanus a distinct Author. He tells us moreover, that there is an Epigram of this Cassius Parmensis upon Orpheus, inserted by Pitæus in his Collection of ancient Poems, published at Paris in 1590. I add to this, that the Epigram upon Orpheus appeared before Pitæus's Collection. Achilles Statius was the first, who published it (4): Afterwards Nathan Chytræus adorned it with a Comment. Many are of Opinion, that it is a supposititious Piece, and that Achilles Statius was the real Author of it (5). Every one knows how Muretus imposed upon the greatest Critic of his Time (6), in making some Verses pass with him for Trabeas's (7), as having been found in an old Manuscript, which Muretus had made himself. Why might not Achilles Statius make the same Trial of the public Taste? Sigonius did it once, as appears by the Book of Consolatione, which he would have pass for Cicero's.

[B] A Mistake, which has led him into a great many others. I. He observes that this Cassius's Writings, for being prejudicial to the Reputation of Persons of Quality, made Augustus enquire into all the remarkable Pieces, which were published. This shows he did not rightly understand the Passage in Vellius: Scriptis suis procacibus proscripsit viros faminaque illustres, eaque re occasionem dedisse Augustus, ut de libellis famosis cognitionem susciperet (8). Who would imagine, unless he saw it, that the Emperor, by this Passage, was curious of enquiring into the Famous Pieces, that were made public, and not rather armed with a just Indignation against scandalous Libels, and ordering his Judges to enquire into them, and punish the Authors? I believe Mr Moreri would have come off better, if he had gone back to the Source which Vellius shewed him, I mean the First Book of Tacitus's Annals; for there he would have found, that Augustus was the first, who, by virtue of the Law de Majestate, took cognizance of the Books, which the Latins called Famosi; from whence he would have concluded, that it was not out of Curiosity for all Famous Writings, but to cause a judicial Information against such Pieces, as those of Cassius Severus, that the

to me, that neither Frederick Morel, Royal Professor, nor Mr Lloyd, nor Hofman, have corrected this gross Blunder in Charles Stephens. It is entire and perfect in the Edition of 1620, and That of 1662. Mr Lloyd has only altered the Figures, which refer to the Citation from Pliny, without making them better: He has reduced them to these two, 7. 25. Mr Hofman has copied Lloyd, Letter for Letter. Immediately after, they give us, in good order, from the Remarks of Vellius, the Article of Cassius Hemina, the Annalist, the only one they ought to have mentioned, omitting their chimerical Surgeon of that Name.

Emperor was brought to this new Piece of Law. Now, what sort of Writings were these of Cassius Severus? They were Satires, wherein the Reputation of several Illustrious Persons of both Sexes had been torn to Pieces. Let us see Tacitus's Words. Primus Augustus cognitionem de famosis libellis specie legis ejus (Majestatis) tractavit, commotus Cassii Severi libidine, qua viros formidatæ illustres procacibus scriptis diffamaverat (9). — Augustus was the first, who took cognizance of diffamatory Libels by Virtue of the Law de Majestate, moved thereto by the Licentiousness of Cassius Severus, with which he libelled the Characters of Persons of the first Rank, both Men and Women. II. Mr Moreri says, in the second place, that Cassius Severus was one of those, who conspired against Cæsar; that, after the Defeat of Brutus and Cassius, in the Year 712, he followed young Pompey; after that Antony, and that at length Augustus gave Varus orders to kill him, who, having found him in his Study, set it on Fire, and burnt him and his Books together. All this is false, and belongs to another Cassius, quite different from the present, as we shall see hereafter (10). III. Tacitus says, however, (Moreri goes on) that he was confined, by Tiberius's Order, to the Isle of Crete. This is something indeed, and properly belongs to our Cassius; but Mr Moreri cannot keep long in the right Road, without launching out again. Tacitus does not tell us, that it was Tiberius who confined Cassius to the Isle of Crete; he says only, under the Year 777, which was the tenth of Tiberius, that Cassius's Punishment was aggravated; for, instead of suffering him to continue in Crete, he was shut up in the little Isle of Seriphus, with an Interdiction of Fire and Water (11). We cannot gather from this Passage whether he was banished into Crete under Augustus's Reign, or after his Death; and, supposing it was after the Death of that Emperor, Mr Moreri has, however, put Words into Tacitus's Mouth which he never spoke. But what if we should prove, that he was banished in Augustus's Reign? which is done thus. Cassius, according to St Jerom's Chronicle, died An. Christi 33 (12), and the Twenty fifth of his Exile: It follows therefore, that he was confined to the Isle of Crete An. Dom. 8, which was the Fiftieth of Augustus's Reign. Now, since Augustus did not die till the Fifty sixth Year of his Reign, Cassius's Exile must precede Tiberius's Reign five or six Years. Hence it is that Scaliger reckons that Ovid and Cassius were banished much about the same time (13). IV. This evidently proves another Fault in Mr Moreri: He makes St Jerom say, that Cassius died after he had been an Exile fifteen Years, in the fourth Year of the CCIV Olympiad; that is to say, about the Year of CHRIST 24. It is but looking into St Jerom's Chronicle, and we shall there find, that Cassius died in the Twenty fifth Year of his Exile, the fourth of the CCII Olympiad, the Thirty third of JESUS CHRIST, and the Nineteenth of Tiberius. We cannot suppose here, that the Printer mistook one Figure for another; for, besides that there are some of these Numbers written at length, in this Article of Moreri, it is likely a Printer spring from another Cause. The Reader shall have them in the Remarks, with a Blunder of the learned Apologist of Cardinal Mazarin [C]. Vossius has likewise confounded the Orator with the Poet [D]; for which he has been censured in some Remarks, which will not all stand the test. Some, on the other side, have split Cassius Severus into two [E]. This is not He, to whom Ovid wrote [F]; which Scaliger knew very well, though he refutes the Error by bad Reasons [G]. Difficulties

ter should mistake the Figures three times together, with the Symmetry we find here between the Faults? V. His last Blunder is, That he applies to Cassius Severus what Horace spoke of Cassius Parmensis, viz. That his Poetical Vein was more rapid than a Torrent, &c. But as for the Emperor, he was not at all concerned at it. Never was any thing more improperly alleged than this Verse of Horace; for he not only does not assure us, that Tibullus wrote any thing relating to Cassius Parmensis, and speaks only as doubting of it; but he supposes that, if Tibullus was about any thing of that nature, it was not to answer a Satire written against Augustus, but to exceed Cassius Parmensis. See the Verses following, and consult Mr Dacier's Notes upon them.

[D] Vossius has likewise confounded the Orator with the Poet. Mr Dacier, in his excellent Notes upon Horace, has taken notice of this Mistake (16). If it were true, that the Poet was called Severus (17), I should see but one Proof of Vossius's having confounded him with the Orator; for in this case he might have given the Poet the Name of Cassius Severus Parmensis, without confounding him with the Orator. And as for the Passage in Quintilian, which relates to Cassius the Orator, and which Mr Dacier quotes, to prove that Vossius had confounded the two Cassii, it can be no Proof; for Vossius had not that Passage in View, but quoted another out of the same Quintilian, relating, not to Cassius Severus the Orator, but Cornelius Severus the Poet (18). There is therefore but this one Proof left to Mr Dacier; which is, that Vossius applies to Cassius Parmensis what the old Scholiast upon Horace says of Cassius Severus on Od. vi. lib. v; so that Mr Dacier might have said that Vossius has applied to the Poet Cassius, not only what belongs to the Orator, but also what belongs to Cornelius Severus the Poet. Vossius is not guilty of this Mistake in his Book of the Latin Historians; for there he applies this Ode of Horace to Cassius Severus the Orator, distinguishes him from Cornelius Severus, and censures La Popeliniere for having confounded them (19).

[E] Some have split Cassius Severus into two. We shall now see, that, as, on one hand, Cassius Severus, and Cassius Parmensis, have been reduced into one, so, on the other, Cassius Severus has been divided into two. Glandorp, having related most of the Things, which are reported of him, presently after tells us, that there was another Cassius Severus, flourishing under Vespasian, and mentioned by Pliny cap. xi. lib. xxxv (20); but this is the same with him, who was banished for his Slanders. This will appear at first Sight, if we consider upon what Occasion Pliny speaks of this Cassius: After having spoken of certain Dishes of so enormous a Capacity, that perhaps Luxury never appeared in greater Triumph than there, he adds, that Vitellius's Dish was not more infamous, than That of Asprenas, with which a hundred and thirty Guests had been poisoned, as Cassius Severus, Asprenas's Accuser, objected to him. Now we are told by Suetonius (21) that it was in Augustus's Reign that Asprenas was brought to Justice, by Cassius Severus, for poisoning.

[F] This is not he, to whom Ovid wrote. Glandorp has committed another Error a little before; for he thought that F. Cassius Severus was the same, to whom Ovid wrote the Eighth Epistle of his First Book de Ponto. Father Andrew Schottus was in the same Error (22), and so was Vossius (23); tho' Scaliger had refuted it, upon the Doubt he saw Lilius Giraldus in, whether the Orator Cassius Severus, and that Severus, to whom Ovid wrote, were one and the same Person.

[G] Scaliger — refutes this Error by bad Reasons. He says (24) there is as much difference between the one and the other, as between Cassius's Family and That of Cornelius; for He, to whom Ovid wrote, was the Poet Cornelius Severus; the other is Cassius Severus the Orator. It appears plainly by these Words, that Scaliger was persuaded, that this Cassius was of the Family Cassia, one of the most Illustrious of Rome; but this is false, since, according to Tacitus, that Orator was of mean Extraction (25). Scaliger's other Reason is a Riddle to me: I have read the Place over and over again, without comprehending any thing of it. He says that Cornelius Severus was yet living after the Death of Augustus; but Cassius Severus had been five Years exiled before the Death of that Emperor, almost at the same time that Ovid was. The Printers must have forgot some Word, as for Example Romæ; for, without that, Scaliger would argue pitifully; and, if it be supposed, that he said, that Cornelius Severus lived at Rome after the Death of Augustus, it is a convincing Reason, that this Cornelius was not Cassius Severus, who, having been exiled before the Death of Augustus, never returned from his Exile. This is the true Means effectually to remove Giraldus's Doubt, and to confute the Opinions of Glandorp and Vossius. They need only be referred to Ovid's Letter. They will find it dated in the fourth Year of his Exile, and directed to a Man, who enjoyed all the Pleasures of Rome, and all the Delight of his Country-House; which, at that Time, did no ways agree with the Orator Cassius, confined to the Island of Crete. If Giraldus's Doubt concerned the Second Letter of the Fourth Book de Ponto, it may also be solved by the Letter itself, since it is directed to a Poet, who was in Prosperity.

It must be known, that, besides the Eighth Epistle of the First Book de Ponto, there is one (26) in the Fifth Book, written to one Severus, who was a Poet by Profession, as is easy to be gathered from the manner in which Ovid writes to him. Perhaps it is Cornelius Severus, as Vossius (27) and Father Briet (28) have thought. So that, according to Vossius, the Eighth Letter of the First Book de Ponto, and the Second of the Fourth Book, were written to the same Friend. If it be so, it must not be believed, that those Letters were placed according to the Order of Time; the Second of the Fourth Book is of older Date than the Eighth of the First, seeing in the First Ovid makes Excuses to his Friend for not having yet written to him. Moreover, considering his Friend under divers Occupations, in the Eighth Letter of the First Book, he says nothing whereby it may appear that he wrote to a Poet. This would be very singular in Persons who pretended to Poetry, and who applied themselves so much to it as Ovid and culties may be formed as to the Time, wherein Cassius was punished for his Satires [H]; for Authors disagree concerning the Laws, which Augustus published against and Cornelius Severus. So that there is some small reason to question, whether those two Epistles are to the same Person; but it is very certain, that neither the one nor the other were written to Cassius Severus.

[H] Difficulties may be formed as to the Time, wherein Cassius was punished for his Satires. St Jerom's Calculation, concerning the Exile of This Satirist, is capable of embroiling other Calculations. Cassius is justly called Satirical: He might also pass for a Martyr to Slander, since, having drawn a hard Exile upon himself by his Satires, and not altering his Tone after his Disgrace, he raised new Enemies against himself, without appealing those he had already angered (29). Which drew a harder Storm upon him, and such an excessive Poverty, that he had scarcely wherewith to cover his Nakedness. He died in that miserable Condition in the Twenty fifth Year (30) of his Exile, according to St Jerom. Now, as it was the nineteenth Year of the Reign of Tiberius, This Exile must have began five or six Years before Augustus died. But how shall we make this agree with Dio, who does not say, that Augustus punished any Libellers, or gave Orders to suppress the satirical Licence, till the Seven hundred and sixty fifth Year of Rome, that is to say, two Years before the Death of That Emperor? It must not be questioned, but that Those Proceedings and Regulations are the same, which made Tacitus say, that Augustus, being angry at the Libels of Cassius Severus, was the first who ordered Information to be taken, by the Law of Majesté, against That kind of Writings. Neither must it be doubted, but that That Writer was banished from Rome very near the same Time that the Emperor made those new Ordinances. So that either St Jerom's Chronology, is not right, or That of Dio is not so. Suetonius will not clear up the Matter; he will tell us, indeed, that Augustus made such like Ordinances, but not in what Year of his Reign. Neither does Tacitus note the Time of it; he satisfied himself with only shewing the Occasion of it.

If it be difficult to fix the Period of the Edict of Augustus against Libels, it seems not to be so to find in general, that he published it in the latter Years of his Life. From whence it appears, that They are deceived, who say, that Horace had regard to it, where he makes his Friend represent to him, that there were Laws against satirical Poets (31). The Commentator Chabot says upon this, that Suetonius speaks of the same Law, which is meant in these Words of Horace, and quotes Suetonius very ill, mutilating the Passage on one side, and adding, on the other, Glosses and Explanations, all in Italic. So that one cannot discern what is Suetonius's, from what is not. But the grossest Fault is to pretend, that Horace had the Law in View, which Suetonius mentions; a Law, which was not made till a long time after That Poet's Death; which happened in the Thirty sixth Year of the Reign of Augustus, Twenty Years before That of this Emperor. Torrentius committed the same Fault in his Commentary on Suetonius: Ad novum Augusti, says he, hoc de re editum respexit baud dubie Horat. l. ii. ad Trebatium. Si mala conderit, &c. — Horace undoubtedly had in view the new Edict of Augustus concerning this matter, in lib. ii. Ad Trebatium, &c. The Author of the new Commentary Variorum on Suetonius, in 8vo, is of the same Opinion with Torrentius. The Dauphin (32) Scholiast goes farther still, saying, that Horace considered also the Edict of Augustus, in the First Epistle of the Second Book, where it is more plain, that he speaks of an ancient Law, established on the Occasion of the unbridled Liberty of the Farce-Players.

Quin etiam lex
Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollet carmine quemquam
Describi. Vertere modum formidine fustis,
Ad bene dicendum delectandumque redacti (33).

Till Laws commanded to regard Mens Fame,

With Modesty, speak well, and to delight.

CREECH.

It is commonly believed, that the Poet means only there the Prohibition, which was made by the Laws of the twelve Tables, to defame any one whosoever. Forsterus (34) has erred yet more grossly than all those I have mentioned; he not only applies Horace's Verses, before cited, to the Edict of Augustus, but also these Words of the Art of Poetry:

Lex est accepta chorusque
Turpiter obtineat, sublato jure nocendi.

Thus was the Chorus left; their railing Muse Grew silent, when forbidden to abuse.

Idem.

Might the Epoch of the Edict of Augustus, noted by Dio, and pointed out by Tacitus, be criticized with reason, if the Business of Labienus were alleged, whose Books were condemned to be burnt, before Cassius Severus was called to an account for his satirical Writings? It seems at first to be an Objection, since it cannot be true, that the Proceedings of Augustus against Libels began with those of Cassius Severus, or two Years before the Death of that Emperor, if it be true that the Senate caused Labienus's Books to be burnt, at a time when Cassius was yet quiet at Home. Now it appears from Seneca, that this happened at such a time; since, when he bemoans the Loss of Labienus's Writings, and the Author's Resolution to shut himself up in the Tomb of his Ancestors, that he might not survive the Productions of his Wit, he remarks, that, at the same time that those Books were burnt, Cassius Severus said, They must now burn me alive, because I have them by heart (35). 'Cassii Severi hominis Labienus junctissimi belle dicta res ferebatur: Illo tempore quo libri Labieni ex Senatus-consulto urebantur, nunc me, inquit, vivum uri oportet, qui illos edidi' (36).

It may be answered, that the Books of Labienus were not properly defamatory Libels, or Satires, against every body; that they were Histories, wherein he spoke like a Commonwealth's-man, much for the Advantage of Pompey, and of those who had endeavoured to revive his Party; that, to say the truth, those kind of Writings offend as much as defamatory Libels; and that Augustus thought himself obliged to take cognizance of them; but that it might be on another foot, than when he made the Ordinances, spoken of by the Historians, whom I have cited above.

Say what you will, I shall never be persuaded that the Writings of Labienus were only condemned because the Author spoke well of Cæsar's Enemies. It is true, that, under the fierce and cruel Tiberius, it cost an Author (37) his Life for having praised Brutus, and for having said, that Cassius was the last Roman: but History notes also, that it was the first Process, which was begun upon such an account; and we see by the Speech of the Accused, that Augustus withdrew not his Affection from Livy, nor discharged Asinius Pollio and Messala Corvinus from their Offices, tho' they had spoken very advantageously of Cæsar's Enemies. We learn there also, that divers Writings, very injurious to That Emperor, or to Augustus, were not taken notice of. From whence it is very easy to infer, that, if the Books of Labienus were condemned to be burnt, it is because they were full of Invectives against a great number of Persons. Seneca does not permit us to doubt, but that they were of That Character; for see here what he says of it: 'Libertas tanta ut libertatis nomen excederet, ut quia passim ordines hominesque laniaret, Rabienus vocaretur. Animus per vitia ingens, & ad similitudinem ingenii sui violentus, & qui Pompeianos spiritus nondum in tanta pace posuisset. Memini aliquando cum recitaret historiam, magnam partem convolvisse & dixisse, Hæc quæ transeo' (38).

post mortem meam legentur. Quanta in illis libertas fuit, quam etiam Labienus extimuit (38). — The Liberty he took was so great, that it exceeded the Name of Liberty, inasmuch that, by tearing to pieces whole Orders, and Mankind in general, he acquired the Name of Rabienus. He was a very wicked Man, and naturally violent, nor had he laid down the Spirit of his Party (That of Pompey) after so long a Peace. — I remember once, when he was reciting his History, and had gone through great Part of it, He said; What I pass over will be read after my Death. How great was the Liberty taken in them, which even Labienus dreaded? If he had kept within the same general Terms, as Livy, he had enjoyed the same Impunity with him, and would not have found an intimate Friend in Cassius Severus, nor a great Admirer of his Writings. Moreover, the same Seneca declares, that, before Labienus's Books were condemned to be burned, they had never heard of the like Proceedings; and he congratulates the Public, for not having thought of that kind of Punishment, when Cicero was put to death. Res nova & infueta supplicia de studiis sumi: bono hercle publico ista in poenas ingeniosa crudelitas post Ciceronem inventa est. Quid enim futurum fuit si Triumviris libuisset ingenium Ciceronis proscibere? Dii melius quod eo saeculo ista ingeniorum supplicia coeperunt quo & ingenia defuerunt (39).

(39) Id. ibid.

DISAGREEMENT between Tacitus and Dio.

It results from all these Authorities; I. That Labienus's Books were not burned, by reason of the Partiality, which appeared in them, in general, for Pompey's Friends. The Speech of Crementius Cordus is a Proof of it. II. That they were very satirical Writings; Seneca insinuates it clearly. III. That they were the first Writings of that kind that were burned. IV. That it was done before either the Person or the Satires of Cassius Severus were attacked. But this can never be reconciled with Dio, nor with Tacitus; the latter will have the Libels of Cassius the Cause of Augustus's proceeding, by the Law of Majesty, against Satires; the other will have it, that the Order of informing against Libels, and burning them, and the punishing of some satirical Authors, preceded the Death of Augustus but two Years. St. Jerom, with the Twenty five Years time that he gives to the Exile of Cassius Severus, deceased in the nineteenth Year of Tiberius, would not be a good Mediator here. It must necessarily be, that the one or the other have been very little exact. Should it be Seneca? should He have confounded the Time? Would That, which Cassius said only in his Exile, have been attributed to him by Seneca as a Jest, spoken at Rome before his Exile? But, if Seneca be deceived as to a thing, which passed in his time, and which concerned two Orators of his Acquaintance; how can we depend upon any thing he says? If he has told us the Truth, we have here a convincing Proof of a Fact, which Vossius finds ambiguous, or at most probable, viz. that Labienus died in the Time of Augustus (40).

(40) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 317.

[I] Plutarch did not consult Chronology well in speaking of our Cassius. He says, that, Tiberius being one Day in the Senate, a Senator represented to the Assembly, that they ought to speak freely, and declare, without dissembling, what concerned the public Good. This beginning having made every body very attentive, the Senator directed his Speech to Tiberius, to tell him, that there were great Complaints against him, no one daring to tell him of it, for giving himself too much Trouble for the Commonwealth, and for sacrificing his Pleasures and his Health to it. As he continued a long Series of such Discourse, it is said, adds Plutarch, that the Orator Cassius Severus said, The Liberty This Man takes will cause his Death (41). It is impossible Cassius should say This on the same Day that the Senator uttered these Flatteries; since Cassius, exiled before Augustus died, never was recalled. I wonder, that the vast Memory of Theophilus Raynaud (42) did not supply him with this Example of the punishing defamatory Libels, when he was speaking of what was done by the Romans in that Respect.

[K] His satirical Humour prompted him often to set up for an Accuser without being discouraged by his bad Success (43). If ever any Man deserved not to be pitted in the Miseries of his Exile, it was doubtless Cassius Severus; for, besides the Character of his Detraction, which was an excessive and incorrigible Sourness, he pleased himself so much with accusing, that one would have thought he had set up for a common Accuser. This bad Inclination engaged him to take upon him the most ill-grounded Causes, and not to be discouraged at the loss of them. It was so common to see Persons acquitted in those Trials, that Augustus's Will, that the Forum he was building, which went but slowly forward, might be accused by Cassius (44), was put among his Jest. Augustus's Thought is grounded only on the double Signification of absolvere; that Word signifying to finish and to absolve. This jest is but a Quibble, or Pun, according to the Relish of the present times; I say the present times; for it is not yet fifty Years, since these kind of Equivocations passed for Attic Salt (45). However it be, This Quibble is no less a Proof of Cassius's Inclination to accuse, than the Exclamation he made in beginning his Plea against Asprenas, whose Accuser he was: I am living by the Grace of the Gods, and I have wherewith to find Life pleasant, since I see Asprenas in the Hands of Justice. Nothing can be more judicious than the Reflexion of Quintilian on this Exordium. Sine dubio in omnibus statim accusationibus hoc agendum est, ne ad eas libenter descendisse videamur; ideoque mihi illud Cassii Severi non mediocriter displicet; Dii boni, vivo; & quo me vivere juvet, Asprenatem reum video. Non enim iusta ex causa, vel necessaria, videri potest postulasse eum, sed quadam accusandi voluptate (46). — No doubt, in all Accusations, this is first to be taken care of, that we seem not to undertake them willingly; for which reason I am not a little displeased with the Exclamation of Cassius Severus; Ye Gods, I am alive, and, to make my Life pleasant, I see Asprenas accused. For he does not seem to have been his Accuser justly, or through Necessity, but out of a certain Pleasure he took in accusing. Assuredly this Cassius was a villainous Fellow, and those who resemble him in every Age deserve to die as miserable as he, and to make one say, according to the Translation of Amiot, Que désormais autant en puisse il prendre A qui voudra telle chose entreprendre (47).

Que désormais autant en puisse il prendre

A qui voudra telle chose entreprendre (47).

May the same Fate, for the Future, attend the same Undertakings.

For if, in the Roman Commonwealth, where they looked upon accusing as a Gate, through which young Advocates of Quality entered into the World (48), and as a noble Career, which could perfect Orators (49), and imprint Fear in the wicked (50), they nevertheless despised and hated those, who made a Trade of accusing; what can be said strong enough, under Christianity, and in States, which govern themselves otherwise than ancient Rome: I say, what can be represented strong enough against those, who use this Trade? I quote Quintilian again: he declares, that there is but little Difference between a Robber on the Highway, and a professed Accuser: Accusatoriam vitam vivere & ad deferendos reos premio duci proximum latrocinio est (51). Cicero looks upon it as a great Blemish on the Family Junia, to have produced an Orator, who exercised the Trade here mentioned. Iidem temporibus M. Brutus, in quo magnum fuit, Brute, dedecus generi vestro, qui cum tanto nomine esset patremque optimum virum habuisset & juris peritissimum, accusationem facitaverit, ut Athenis Lycurgus. Is magistratus non petivit, sed fuit accusator vehemens & molestus, ut facile cerneret naturale quoddam stirpis bonum degenerasse vitio depravatae voluntatis (52). — At the same time lived M. Brutus, in whom, O Brutus, your Family was greatly disgraced: Who, notwithstanding

But a Character of this Cassius. He delighted in accusing.

(43) From thence proceeds this Jest of Augustus. Cum multi Severo Cassio accitante ablo'verentur, & Architectus fori Augusti expectationem operis distraheret, ita joctatus est, Vellem Cassius & meum Forum accuset. — Many Persons, attacked by Cassius having been absolved, and the Architect of Augustus's Forum happening to delay the Work, Augustus made this Jest; I wish Cassius would accuse my Forum. Macrobius. * civilis in primis peritus fuit (53). What would he say now, were he a Christian, and saw Persons, called by their Character to quite another thing, set up for Informers, and perpetual Accusers, sometimes by printed Libels, sometimes by Letters, without mentioning the Author's Name; inclosing all kind of Business in the extent of their Accusations, Crimes of State, Crimes of Heresy; placing themselves in the Centre of all kind of Spies and News-mongers; being no more discouraged, than Cassius Severus, at the perpetual Absolutions of those whom they attacked, &c. What would he say? It may be easily guessed. There is a very fine Chapter in Balzac's Conversations (54); see here the latter Part of it. * We have yet a Fragment of a * Plea of the Orator Calvus against this Man so * universally hated, the infamous Vatinius; and
* That Fragment is in the Collections of the ancient * Rhetoricians in these terms (if my Memory does * not deceive me); Hominem nostræ civitatis auda-

* I see he does not forget That ill quality, among
* those of Vatinius, whom he accuses of being an * Accuser. Once again, it was incomparably more pardonable, in those times, to set up for an Accuser, than it is in our Age: for, what will not a Man do in a Democracy to gain the People's Affection? Now they did the People of Rome a great Pleasure in accusing those, who had exercised the Offices of the Republic: they looked upon Accusers as Hounds that fall upon Wolves. * Ἐδοκε δὲ καὶ ἄλλος αὐτοῖς
* (Ρωμαίοις) ἀνευ περὶ φάσεως ἢ ἀρετῆς εἶναι,
* τὸ τῆς καλῆς ἡγεμονίας ἔργον; ἀλλὰ καὶ πᾶν τὸς

at present, in Commonwealths, there is no better way to gain the Applause of the Mob, than to declaim against the Magistrates in the Pulpit.

[L] Mr Hofman is deceived in certain things.]
He is more correct here, than Mr Moreri; yet he is not so much as he might be; quisque suos patitur manes.

I. In the first place, he gives us Cassius Severus, an Orator, in an Article by itself, with the Judgment that Quintilian makes of him; to which he adds, that his Writings were suppressed by a Decree of the Senate: for this he cites Suetonius, and at last refers us to Vossius. This Article is found entire in Mr Lloyd's Dictionary, who gave it as he had found it in Charles Stephens, except the Reference to Vossius, which he added to it. Complaint may be made against all three, in respect to the Citation from Suetonius (56): for, as he only speaks of the suppressing of Cassius's Books, to inform us, that they were approved afterwards by Caligula, with those of Crematius Cordus and Labiatus, the Decree ought not to have been spoken of, which forbade the reading of them; or else he ought to have informed us, that That Interdiction was taken off some time after.

II. Next to This Article, Mr Hofman gives us another, which is That of Cassius Severus of Parma, an Orator; of whom he says divers things, which belong only to Cassius Severus of the foregoing Article.
He cites some Authors indeed, as Horace in the nineteenth Satire (57) of the first Book, Paterculus, Ap-
* pian, and Orosius, who say nothing of That Cassius.
So that, not content with having made two Articles for one and the same Man, he fally gives the Sir-name of Parmensis to Cassius Severus the Orator, and applies to him what was only said of another Cassius.
The worst is, that he concludes the Article with this Interrogation, full of doubt, in a thing that has no manner of Difficulty? An idem cum Cassio Poëta?
The Orator Cassius, confined by Augustus in the Island of Crete, and by Tiberius in That of Seriphus, where he died in the Twenty fifth Year of his Exile, is he the same Man with the Poet Cassius of Parma, whom Augustus put to Death at Athens, a little after the Battle of Actium, above forty Years before Tiberius mounted the Throne? III. Mr Hofman is judged by his own Words; for, in the foregoing Page, he had given us the Article of the Poet Cassius of Parma; where he had said, that, after the Defeat of Brutus and Cassius, That Poet retired to Athens, and that Varus, who was sent by Augustus to kill him, found him busy at his Study, and having killed him, brought away his Books and his strong Box. In all this he has followed Mr Lloyd word for word: and the latter had done the same by Charles Stephens, whom he had better have corrected for having suppressed all the Actions of That Cassius, from the Battle of Philippi to that of Actium:
for it is not true, as they affirm all three, that, after the Defeat of Brutus and Cassius, he retired to Athens: he attached himself to the Son of Pompey, and afterwards to Marc Antony, and had Employments under both, and did not go to Athens till after the Battle of Actium, in the Year 722 of Rome. He was the only one remaining of those, who had murdered Cæsar (58); but he did not live long after his Retreat (59); and it is believed that he lived not quite fourteen Years, after he had assisted at That Murder (60). However it be, Mr Hofman, who anticipates his Death, by making him go to Athens a little after the Battle of Philippi, in the Year 712 of Rome, makes him so much the fitter to be distinguished from Cassius Severus, confined in the Island of Ser- iphus in the Reign of Tiberius.

Note by the way, that Suetonius says, that hardly any of Cæsar's Murderers survived him above three Years (61): yet it is true, that many of them passed That time. Petavius has made Suetonius speak without Exception; nullus triennio amplius superstes fuit — ut ait Suetonius (62). Mr Chevreau, in the fourth Chapter of the third Book of the History of the World, says, that none of them could out-live Cæsar above three Years.

[M] Authors do not agree about Cassius Severus's Country.] Father Hardouin's Opinion about This Cassius's Country is very opposite to That of Vossius; for Vossius (63) pretends, that, when Pliny the younger (64) demanded for Herennius Severus the Pictures of Cornelius Nepos, and of Titus Cassius, Countrymen of the Severus (65), to whom he writes, he means our Cassius Severus. If this be true, the latter was not of Longula, as Father Har- douin pretends (66), since Cornelius Nepos was Neighbour to the Po (67); which those of Verona explain to their Advantage (68), in order to procure the Honour to their City of having produced Cornelius Nepos. But Catanus disputes this Honour briskly with them, and maintains, that Parma is nearer the Po than Ve- rona; and that, since Titus Cassius was of Parma, Cornelius Nepos must have been born there likewise (69). I leave them to dispute it. However, it is

(69) Comment.
in Plin. Epist.
xxviii, lib. iv.

It is but just, that I should also discover the fair side of our Cassius Severus. His Eloquence made him reign over his Auditors; he turned them which way he would; he disposed of their Anger at his Pleasure. They were so delighted to hear him, that they feared he should end too soon. His Voice united two Perfections, which seldom go together; it was strong, and had much Sweetness: And, as he was of a majestic Stature, it might be said, that his Body seconded his Wit well. The Gravity, which he wanted in the Conduct of his Life, appeared signally in his Words; for, when he set jesting aside, his Speech had all the Weight and Character of the Harangue of a Censor (d). He had such a ready Wit, that he succeeded much better in the things he said extempore, than in those he had studied. His Impromptu's at the Bar were much more charming than the Thoughts he brought prepared: They, who pleaded against him, took great care not to interrupt him; they were sensible that, by stinging him, they gave new Strength to his Eloquence, and that it was an Advantage to him to be put out of the Thread of his Discourse. Unexpected Cases were more favourable to him, than the Study of the Closet (e); yet never any Man prepared himself more carefully than he. His Speeches were extremely elaborate; he could not suffer any Negligence in them: They were filled with great Thoughts; all was to the purpose; the shortest Inattention of his Auditors made them lose a good thing (f). The good Fortune he had so often experienced, as to what his Mind suggested to him extempore, never made him less careful to prepare himself. He was not contented with strong Meditation, but wrote also almost all that he had to say. This is the Substance of the Judgment, which Seneca made of this Orator (g), and which serves him for a Preface to a curious Recital [O]. Quintilian's Judgment does not agree in all things with this. Observe, that our Cassius, and one of those Men, whose Combats diverted the People of Rome, resembled each other so perfectly, that it was hard to distinguish the one from the other [P].

true, that Cataneus seems to be ignorant of the Difference there is between the Poet Cassius Parmensis, and the Orator Cassius Severus. Perhaps Vassius is mistaken after Glandorpius (70), in taking Titus Cassius, mentioned by Pliny the younger, for the Orator Cassius Severus; for, if Pliny had asked the Picture of Cassius Severus from a Man, whose Name was Severus, and for a Man, whose Name was likewise Severus, he would I think have said something on That Conformity of Name. But I confess that such a Proof is not conclusive. However it be, Pliny says nothing, which signifies either that he speaks of a learned Person whose surname is Severus, or that He, of whom he speaks, is rather Cassius the Orator, than Cassius the Poet: Both of them might have had the Prænomens of Titus. Besides, the Readings of the old Manuscripts vary extremely (71). Some have it Titii Catii; others Titii Atii; and in the Margins there is Aticii, or Catili.

[N] We shall see the Mistakes of Peter Crinitus. He says (72), I. That Cassius Severus, Native of Parma, as Authors say, was counted by Ovid among the Poets, who flourished in his time, such as Sabinus, Montanus, Melissus, and Propertius. II. That it is He, who, having signalized himself in the War of Brutus and Cassius, retired to Athens, where he was killed by the Order of Augustus. III. That Horace wished him ill, as he testified in divers places, and chiefly in the Iambic Verses imitated from Archilochus. IV. That he must not be confounded either with Cornelius Severus, or with the Orator Cassius Severus. He plainly commits the Fault, which he condemns in others; I mean, that he confounds Cassius Parmensis with Cornelius Severus, and with Cassius Severus: for, since he acknowledges, that the first was put to death during his Retreat at Athens, he ought to count him for dead from the Year 723 of Rome, more or less. Now, as Ovid was then but a young Scholar of twelve or thirteen Years, it must not be thought, that he put him in the List of the Poets his Contemporaries, which he gave us in his old Age. This admits of no Difficulty, when That List is examined (73), wherein he opposes, against some Passages of a Critic, the Reputation he had at Rome, at the time when he lived there with such and such (those whom Crinitus names), a Severus, and some others. Let the Reader judge, whether this Severus be not Cornelius Severus, with whom Crinitus takes it very ill that Cassius Parmensis should be confounded. It is moreover certain, that those Verses, imitated from Archilochus, are only the sixth Ode of the fifth Book of Horace (74), which concerns only the Orator Cassius Severus. It will be perceived, without my remarking it, that Cri- nitus falls into the Faults above-mentioned, concerning the suppressing of the Exploits of Cassius Parmensis, from the Battle of Philippi to That of Actium.

[O] Seneca makes a Judgment of this Orator, which serves him for a Preface to a curious Recital. That Recital contains the Answer, which Cassius made, when he was asked, why he succeeded much better in the Causes that he pleaded, than in the declamatory Speeches that he made on imaginary Subjects. It was much the Custom in those times to declaim on such Subjects. Seneca, who had asked Cassius this Question, relates what was answered him. Cassius made fine Remarks upon it, which I advise you to read in the Original. I content myself to copy something of Seneca's Preamble. We read there, that sometimes an Orator, who made himself admired at the Bar, miscarried in the particular Exercises of Declamations, and that no one was more subject to this Inequality than Cassius Severus. In nullo hoc fiebat notabilius (75). To this purpose, Seneca gives us the Elogy of That Orator's Eloquence, and describes the Character of it. Nothing was wanting in him, adds he, of what serves towards declaiming well. His Words were chosen; his Style was full and lively, and contained more Thoughts than Words; and yet Cassius, in declaiming, remained below himself, and below many others. 'Omnia habebat, quæ illum ut bene declamaret, instruerent: phrasim nec vulgarem, nec sordidam, sed lectam: genus dicendi non remissum aut languidum, sed ardens & cogitatum: nec lentas, nec vacuas explicationes, sed plus sensus quam verborum habentes: diligentiam, maximum etiam mediocris ingenii subsidium. Tamen non tantum infra se cum declamaret, sed etiam infra multos erat. Itaque raro declamabat, & non nisi ab amicis coactus (76).' Note, that his Eloquence appeared finer to his Auditors, than to his Readers; what he published did not answer the Admiration he had acquired; there was a greater Disproportion in it, than that which reigns commonly between the Success of a recited Speech, and the Success of a published Speech. 'Non est, quod illum ex his quæ edidit æstimetis. Sunt quidem & hæc quibusdam grata. Verum eloquentia ejus longe major erat quam lectio. Non hoc ea portione illi accidit qua omnibus fere, quibus majori commendationi est audiri quam legi, sed in illo longe majus discrimen est (77).'

so alike, that, when seen together, they could not be distinguished, but by their Dress. I wonder Solinus forgot to paraphrase the Circumstance, which

Pliny had mentioned, which is, that this Resemblance was objected to Cassius. If he had paraphrased it, he would have told us perhaps, that the Jesters pretended that there had been private Gal-lantries in the Case, which occasioned those two Men to resemble each other. How do we know, but that it was said, that they were like each other in Humour, and that the one was no less a Gladiator at the Bar, than the other in the Amphitheatre?

CASSIUS CHÆREA, chief of the Conspiracy, that destroyed Caligula, was Captain of the Guards [A]. He had served as a Captain in the Legions, which mutinied in Germany, a little before the Death of Augustus (a). Upon that Occasion, he made his way, Sword in Hand, through the Soldiers, who abused their Captains. He was a Man of Courage and Integrity (b), and who did not execute Caligula's severe Orders without Repugnancy. The Compassion, which he had for the poor People, was the reason that he did not gather the Money of the Tributes and Imposts (c) with all the Forwardness, that the Emperor required; for he had a Commission for it. This Humanity passed for want of Courage with Caligula: That cruel Tyrant insulted and reproached his Captain of the Guards insufferably; he never gave him the Word without chusing a Term, which was a severe Raillery on a soft and effeminate Life [B]; and this did not fail to make the Officers, and the Soldiers, to whom Cassius was to give the Word, laugh (d). Provoked to see himself the Object of his Master's Raillery, and the Jest of his Regiment, he formed the Plan of a Conspiracy; he made choice of Accomplices;
he encouraged them when there was occasion for it; in a Word, he managed the Plot so well, that it was executed by the Death of Caligula (e). He always reserved to himself the Advantage of giving him the first Blow [C]. Some say, that he gave him a great Blow with his Sword behind in the Neck; others, that, looking him in the Face, he cut off his Jaw-bone (f). After this Execution (g) he fled to the House of Germanicus (h), and, hearing that the Senate was pleased with his Conduct, he shewed himself publicly. One of the Consuls made a long Speech on Liberty, and concluded, that the Conspirators, and chiefly Chærea, ought to be raised to the greatest Honours. Chærea went to ask the Word from the Consuls; they gave him the Word Liberty; he brought it to the Cohorts, who obeyed the Senate; and, as he was All in that Party, he sent a Tribune, whose Name was Lupus, to kill Cæsonia, the Wife of Caligula, with their Daughters (i).
In the mean time, Claudius was saluted Emperor in the Camp of the Pretorian Cohorts, and the Senate was forced to approve this Election, whether they would or not. The new Emperor did not fail to cause Chærea to be punished [D], who suffered Death with great Constancy (k).

[A] He was Captain of the Guards. Seneca calls him in general Tribunus Militum (1): but Suetonius is more exact; he says, 'Primas sibi partes
' Cassius Chærea Tribunus cohortis Prætoris depo-
' poscit (2). --- Chærea, Tribune of the Præto-
' rian Cohort, claimed the Preference.' The learned Dr Bentley, in the Eighty first Page of his Notes on the Chronicle of Malala, gives our Cassius the Character of Tribune of the People. It is a small Mistake, which cannot prejudice the astonishing Erudition of That Author.

[B] Caligula never gave him the Word, without choosing a Term, which was a severe Raillery on an effeminate Life. See Josephus, who speaks very amply of all this (3). Suetonius expresses himself thus. 'Quem (Cassium Chæream) Caius fe' niorem jam ut mollem & effeminatum denotare
' omni probro consuevit, & modo signum petenti
' Priapum aut Venerem dare, modo ex aliqua causa
' agenti gratias osculandam manum offerre formatam

' Man, and sometimes, when he demanded the Word,
' would give him Priapus or Venus; sometimes,
' when he thanked the Emperor on some Account,
' he would offer him his Hand to kiss, forming and ' moving it after an obscene manner.' Seneca says very near the same thing; but he adds, that Chærea gave some cause for these Jest by his broken and effeminate Voice, and that he did not seem to be the Man he shewed himself afterwards, when he gave Caligula such a hard Blow. 'Chærea tri-
' buno militum sermo non pro manu erat, langu-
' dior sono & infractione voce suspectior. Huic Caius bune of the Soldiers, had a Voice, not answerable to his Courage, but broken and effeminate. Ca-ligula, when he demanded the Word, gave him sometimes Priapus, sometimes Venus; reproaching him, as a Soldier, with Effeminacy, several ways.

This the Emperor did, though himself sunk in Luxury and Effeminacy. He obliged Chærea, therefore, to use the Sword, that he might have no occasion of often demanding the Word. He was the chief Conspirator; He it was, who, at one Blow, struck off the Emperor's Head; many Swords afterwards rushed on him, in revenge for public and private Injuries; but Chærea first appeared the Man, he was little thought to be.

giving him the first Blow. See Suetonius in the Remark [A]. Mr de Tillemont (6) has not considered Seneca's Expressions maturely enough: He will have it, that Seneca has said, that Chærea split Caligula's Head in the middle with one Blow; It is not the sense of these Words, cervicem medium uno ictu decedit, or as some read, disceidit. Mr de Tillemont is mistaken in another thing (7): he says, that Cornelius Sabinus, as some say, struck off Caligula's Jawbone with his Sword. Suetonius, whom he quotes, attributes that Blow to Chærea, according to some.

other side, that it was a Perfidy, and ought to be punished for an Example to those who should dare to attempt upon the Life of Emperors (8). Suetonius pretends, that the Conspirators, who were put to death, were punished partly for an Example, and partly because to the Death of Caligula they would have added That of his Successor Claudius: Exempli simul causa & quod suam quoque eadem depoposcisse cognoverat (9). Dio deserves to be heard. Claudius, says he (10), rejoiced at the Death of Caligula; yet he caused Chærea to be put to death: he did not think that he owed any Thanks for being raised to the Throne by means of this Conspiracy; but he was angry with him, who dared to lay Hands on an Emperor, and thought at a Distance on his own Safety. The Politics of Princes have something that is capricious; they do their Endeavour to debauch each others Subjects; they give Retreat to Conspirators; they protect Rebels; and they do not see, that it is a fair Lesson of Revolt for their own Subjects, and a near Hope of Relief. This Extravagance proceeds from thinking only on the present; for, if they considered the Consequences, a Prince would never contribute a Penny, nor a Word, in favour of Rebellions.

CASTALIO (SEBASTIAN), born in the Country of the Allobroges [A], in the Year 1515, deserves a good Place among Authors [B]. The chief of his Works is a Latin and French Translation of the Scripture. It is very variously spoken of; some blame it much, others speak very well of it [C]. He acquired the Esteem and Friendship of Calvin, during his Abode at Strasbourg, in the Year 1540, and 1541; and he lodged also some Days with him (a). Calvin procured a place of Teacher in the College of Geneva for him, or rather exhorted him powerfully to accept it (b). Castalio, having exercised it near three Years, was compelled

(a) See Remark [H].

[A] He was born in the Country of the Allobroges. I have been forced to make use of this general Expression, because I could not discover any thing more particular. The Epithet of Allobrox is given him in his Epitaph. It may equally signify, that he was either of Dauphiné or Savoie. Mr Allard is of the first Opinion (1); but he builds on an Author, who did not say what he makes him say: for these Words of Sammartbanus, 'Ex asperis & salebrosis Allobrogum montibus humilis ortus fortuna' (2). — Born, of mean Parents, in 'the rugged Mountains of the Allobroges;' do not signify, that he was born in the Mountains of Dauphiné. La Croix du Maine makes Castalio a Native of Savoie (3). Dr Spon (4) and Mr Leti (5) make him a Native of Cbatillon in Bresse.

[B] He deserves a good place among Authors. His Works would be very considerable by their Quality and their Number, though it should not be known, that he lived but Forty eight Years. He made it appear, that he was skilled in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He caused four Books of Dialogues to be printed at Basil, in the Year 1545, which contained the chief Histories of the Bible in fine Latin, that Youth might form themselves by them both to Piety and Latinity together. They were reprinted in the Year 1548, and since with Corrections and Additions in the Year 1551 (6). These three Editions have been followed by divers others (7). In 1546, he published the Translation which he had made (8) of the Sybilline Verses with Notes, and of the Books of Moses (9). This was followed, in 1547, by his Latin Translation of the Psalms of David, and by all the other Songs in the Scripture. In 1548, he published a Greek Poem on the Life of John the Baptist, and a Latin Poem, which is a Paraphrase on the Prophet Jonas. I omit his Translation of some Parts of Homer, and of some Books of Xenophon, and St Cyril (10); I shall speak in the following Remark of the most important of his Works. Let us add here only, that he put several Italian Treatises of the famous Ocbinus into Latin, and particularly the thirty Dialogues, some of which seemed to favour Polygamy. Martin Ruarus was in the wrong to take it ill, that Calovius attributed the Translation of those Dialogues to Castalio. 'Scribis Castellionem XXX. Ochini dialogos in Latinam linguam transulisse. Id ego utut mihi dubium, cum nonnisi à Castellionis inimicis mera suspicio ductis affirmatum videam, in medio tamen relinquam' (11). — You write, that Castalio has translated the thirty Dialogues of Occhinus into Latin. Though I doubt of the Truth of this, since I see it affirmed only by the Enemies of Castalio, and upon mere Suspicion, yet I will leave it undetermined. But he is not in the wrong to reprimand him for having reported, that Laelius Socinus published it under the Name of Felix Turpio. It is certain that this false Name does not appear in That Work, and that Occhinus's true Name appears in it. Let it not be said, that Bullinger observes, that Occhinus caused it to be printed by an Italian, his Friend (12); for That Italian is no other than Peter Perna a Printer at Basil, who put his Name at the end of the Book according to custom. How could Laelius Socinus, who died in the Year 1562, cause a Book to be printed, which was not in the Press before 1563? Calovius's Error proceeded from this, viz. that there are certain Dialogues of Castalio, to which Faustus Socinus, who published them, put a Preface, under the Name of Felix Turpio Urbevotanus (13). Castalio is the Author, and not the Translator, of these Dialogues: They treat of Predestination, Election, Free-Will, and Faith, and were printed with some other Pieces of the same Author (14), in the Year 1578. Ruarus says, that it was at Basil: if it be so, the Title was falsified; for it bears Aresdorstii per Theophil. Philadelph.

I shall mention here and there some other Writings of Castalio, in the Remarks of this Article. I leave the Curious to examine if he be not the Author of the Latin Translation of some Treatises of St Chrysostom, and of St Cyril, of which the Epitome of Gesner speaks, under the Word Johannes Theophilus (15). It is a feigned Name, which our Author gave himself before a Translation (16): It is thought that he took the feigned Name of Martinus Bellius in another Work. I have spoken of it more than once (17); but without saying, that he denied, before the Ministers of Basil, who summoned him to appear, that he was the Author of that Compilation. Apellatus coram Basilienfis Ecclesiæ Ministris Bellii Farraginem — falso ejurasti (18). It is Beza, who reproached him with it, and who adds, that it was translated into French, and printed in that Language at Lyons, where Castalio's Brother had brought the Manuscript. Our Author sets forth some very particular Opinions in the Work, which he entitled Moses Latinus (19), as, that the Bodies of Malefactors should not be left on the Gibbet, nor those that steal be punished with Death, and that it would be better to re-establish the ancient Custom of having Slaves. His foundation was, That the Political Laws of Moses oblige all Nations (20). His Notes on the Epistle to the Romans were condemned by the Church of Basil, because they opposed the Doctrine of Predestination, and of Efficacious Grace (21). Yet he procured the Sale of them in the said City, after they were translated into French (22).

Collegium instead of Synagoga. Vossius (24), and divers other learned Persons, censured him, with reason, for it. He is accused of having run into another Extreme in his French Translation (25), I mean, of making use of low and mean Terms. See here the Examples, which a Jesuit gives of them, after having criticized him, on the effeminate Expressions, and the frequent Diminutives, of the Latin Translation of the Song of Songs. 'He is yet more impudent in his French Translation; for he scoffs openly at the Holy Ghost in six or seven Places; as, when he should say a Jew, he says un Rongné, (one that is cut) that is to say, circumcisé: as when he translates the Words of St James, in the eleventh Chapter, superexaltat misericordia judicium; that is to say, says this sordid Fellow, La misericorde fait la figue au jugement: --- Mercy makes a mock of Judgment: as, when he speaks of David in the Seventy seventh Psalm, and translates his own Words, De post factantes acceptum eum, that is to say, says this true Swine-herd, Il le tira du cul d'une charrie. --- He took him from the Plough-Tail. In a Word, translating these Words of David in the Eighth Psalm, Ex ore infantium & lactantium percipisti laudem, he turns them, like a bad Turner, (though he was so by his Trade), Des petits morveux que sont à la mamelle, --- Snotty Children at the Breast (26).

Note, that it is false, that the Translation is such, as is reported in the two last Examples (27). Henry Stephens exclaimed no less than this Jesuit against Sebastian Castalio, Who studied, says he (28), the Language of the Beggars, or, at least, such as made the Readers laugh, instead of considering the Sense of the Passage. He cites, for Example, La misericorde fait la figue au jugement. This manner of translating seems to him the strangest kind of Blasphemy, of which he has spoken in that Chapter; and he adds, 'He has not only taken delight in Words used by Beggars, and in their manner of speaking, but has taken all kind of Liberties; calling her, whom the Husband keeps besides his Wife, a Back Woman (arriere Femme), as we say a Back Shop (arriere Boutique), whom the Latins have called Pellex, (borrowing the Word from the Greeks, who had also borrowed it from the Hebrews,) and using the Word Avant-peau instead of Prepuce; saying rongné instead of circumcisé, (circumcisé), and empellé instead of incircumcisé, (uncircumcisé). He transforms God also into a Monsieur de Rochefort. Briefly, there is not even To carouse (faire carous) that has not found place in this Translation. This is the new Invention that the Devil has found, in our Time, to infringe the Authority of the Holy and Sacred Word of God: who, of his Mercy, provided against it in good time, having permitted, that the Author of the said Translation (of whom a very good Opinion was had for some time) should condemn himself with his own Mouth, and make known by what Spirit he was led (29). Beza was not silent upon this: He maintained, that the Jargon of Poëtiou, the grossest of all the Jargons of France, may appear less barbarous than the Style of Castalio (30). Note, that Mr Simon affirms, that, in the French Translation of Castalio, is to be discovered the same Affectation of writing in an elegant and polished Style, as in the Latin Translation (31). He gives a Judgment of the latter, which, to take altogether, is glorious for Castalio (32). You will find some things of it in the Additions of Mr Tieffier (33). You will find there also, that Three learned Persons (34) have spoken of that Translation with Praise. One of them was so charmed with it, that, in praising of it, he felt a Poetical Rapture arising in him, which obliged him to add the Language of the Muses to his Prose, to represent his Admiration (35). Sir Thomas-Pope Blount has collected many Passages, some disadvantageous to Castalio, and others advantageous (36); I refer you thither, and add only, that he forgot the Praises, which Episcopus gave this Translator of the Scriptures (37), and the Invektive, which is in a Preface to the New Testament, printed at Geneva in the Year 1560 (38). We must not forget, that Castalio begun the Latin Translation at Geneva in the Year 1542, and that he finished it at Basil in the Year 1550: it was printed at Basil in the Year 1551. He dedicated it to Edward King of England. He gave a second Edition of it in the Year 1554, and another in the Year 1556. The Edition of 1573 is more esteemed than all the rest (39). The French Translation was dedicated to Henry the Second, and printed at Basil for John Hervagius in the Year 1555. As to the Disputes, which arose between Castalio and Beza, concerning the Translation of the Scripture, see the Author whom I quote (40). Let us not forget that he complained, That, having been the first that had made an exact Description of the Temple of Solomon, he was not only not thanked for it, but that, on the contrary, he was abused by those, who made use of his Labour. 'Nonnihil mirari se dicebat tuorum ingenitatem, qui cum subtilem effigiem Templi apud Ezechielem, in qua una exprimenda primus potissimum elaboraverat, furripuissent, non modo in suis Bibliis quibus eam inferabant non laudarent auctorem, cuius labore suas merces ornabant, sed etiam cum infinitis convitiis onerarent (41). It is Baudouin, who speaks thus to Theodorus Beza.

The Latin Bible of Castalio has lately been reprinted in Germany (42), and they have added to it Ejusdem (Castellionis) delineatio Reipublice Judaicae ex Josepho; nota prolixior in Caput ix. Epistola ad Romanos, nec non defensio versionis novi fœderis contra Tb. Bezaem.

I cannot forbear to impart a small Distrust, which I had, and the Effect it produced. That, which Beza, Henry Stephens, and Garasse, say of Castalio's French, made me judge, at first, that That Writer had treated the Scripture, as Scarron treated Virgil: but I thought afterwards, that they ought not to be believed on their Word, and that Passion might have made them amplify. In this Uncertainty, I took the French Bible of Castalio; I opened it in divers Places; I sought carefully for those burlesque Phrases, which they have reproached him so much with; I could find none of them except That of Faire la Figue: I could not find cul de la charrie, (Plough Tail), nor petits morveux, (snotty Children), that Father Garasse quotes. And I cannot sufficiently wonder at the Impudence of That Calumniator. It must be owned here, that there are unhappy Persons, who can never avoid the Strokes of Slander. If another than Castalio had made That Translation of the Scripture, they would not have complained so much against his Language. I add, that the Words Avant-peau, Rongné, &c. are not low and mean: they are as noble as those of Prepuce and Circumcisé. He who makes use of them is only blameable for a superfluous Innovation: His good Intention (43) does not justify him.

[D] He was compelled to leave his place of Teacher --- for having maintained some particular Opinions.] He was so vexed, that he could not make Calvin approve of the Impertinencies of his French Translations of the New Testament, that he began to spread some Errors, and to maintain, that the Song of Songs was an obscene Piece, which ought to be left out of the Canon of the Scriptures. He inveighed against the Ministers, who opposed his Intention. He was cited before the Senate, where he was heard, and declared convicted of Calumny, and he was commanded to leave the Town. Thus Beza reports the Matter. 'Indignatus quod suas ineptias in Gallica Novi Testamenti Versione Calvinus non probasset, eoque efferbuit, ut exotica quædam docere non contentus, palam etiam Canonicum Solomonis tanquam impuram & obscenam cantionem ex Canone expungi juberet, & repugnantes Ministros atrocissimis convitiis proscinderet. Id illi verò sibi non ferendum merito rati, hominem ad Senatum vocant: ubi pridie Calend. Junii patientissimè auditis, cognitaque causâ calumnie damnatus, ex urbe excedere jussus est (44). tained the Professorship of the Greek Tongue (c). He passed the remainder of his Life in that Place, and died there the Twenty ninth of December, 1563 (d). He was buried in the great Church at Basil, by the Care of three Polish Gentlemen, who had been his Disciples (e) [E], and who caused an honourable Epitaph to be put on his Tomb. He had the Misfortune to expose himself to the Indignation of Calvin, and of Beza, who loaded him with Reproaches. They persuaded themselves, that he deserved them, for having followed a relaxed Method in the Doctrine of Predestination, and for having disapproved of punishing Hetericks (f). The Latin Translation, which he made of some of Oecolampadius's Work, laid him under great Suspicions of Heterodoxy. He was also accused of favouring the Enthusiasts [F]. To judge of him by the Description that his Adversaries gave of him, he men malo & occulto veneno civitas vestra anno xlv homine ipso tanquam spuma expulso purgata est (45). — The same Year, Satan endeavoured to shake you and your Faith, by the means of Sebastian Castalio, a Man of pretended Piety; the Blow, tho' seemingly light, was a dangerous one: however your City was purged from the latent Poison in the Year 45, by speeing out, as it were, the Man himself. This Recital seems over-strained, when compared with an Attestation, which Calvin gave to This School Master of Geneva. It imports, that he laid down this Office voluntarily, that he had behaved himself so well in it, that he was judged fit to be a Pastor, and that nothing had hindered him from being promoted to that Office, but the particular Opinion he had concerning the Song of Songs, and the Article of the Descent of JESUS CHRIST into Hell; and, in short, that it is the only Reason why he left Geneva. Castalio speaks to Calvin in this manner: 'In eo testimonio tu testaris, mihi à vobis discedendi unam causam fuisse, discordiam illam de Canticò Canticorum, & de interpretatione tua capituli fidei de Christi descensu ad inferos. Tua verba sunt hæc: Hoc breviter testamur, talem fuisse à nobis habitum, ut nostro omnium consensu jam ad munus pastorale destinatus esset. Et in fine verba sunt hæc: Ne quis ergo aliud quippiam causa esse suspicetur, cur à nobis discedat Sebastianus, hoc quicumque venerit testatum esse volumus. Scholæ ministerio sponte se abdicavit. In eo ita se gesserat, ut sacro hoc ministerio dignum judicaretur. Quominus autem receptus fuerit, non aliqua vitæ macula, non impium aliquod in fidei nostræ capitulum dogma, sed hæc una, quam exposuimus causa obstitit (46). — In That Testimonial you testify, that the only reason of my leaving you, was, my different Notion of the Song of Songs, and of your Interpretation of the Article of Faith concerning the Descent of CHRIST into Hell. Your Words are as follows. We briefly attest this, that such was our Opinion of him, that, by common consent, he was designed for the Pastoral Office. And at the end are these Words. That no one therefore may suspect there was any other Cause, of Sebastian Castalio's leaving us, we certify this wherever he comes. He voluntarily resigned his place of Teacher in the School. He behaved himself so in it, that we judged him worthy of this sacred Charge. Nor was it any Blemish in his Life, or any impious Tenet, but the reason above-mentioned alone, which prevented his being admitted to it.' He declares, that he shewed this Attestation to divers Persons, and also to some Ministers. Consult Dr Spon, who does not say, that he was expelled the City, but only that he was deposed (47). See, below, my Remarks against Mr Teistler.

[F] He was buried in the great Church of Basil, by the care of Three Polish Gentlemen — his Disciples. I have learned this Particular in the Inscription of an Epigram at the End of his Sacred Dialogues (48). We find a much more memorable Particular in the Scaligerana: Castalio was laid in the Tomb of the Family of the Gryneus's; but a Professor of That Family made him be taken up again. This perhaps was the Reason, which made the Three Polish Gentlemen take care of Castalio's Funeral. See Scaliger's Judgment here. 'Si non cum affectu vel ignominia Simon Gryneus iussit Castalionem ex suo sepulchro educi & alibi sepeliri, nihil mali. Sunt qui nolunt alios in suo sepulchro sepeliri, sed in nostra religione non deberet fieri (49). — If Simon Gryneus did not order Castalio to be removed out of his Sepulchre, and buried elsewhere, out of Passion, or to disgrace his Memory, there was no harm in it. Some there are, who dislike that others should be buried in their Sepulchres; but under our Religion This should not be done.' He excuses and blames Gryneus's Action at the same time. He excuses it, if Passion did not produce it, and if there was a Temper used, which did not make the Memory of the deceased ignominious; and he blames him, since he pretends, that Protestants ought not to be so weak, as to fancy that others should not be buried in their Sepulchres. It is difficult to imagine, that Simon Gryneus was free from Passion in this Business, and that divers Considerations of humane Interest did not incline him to behave himself as he did. We shall see presently, that they had blackened Castalio like any Devil.

[F] He was accused of favouring the Enthusiasts. This is what Beza means, in censuring him for attempting to enervate the Authority of the Scripture, as not containing the Sublime Divinity, which St Paul taught, viva voce, his most knowing Disciples. 'Ut qui sua quadam in Sacrorum Bibliorum perversionem præfatione palam verbi divini satis peripicuum auctoritatem convellere studuisset, suisque in priorem ad Corinth. Epistolam adnotationibus, ut à verbo scripto tanquam imperfecto nos abduceret, disertè scripisset, Paulum quandam Theologiam, ea quam scriptis tradidisset reconditorem perfectos nescio quos suos discipulos docuisse (50). — As openly endeavouring, in a certain Preface on the Perversion of the sacred Books, to destroy the sufficiently evident Authority of the Divine Word; and as having expressly written, in his Notes on the first Epistle to the Corinthians, (to draw us off from the written Word, as imperfect,) That St Paul taught certain of his most knowing Disciples, a more sublime Doctrine, than what he had delivered in his Writings.' Scaliger said, that Castalio had imbibed divers Doctrines of the Anabaptists (51). Nothing contributed more to rank him among the Enthusiasts, than his Latin Translation of the Theologia Germanica: It is a Book full of Fanaticism, and which spoiled many Persons in the Netherlands. See here what Sainte Aldegonde wrote to Beza in the Year 1567. 'Est genus novum ἐνθουσιασῶν qui tum ex illa, quam noster, Theologia Germanica dudum à Castellione Latine reddita, tum ex Taulero deliro sanè Monacho, tum porro ex aliorum quorundam & veterum & recentiorum hæreticorum furoribus, eas consunt rhapsodias, quæ non jam superstitiosæ ac rudi plebeculæ, sed ipsi etiam viris, & mediocri eruditione, & non contemnenda pietatis specie præstantibus, ita vehementer arident, ut certatim omnes ad eorum libros quasi ad reconditum aliquem thesaurum accurrant. Omnia eorum deliramenta percerere, nimis foret longum, & ipse non potes pleraque ignorare, cui fuerit cum hujusmodi monitis (in quibus Castellionem ego non infimo loco posuerim) per æpe conficiendum (52). — There is a new kind of Enthusiasts, who, from the German Theology, translated into Latin by Castalio, from Taulerus a crazy Monk, and from the Ravings of other Heretics both Antient and Modern, patch together those Rhapsodies which are so very agreeable, not only to the superstitious and ignorant Vulgar, but to Men of moderate Learning, and no contemptible Piety, that they all press to the Books of these Men, as to some hidden Treasure. It would be tedious to reckon up all their wild Notions, nor can you be ignorant of most of them, who have often been obliged to encounter these Monsters, among whom I reckon Castalio not the least

'least considerable.' Beza was persuaded, that Castalio had translated that Book into Latin; yet he durst not affirm it in a public Work, before he had informed himself whether it could be possible to produce good Proofs of it, if Castalio should deny it. A wise Precaution, and which ought not to be neglected so often as it is. Let us see what he wrote to a Physician of Basil. 'Hoc amabo te rescribere, si quam fecero in mea responsione mentionem Bellii, & Theologiae Germanicae, & ille se eorum librorum authorum inficietur, num id possum ita securè, affirmare, ut si necesse fuerit, testibus etiam aut idoneis argumentis convinci possit. Nam de re ipsa, id est, quin revera libros illos ac praesertim praefationem Bellianam ediderit, non dubito: sed videndum nobis est ut non tantum detegatur istuc, verum etiam convincatur, ut tandem omnes norint quae sit sancti istius viri conscientia (53). — I desire

'you would inform me in your Answer, whether, if I should mention Bellius, and the German Theology, in my Reply, and He should deny that he is the Author of those Books, there is sufficient Evidence and Arguments to confute him: for as to the Fact, that is whether he really published those Books, especially the Preface to Bellius, I have no doubt of the truth of it; however we must be careful not only to detect him, but to prove the Fact, that the World may know the Conscience of this Holy Man.'

Hoornbeek did not understand the whole Sense of these Words (54): He did not see, that Beza intended to speak of Castalio as the Author of the Latin Translation, and not as the Author of the Work itself, intitled Theologia Germanica. He adds, that this Work was also translated into Latin, and printed at Antwerp, in the Year 1558, under the Name of John Theophilus. He had already said, that the Dutch Translation was very imprudently praised by Martin Luther. He was ignorant, that the First Edition of the Latin Translation is of Basil 1557. The Epitome of Gesner's Bibliothèque, informing us of this, remarks that Castalio is he, who translated that Work under the Name of Joannes Theophilus (55). Dr Spon makes him Author of the Work it self, and is mistaken: He wrote, says he (56), another Book entituled Theologia Germanica, and a Treatise of the Old and New Man. Mr Jurieu was deceived much after the same manner, since he has said that John Theophilus is the Author of a Book entituled Theologia Germanica (57). See here another Mistake of Dr Spon: He did not know, that the Treatise of the Old and New Man is only the French Translation, which Castalio made of the Theologia Germanica. This is what we find in La Croix du Maine (58), who was otherwise ignorant, that That Work in Latin is but a Translation. Note that Castalio denied, before the Ministers of Basil, that he had any Share in that Book (59).

[G] To judge of him by the Description his Adversaries gave of him, he must be taken — for a very wicked Man. He composed an Apology in the Year 1558, wherein he complains of two of Calvin's Writings by name (60); one was intitled, Answers to certain Calumnies, Blaphemies, &c. and appeared in the Year 1557. The Title of the other was Calumniæ Nebulonis ejusdam, &c. and was printed the Year following. He maintains, that he never saw the two Works, which Calvin ascribed to him (61). He says (62); 'Vocas me subinde in Gallico libello blasphemum calumniatorem, malignum, canem latrantem, plenum ignorantiae & bestialitatis, plenum impudentiae, impotorem, sacrarum literarum impurum corruptorem, Dei proflus derisorem, omnis religionis contemptorem, impudentem, impurum canem, impium, obscenum, torti perverisque ingenii, vagum, balatronem. Nebulonem vero (sic enim interpretor Brouillon) appellas oſties, & haec omnia longe copiosius, quam à me recententur, facis in libello duorum foliorum, & quidem perparvorum. De Latino vero, quid minus opus est? Titulus est: Calumniæ Nebulonis. Finis est: Compelcat te Deus, Satan: media sunt ejusdem coloris. — In a French Treatise, you load me with the opprobrious Names of Blasphemous Calumniator, Malignant, Barking Dog, full of Ignorance and Bestiality, full of Impudence, an Impostor, an Impure

Corrupter of the sacred Writings, a Mock of Gods and Despiser of all Religion, an Impudent Fellow, a Filthy Dog, an Impious Wretch, Obscene, of a distorted and perverse Mind, a Vagabond, and a Rascal. You call me Knave (for so I interpret Brouillon) eight times; and all these you bestow more plentifully upon me, than I reckon up, in a little Piece of two Leaves, and these very small. As for your Latin Work, it is sufficient to observe, that it is intitled, Calumniæ Nebulonis. — The Calumnies of a Knave: It ends with, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan: The Middle is in the same Strain. He not only represents to him what the Gospel pronounces against him, who wrongs his Brother, but also what Calvin himself had written in the Christian Life. 'Nihilne te movet (ut cætera taceam), tui ipsius libellus ille, quem scripsisti de Vita Hominis Christiani? Qui libellus ita sancta, ita pia precepta continet, ut nuper praesente me dixerit quidam, operæ pretium esse, ut tibi scribat aliquis Epistolam, in qua te interroget, utrum fieri possit, ut horum duorum libellorum videlicet, Vita Hominis Christiani, & Calumniæ Nebulonis, &c. idem sit Author (63). — To say nothing of other things, have you no regard to your own Book, Of the Life of a Christian? A Book, so full of holy and pious Precepts, that a certain Person said lately in my Presence, that it was worth while to write a Letter to you, and ask you, whether the same Person could possibly be Author of the two Books, Of a Christian's Life, and The Calumnies of a Knave.' He justified himself particularly from the Crime of Theft, as we shall see below, and from that of Perfidiousness, Cruelty, and Blaphemy. After having set down Calvin's Words, he says to him; 'Hæc accusationis tuæ summa est, in qua me insimulas superbiæ, perfidiæ, inhumanitatis, ingratiſtudinis, fraudulentiae, impudentiae, scurrilitatis, blasphemiae, denique impietatis (64). — This is the Sum of your Accusation, in which you charge me with Pride, Perfidy, Inhumanity, Ingratitude, Knavery, Impudence, Scurrility, Blaphemy, and Impiety.' If you knew me to be such, when I lived with you, why did you almost compel me to teach in the College of Geneva? Can any one in Conscience commit the Education of Children to such a Man? 'Si jam tum talem cognovisti quæro ex te, qua conscientia me postea istuc ludo literario praefeceritis, & multum reculantem pertraxeritis, tu & una duo tui summi amici, & summæ in Sabaudia auctoritatis viri concionatores. Quæso te, quorum hominum est pueris institutendis præficere hominem, quem tu sceleratum esse scires, idque in ea urbe, quam vos sanctam etiam impressis libris appellatis (65)?' Why did you give me a Testimonial of a good Life, after I had taught in that School about three Years? Whereupon he alleges the Words, which you have read in the Remark [D] (66). You cannot say, continues he (67), that you did not know me to be such till after that time; for, besides that you plainly insinuate the very contrary, you would be the most stupid of all Men, if, while I lived with you, and taught in the School of Geneva, I had been such as you describe me to be, and in the mean time you should not have perceived it. He owns that he was not free from Vanity (68), and reports an Effect of it, which I shall mention hereafter (69): He acknowledges also, that he loved a merry Humour, but not in Matters of Religion. He says (70); I have always censured those, who bantered in these Matters; two of your best Friends know it well. One of them, having published a merry Book, intitled Zoograpbia, I went to give him my Advice, and not finding him, I gave it him by a third Person. But he was so far from profiting by it, that he published a second Writing of the same Nature, entituled Passavantius, and has hated me mortally ever since. The other is a Person, to whom I am much obliged; he has entertained me in his House; I knew him to be pious: I wrote to him, that he would do well not to publish any more facetious Books on holy Subjects: He was not angry at my Advice, as the other was. Note, that he observes (71), that Calvin had lished. I do not pretend, that they ought to be looked upon as a faithful Description of his Enemies; it will suffice me that they be taken for a general Image of the Corruption of Nature, and for a Subject of Reflexions. Many other Persons agree in praising him for his good Morals [H]. What he answered, when he was prefixed a Preface to a Piece of this nature, composed by one of those two Authors.

Upon Calvin's upbraiding him with having entertained him in his House (72), this is his Answer. He acknowledges, that he lodged with him at Strasbourg, but that, at the Week's End, he went away, to make room for Mademoiselle du Verger, who would have Lodgings in Calvin's House for herself, and her Son, and her Son's Servant (73). You desired me civilly to yield my Chamber to That Servant; I did so, and paid you for my Diet. Some time after I was desired, by your Folks, to come and look after your Servant, my Countryman, who was sick. I went, and assisted him 'till his Death, that is to say, for seven Days; and I lived on your Bread, but have not lodged with you since that time (74). He relates some Services he did to Calvin's Family, whilst he went to the Diet of Ratisbon; and concludes, that they could not lay any Ingratitude, or Treachery, to his Charge.

The Appendix to his Apology is remarkable. Calvin and Beza are upbraided in it for having too eagerly picked up the flying News, which was spread concerning their Enemies, and inserting it, with all Speed, in the first Book they published. You hate me, said he to them, and therefore you easily believe all the Ill, that is said of me: and either do not believe, or turn the Good you hear of me to a bad Sense. 'Accedit in vobis ad levitatem illam capitale odium mei: quo fit, ut de me quicquid mali dicitur, id, quia vultis, facillime credatis: facile enim (inquit idem Cæsar) credunt homines quæ volunt. Rursumque si quid boni dicitur, id vel non credatis, vel maligna interpretatione depravetis (75).' Your Emisaries relate or write to you all the Fables that please your Palate; you take your Measures according to their News, whereby you expose yourselves, early or late, to Confusion. 'Talia de me jactant levissimi homines, & ea vobis veluti conducti, vel referunt, vel scribunt, quia vos talia libenter audire sciunt. Atque ita ineunt à vobis certe non honesta mercede gratiam. Vos hisce rumoribus, atque auditionibus, permoti de re non levi, leve consilium initis; auditiones illas etiam monumentis literarum mandatis: quorum vos si non è vestigio, at certe aliquando pœnitere necesse erit, cum incertis rumoribus servietis, & plerique ad voluntatem vestram ficta respondeant (76).' If your Emisaries deceive you, you also deceive them in your turn; they hear an hundred false Reports from you, which they spread up and down (77). You have endeavoured to make me odious to all the World, and for that end you have represented me as a dangerous Cabbalist, who had Emisaries in the Country and City, at the Gates of the Town, and in Taverns. Some Frenchmen, who came hither (78) from Strasbourg with that formidable Idea, which you give of my Person, were much surprized to find me in Want, and at quiet, and expressed a great Indignation against the Authors of so many Fables. 'Patescunt artes, conatusque vestri, sicuti nuper patere quibusdam juvenibus Gallis, qui huc ab Argentina profecti sic habebant aures imbutas istis de me rumoribus, ut me putarent passim emisarios habere non solum in diversis, verum etiam ruri, & in portis urbis. Denique eam de me opinionem imaginemque animo conceperant, ut me arbitrentur magnum aliquem, & opibus, atque autoritate potentem virum, quasque satellium caterva stipatum, cujus insidias esset effugere difficile. Ubi deinde nihil tale deprehenderunt, contraque homuncionem viderunt, pauperem, vilem, abjectum, quietum, nihil molientem, nullius nec splendoris, nec auctoritatis, mirati sunt non absque stomacho illa mendacia, necumque tandem congressi, tam ab illis abhorruerunt, mihiq; adhæserunt, quam antè cognitam veritatem à me abhorrentes illis adhæserant (79).' You stir up the Magistrates against me, and, not being able to bring them to satisfy your Passion, you make use of all kind of Arts to take away my Reputation, and hinder my Writings from being read. You publish Books against me; and you endeavour to obtain, that I may not be permitted to answer you (80). You forbid your People to speak to me, and, if any of them venture to do it, they become suspected by you, and you become their Enemies. This is the reason, that many, who would come to see me, dare not. 'Quoniam illi (Magistratus) vestræ cupiditati vel non obsequuntur, vel nondum obsequuntur, vos (quod proximum est) me toto orbe quibuscunque modis fieri potest certatim infamatis: mea scripta (ut papam possis agnoscere) ne legantur pro virili prohibetis: ipsi contra scribitis, mihi ne respondere permittatur, quoad ejus fieri potest, cavetur. Vestris ne me conveniant vetatis, si qui convenerint plerumque suspectos habetis, & abhorretis. Quo metu fit, ut multi me quamvis cupientes convenire non audeant, id quod nonnulli, & mihi, & aliis confessi sunt (81).' You cover your Hated under the fair Pretence of the Love of Truth, and you abuse your Eloquence and Wit, to make your Accusations probable to the People, which is not difficult, nothing being so good but what may be poisoned, nor any thing so ugly, but what may be covered with Paint. 'Interea nomine studii tuendæ veritatis odium vestrum prætexitis: veram ejus causam (quippe vobis parum honestam) dissimulatis, causamque vestram apud imperitos probabilem redditis ea arte, quæ docet de quavis re proposita probabiliter disputare in utranque partem. Qua quidem arte sic instructi estis, (atque utinam tam præclaris ingeniis, vobisque divinitus longè alios ad usus concessis, non abuteremini) ut vix quicquam vel tam bene dici, aut fieri possit, quin id interpretando deformare, vel tam male quin fucare possitis, præsertim judice mundo, apud quem valere maledicta quid mirum, cum nullum sit ipsi suavius pabulum (82).' What remains of the Appendix contains good Admonitions; and it must be granted, that Castalio, how heretical soever he may be accounted, hath in his Writings given more signal Examples of Moderation, than the Orthodox, who opposed him.

Father Garasse sets forth, that Calvin says of Castalio, that, when he drank, he was used to say, before he tasted the Wine, Tu quis es? Then having tasted it, if it was pretty good, or indifferent, he answered, Ego sum qui sum; But, if it was excellent, he answered, Hic est Filius Dei vivi (83). I do not believe that Calvin said this.

[H] A great number of Persons agree in praising him for his good Morals.] There appeared a great Plainness in him, and a very great Aversion to Ostentation (84). Beza agrees to the Fact, tho' he gives the worst turn to it he possibly can (85); but it must be remembered that he speaks as an Enemy. During the Disputes about Arminianism, they reprinted, in Holland, the Consilium ad vocatam Galliam anno 1567, datum per Sebastianum Castalionem, ubi causæ præsentis tum belli simulque medicina ejus indigitantur, ac præsertim diligenter examinatur ac perpenditur an conscientis vis sit adhibenda. — Advice to France laid waste, in the Year 1567, given by Sebastian Castalio, in which the Causes of the present War, and at the same time the Remedy, are pointed out, and in which it is particularly examined, whether Consciences are to be forced. Theodorus Bomius, who procured that new Edition, was criticized for it by the Anti-Remonstrants. They blamed him for having taken Castalio's sinking Bones out of the Grave again (86). He answered, that That Man deserved all manner of Praise; he alleged the honourable Testimony, which the University of Basel gave him; he cited Melancthon's Letters, &c. (87). Bomius (in Fe-redario suo edito anno 1617, p. 20.) adversario huic respondens, mirifice Castalionem commendat: honorificum de eo citat testimonium Universitatis Basileensis, in qua Theologiæ (88) Professorem

Let us state, by the way, the Fault that crept into the Title of the Book which Bemius caused to be re-printed. They have wrongfully put the Year 1567 to it. I think they ought to have made it 1562. For this Writer, dying in the Year 1563, could not give That Advice to desolate France, but on the Occasion of the first Civil War of Religion. La Croix du Maine observes, that he is made the Author of a Book entitled Advice to desolate France (95). The first Edition is not of the Year 1578, as the Author (96) whom I quote affirms; it preceded the Peace made in the Year 1563. Boudouin, in his Answer to Beza (97), mentioned this Advice, as a Book printed about the time that Antony, King of Navarre, died.

Persons say, that he was a Minister; but there is some Reason to believe, that they do not speak the Truth (i). I shall not have many things to say against Mr Moreri, nor against Mr Varillas, nor against Mr Teissier [L]. A Remark must be made on the Name

* xit ad extremam senectam, sed in summa paupere, & pene inopia, additus modico gurgustio, postquam Tusculana villa creditoribus cesserat, ut auctor est Bibaculus:

*Si quis forte mei domum Catonis, Depictas minio affulas, & illos
Custodis videt tortulos Priapi,
Miratur quibus ille disciplinis
Tantam sit sapientiam affecutus,
Quem tres cauliculi, & selibra farris, Racemi duo, tegula sub una Ad summam prope nutriant senectam.*

* Et idem rursus:

*Catonis modo, Galle, Tusculanum,
Tota creditor urbe venditabat.
Mirati sumus unicum magistrum,
Summum grammaticum, optimum poetam,
Omnes solvere posse quæstiones,
Unum difficile expedire nomen.
En cor Zenodoti, en jecur Cratetis.*

* — He lived to an extreme Old-Age, but in the utmost Poverty, and almost in a starving Condition, biding himself in a little Cottage, after he had left Tusculum for Debt; as Bibaculus informs us:

"Whoever happens to visit the Habitation of my Friend Cato, and sees his homely Hut, and little Garden, cannot help wondering by what Discipline he became such a Philosopher, as to live, to extreme Old-Age, in a little Hut, on three Roots, half a Pound of Bread, and two Clusters of Grapes.

* And again,

"Cato's Creditors, Gallus, lately exposed to sale his Estate at Tusculum. We were surprized, that so great a Philosopher, Grammarian, and Poet, who could solve all Questions, could not extricate himself from one Debt. Behold, another Zenodotus, and another Crates!

(100) Montaigne's Essays, Book I, chap. xxxiv, p. 353.

However, Montaigne's Words deserve to be quoted: He says (109): "I hear, with a great shame to our Age, that, in our sight, two most excellent Persons in Learning are dead for want of having wherewith to fill their Bellies; Lilius Gregorius Giraldus in Italy, and Sebastianus Castilio in Germany: And I believe there are a thousand Men, who would have invited them upon advantageous Conditions, or assisted them where they were, if they had known it. The World is not so generally corrupted, but that I know a Man, who could with heartily, that the Means, his Friends have left him, might be employed, as long as Fortune would let him keep them, in sheltering from Necessity remarkable Persons, who are in some kind of Esteem, whom Misfortune sometimes extremely oppresses, and would put them at least in such a Condition, that it should only be for want of just thinking if they were not contented." Two Reasons have engaged me to copy this Passage; the one is taken from the Solidity of the Reflexion, which accompanies this curious Fact; the other, because most of my Readers, who should desire to know what Montaigne has said, would find it difficult to satisfy themselves; for the alphabetical Table of his Essays would not assist them in finding this Place; and he is not an Author, who, by the Title of his Chapters, or the Connexion of Matters, facilitates the Search of what one remembers to have read in his Essays. Local Memory knows not what to stick to in That Writer: for which Reason the Table of Matters ought to have been better than it is. Castilio should have been there under his Name, or at least under the learned Poor, or the Poverty of some learned Persons, &c. How ill is That Table made! and how many others are like it!

[L] I have but little to say against Mr Moreri, or against Mr Varillas, or against Mr Teissier.] The first pretends, without any proof, that Castilio was of the Mountains of Dauphiné (110). These words: Beza himself, who was of his Party, owns that it (111) was full of Faults; and he adds, that Castilio believed it was indifferent to follow any Religion one had a Mind to: these words, I say, are very absurd; for it is most evident, that Beza was never of the same Party with those, who hold the Indifference of Religions. Moreover, is it not visible, that, having made a Translation of the New Testament, he was Castilio's Rival; and that, for that reason, no one was so much disposed, as he, to find Faults in the Translation of the latter? Add to this, that he espoused Calvin's Quarrels, who was Castilio's great Enemy, before the Bible of the latter was published. Mr Moreri perfectly resembles those, who should say, The Translation of the New Testament by Messieurs of Port-Royal is not good: Father Bouhours himself (112), who is of their Party, owns that it is full of Faults. Lastly, it cannot be said, without gross Ignorance, that Beza believed, that Castilio was of the Reformed Religion. I do not find, in the Book quoted by Mr Moreri (113), that the Indifference of Religions was the Heresy, which Beza imputes to Castilio.

I shall begin my Criticisms on Varillas with this, since he assures us, that Beza says, that Castilio left Geneva, because he held all Religions to be indifferent (114). There is more likelihood, continues he, that his Style, which without Comparison was more florid than that of Calvin, made him jealous. Here are two Faults; for it is false, that Castilio equalled Calvin in good Latin: all those, who have any knowledge in Style, will readily grant it me. In the second place, Castilio had not yet shewed the Ornaments of his Pen, when he left Geneva. He translated the Scripture with so much nicety, that the Poet appears almost every where in his Style, and so abundantly, that it often disgusts, instead of pleasing. This Proposition of Varillas is not true; and, if it were, this would not be so: Nevertheless, it must be owned in recompence, that no other Translation comes near it, for the Beauty, and the Perspicuity of it (115). Is not a Man, who makes these two Judgments of one Translation, an ingenious Critic? He seems to say in his Argument on the Song of Songs, that it contains not the mystical Love of JESUS CHRIST and his Church, but the infamous Amours of Solomon and one of his Mistresses (116). I have fully verified that these words are false; I have not found any Argument on the Song of Songs in Castilio's French, or Latin Bible (117).

Mr Teissier (118) was in the wrong to say, that our Author called himself always Castilio after the Adventure, which I shall mention by and by. He was, continues he, first of all a Minister at Geneva. Calvin's Attestation, alledged above (119), refutes this invincibly, and convicts Beza of not having strictly followed the Laws of History, which require, that no Obscurity be left in a Recital. He relates, that, the City of Geneva being afflicted with the Plague in the Year 1542, those who were infected with the Distemper wanted a Pastor to comfort them (120). Most of them feared the Contagion; but Calvin, Castilio, and Blanchet, offered themselves. The chance fell on Castilio, who nevertheless impudently rejected that Employ (121). It is natural to conclude from these words, that he was one of the Ministers of Geneva; so that they are not so clear as they ought to be. The Word Comforter ought to have been put instead of Pastor, which Beza makes use of, and then the Reader would have had no reason to think, that Castilio was a Minister; for, though a Person be not so yet, he may nevertheless offer himself to comfort the infected. We see by the alledged Attestation, that he aspired to the Ministry, and that he would have been admitted to it, if he had not held certain Opinions. I believe, with Dr Spon, that he had preached sometimes (122); but this proves only, that he aspired to the Office of a Pastor. I conclude, that the Jesuit Garasse is deceived as often as he called him Minister. He has often done it, and always

Name of Castalio [M]. I could make another on the Imprudence of this learned Man, but shall not. If he had kept within the Bounds of his Profession, he would have done greater Services, than he did, to the Commonwealth of Learning, as Peter Ramus has well observed [N], and would have secured himself from many Vexations. Instead of this, he set up for a Mystic, and a Devotee, and concerned himself with the most nice and obscure Questions of Divinity. He ought to have left them to those, to whom, by their Office, they belonged; or, if he must by all means intrude into this Commerce, he should have applied Aesop's Advice to himself (k). I have heard Persons, who passed for wise Men, say, that, for want of taking his Measures agreeable to that Advice, he had done what was said of the last Duke of Burgundy concerning his Irruption into Germany (l).

ways with gross Abuses. Here is an Example of it: 'We understand, that Sebastian Castalio, who was a Carpenter by Trade (123), has truly hacked and hewed the Holy Scripture, if his Daughters have spun it: This wretched Man, of a very mechanic and servile Mind, worthy to be a Minister, as he was in effect, besides his Carpenter's Trade, has so planed the Scripture, and spoiled it to so great a number of very important Clauses, that he makes us justly apprehensive of giving up the Bible into the Hands of Mechanics and Idiots (124).'

(123) This is a Fact of which I am very uncertain.

(124) Garasse's Doctrine curieuse, pag. 506, 507.

(125) Leti, Istor. Genev. pag. 80.

Mr Teissier supposes, that Castalio was banished; which is contrary to Calvin's Attestation: and note, that Mr Leti reports, that Castalio, being threatened with Banishment and Deposition, in case of relapsing, did not wait for the Effects of the Threats, but retired to Basil (125). Two of the three Causes of his Exile, reported by Mr Teissier, are false; for, his Preface to the Translation of the Bible, and his Notes on the first Epistle to the Corinthians, were not made till many Years after his Retreat from Geneva. All the Authors, that I have consulted, say, like Beza, that he retired directly to Basil. Mr Teissier is the only Person I have read, who says, he retired to Bern, and that he was driven from thence for his Errors.

[M] We must make a Remark on the Name of Castalio. He confesses that in his Youth he suffered himself to be drawn to Vanity. 'Insolebat animus stulta quadam & juvenili persuasione cognitionis eorum scientiarum, & linguarum, quibus saepe solent eorum studiosi plus tribuere quam spiritui (126). — My Mind grew vain from a foolish and youthful Persuasion of my Knowledge of those Sciences and Tongues, to which those, who study them, usually attribute more than to the Spirit.' He brings this Proof for it: When I was at Lyons, before I went to you (127) at Strasbourg, says he, some one, by mistake, called me Castalio, instead of Castellio: I was pleased with it, remembering the Fountain Castalius, consecrated to the Muses: this made me in love with that false Name; I preferred it before That of my Family, and adorned my self with it at the beginning of a Book. 'Quod ego nomen audiens, à Musarum fonte Castalio derivatum, adamavi, atque amplexum sum, meque omisso deinceps Castellionis nomine patrio, Castalio nem appellavi. Quin etiam hoc idem nomen pri-mis mei Prodromi literis primorum versuum confignavi, videlicet, ut esset insignior etiam ad posteror mea superbia. Eram enim, si Musis placet, Poëta, & Græcæ plane levitatis Musopatagus. Hæc ego confiteor, & execror, nec solum nunc confitens erubescio, verum etiam antea sepe solus cogitans, cum me majorem veri cognitionem adeptum conscientia pro mille testibus accusaret, pudore suffusus sum. Itaque deinceps omissa illa gloriola Græca, nactus, quam saepe optavi, occasionem mutandi, patrio me nomine Castellionem appellari cupio (128). — Hearing which Name, derived from the Castalian Spring of the Muses, I grew fond of it, and, laying aside my paternal Name Castellio, I called myself Castalio. Besides which, I prefixed this Name to a Book of Poems, that my Pride might be the more taken notice of by Posterity. For I was a Poet, and please the Muses, and a very noisy one. This I confess, and abhor; nor do I now only acknowledge it with shame; but often, in my private Reflexions, when, upon a greater Insight into Truth, Conscience, like a thousand Witnesses, has testified against me, I have been overwhelmed with Confusion. Throwing off, therefore, from that time, this Greek Vanity, and meeting with an Opportunity, I had long wished for, of making the Change, I desire I may be again called by my paternal Name Castellio. The end of this Passage shews us, that he did not persist in that little Vanity, and that he returned to his true Name. He calls himself before his French Bible Sebastian Chateillon.

(128) Castell. Defens. See Scalligerana prima, pag. 42.

[N] If he had continued within the Bounds of his Profession, he would have been more serviceable to the Republic of Letters, as Peter Ramus has well observed.] I set down his words, that they may serve for a Supplement to the Collections of Sir Thomas-Pope Blount (129). 'Utinam tanti ingenii tamque bonis artibus ac literis eruditi vis illa in hoc unico Græcæ professionis argumento versari malisset, nihil mea quidam sententia in isto genere laudis Basilæa comparandum habuisset (130). — I wish the Force of so great and learned a Genius had confined itself to the Profession of the Greek Tongue alone; Basil, in my Opinion, could have shewn nothing equally praise-worthy.' Thus speaks Ramus, after having made mention of some Books, which Castalio had translated.

(129) He has not alleged this Passage of Ramus in his Conjura Auditorum, p. 493, where he collects the Judgments on Castalio.

CASTELLAN (a) (PETER), great Almoner of France in the XVIth Century, was a Man of great Merit and Learning. His Father, a younger Son of a Walloon Gentleman, bore Arms all his Life-time, and settled himself at Archi in Burgundy [A]; where he married, and had two Sons, of whom our Peter Castellan was the youngest. This Child had the Misfortune to lose Father and Mother before he attained to the use of Reason: His Tutors neglected both his Estate and Mind;

(a) His true Name was du Chastel.

[A] His Father, a younger Son of a Walloon Gentleman — settled himself at Archi in Burgundy.] If Gallandius has not flattered his Friend about his Birth, they have done him great wrong in the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches, and in Moreri's Dictionary. According to Gallandius, Du Chatel was not only a Gentleman, but also of a very ancient Nobility (1), and the Son of a brave Knight (2). Beza speaks quite otherwise of it: He says (3), That good Bishop, surnamed Chastelain, of very mean Condition. Moreri supposes, that Castellan, being asked by Francis I, if he was a Gentleman? answered, That he did not well know from which of the three that were in Noah's Ark he was descended. This is incompatible with the Narrative of Gallandius. Observe also, that all those, who speak of Castellan's Country, make him to be born at Langres; yet Gallandius gives him another Country much more obscure than that. It is a common thing enough, for learned Men, who are born in some Village, to pretend themselves Natives of the next neighbouring City. Such a one is surnamed Aurelianensis, who was not born at Orleans, but in the Neighbourhood of it. I imagine, that Castellan was surnamed Lingonensis for some such reason.

Mind; nevertheless he was sent to Dijon in the eleventh Year of his Age, to study under a famous Teacher (b). His Progress made his Masters admire him. He learned Greek without the Assistance of any Body; and he had not been above six Years at Dijon, before they gave him a Class to teach [B]. He acquitted himself very worthily of that Charge, and he quickly had a most convenient Occasion to shew his Wit in a full Audience [C]. The desire he had to see learned Persons, and chiefly Erasmus, induced him to travel. He begun with Germany, where he saw several learned Men; and at last he stopped at Basil with Erasmus [D], who, soon

[B] He had been but six Years at Dijon, when they gave him a Class to teach. Beza was not ill informed on this Article. He says (4), He was first of all Regent at Dijon, under Mr. Peter Turreau, esteemed one of the chief Diviners of his Time.

(5) Galland. ubi supra, pag. 13.

[C] He had soon occasion to shew his Wit in a full Audience. We have just seen, that Peter Turreau passed for a great Conjuror. He was called before the Magistrates for it, and he ran the hazard of being condemned as an Infringer of the divine and human Laws. Turrellus præceptor impietatis accusaretur, quod contra jura canonica & civilia contraque sacras literas ex astris fata hominibus eventura prædicere diceretur (5). Castellanus, full of Gratitude for his Master, pleaded his Cause so vigorously, that he had him absolved. He discoursed learnedly and eloquently on Astronomy, and on the Divinations, which depend upon it: He shewed, that some of them were very innocent, and others very criminal; but that Turreau did not concern himself with the last. See the Substance of his Plea in Gallandius. Castellanus's Youth made his Speech more worthy of Admiration; and without doubt the Judges thought, that they ought to pay a great regard to the extraordinary Merit of such an Advocate.

(6) Id. ibid.

Ipse singulari pietate præditus, calore juvenili effervescens, veluti egregius ciconiæ parenti nutritia perolvens pullus, defensionem sui præceptoris professus ad judicium subcella laureatus accessit (6). — Quem ita differentem incomparabili quadam eloquentiæ & animi magna incitatione cum audivissent judices, qui ad sæviciam inflammati, ut fere fit in rebus quæ ad religionem spectant, ad dammandum eum ad tribunal venerant, ita stupentes & attoniti redditus sunt, ut vix verbum ullum proloqui possent. — Ita eo perorante & vultu & animo immutati sunt, ut non modo de abolitione Turrelli, sed etiam de adolescente generoso & disertò laude & præmio orando cogitarent. Inter quos cum federet Boudetus Lingonenfis antistes, homo doctus, advocatis aliquot Theologis adolescentem non vulgariter laudavit & honorario munere donatum dimisit (7). — Castellanus, endowed with uncommon Piety, and glowing with youthful Heat, like the generous Young repaying the Parent Sork for it's Nourishment, undertook the Defence of his Preceptor before the Tribunal of the Judges. — Whom when the Judges heard, pleading with incomparable Eloquence, and great Emotion of Mind; those very Judges, who, inflamed to cruelty, as is usual in Matters of Religion, came with a full intent of condemning the accused, were so astonished and confounded, that they had not a word to say. — During his Harangue, they were so changed both in Mind and Countenance, that they not only entertained thoughts of acquitting Turreau, but likewise of bestowing Praise and Reward on the generous and eloquent Youth. Among whom, Boudetus, Bishop of Langres, a learned Man, calling together some Divines, complimented the young Orator, and dismissed him with a Reward.

(7) Id. pag. 18, 19.

[D] He stopped at Basil with Erasmus. Beza was not ignorant of this Journey of Castellanus; but it seems he did not place it at the time he ought to have done: he thought, that Castellanus did not go to Basil till after having studied the Law at Bourges under Andrew Alciatus; but he ought to have said, on the contrary, that he did not study the Law at Bourges till after his Journey to Basil. These are Beza's Words; From Bourges he came to study at Basil, where he improved in Philosophy and Religion, living with the Reſſor Sebastian Munſter (8). Nothing like it is said in his Life; but on the contrary it is observed there, that he went from Basil, when the Catholic Religion was abolished there, and that he had

publicly preached against a seditious Minister. 'Seduta Basilee & aliis in Germaniæ locis tragica & templis imaginum exturbatione, & variis de religione tumultibus exortis, cum Erasmo, Basilea relicta, Friburgum proficiscentem animadverteret, ipse quoque (postquam publice concionatorem seditiosum confutasset) in quietiora pacatioraque loca demigrare statuit (9). — It happening, at that time, that the Images were driven out of the Churches, at Basil, and other Places of Germany, and various Tumults arising on account of Religion, Castellanus, observing, that Erasmus had retired from Basil to Fribourg, resolved likewise (after having publicly confuted a seditious Preacher) to settle in some more quiet and peaceable Habitation.' If it could be said, that Castellanus was twice at Basil, there would be no opposition between Beza and Gallandius; the latter would have only spoken of the first Journey, and the other only of the second. A Letter from Erasmus to Castellanus (10) seems favourable to those, who should say, that the latter was twice at Basil. He had been there before the entire abolishing of the Catholic Religion, which fell out in the Year 1529. Gallandius affirms it; and he was there in the Year 1531. This is what, it seems, may be gathered from a Letter, which Erasmus wrote to him from Fribourg, dated September the 24th, later than the printing of his Apophthegms. The Epistle Dedicatory of that Work is dated the Twenty sixth of February 1531; and Erasmus's Letter, I speak of, contains the Thanks of the Author, for the Praise which Castellanus had given him, on account of his Apophthegms; therefore that Letter of Erasmus must necessarily be later than the Month of September 1531. That Letter shews, that Castellanus did not live far from Fribourg; it speaks of some Partridges, which Castellanus had sent to Erasmus (11); it testifies, that, whenever Castellanus would come to eat a Fowl with Erasmus, he should be very welcome. 'Si tantus est amor in me tuus, ornatissime juvenis, ut juvet etiam cum umbra colloqui, istius quidem voluptatis scito tibi paratam fore copiam, quoties erit commodum. Quod si quando possis istam si non tragicam, certe splendidam personam, quam tibi fortuna imposuit, deponere, & uno Claudio Alberico, velut Achate, comitatus ad pullum simul lacerandum venire familiariter, aut etiam invocatus, si libet, obrepere, quemadmodum Nasica solet Ennio, juvaret interdum tali contubernio republice. — If your Love of me, most accomplished Youth, be so great, that you take a Pleasure even in conversing with my Shadow, know, that I will afford you that Pleasure, as often as it shall be convenient. But if you can for a time lay aside that Splendid, if not Tragical, Character, with which Fortune has invested you, and, accompanied by Claudio Albericus only, as another Achates, make me a friendly Visit, and pull a Fowl to pieces, or, without Invitation, if you chuse it, steal to me, as Nasica does to Ennius, it would be a pleasure to me sometimes to grow young again in such Company.' All this might indeed signify, that Castellanus lived at that time at Basil, and so Beza would not be mistaken. Another Letter, dated the seventh of February 1532 (12), observes, that Castellanus had met with a Bishop for his Patron, and that he had written to Erasmus, that he should speedily leave Paris. Doubtless this Bishop is he, of whom Gallandius makes mention: he was of the Family of Tonnerre, and nominated to the Bishopric of Poitiers. Castellanus had taught him polite Literature at Bourges; and he followed him afterwards to Paris. 'Utebatur familiariter Comite Tonoriensi Episcopo Piclavienſi designato, qui tum in eodem legum studio Alciato quoque operam dabat, quem etiam politioris doctrinæ literas Græcæ & Latinas subcivis horis docebat, soon finding him to be a very able young Man, placed him with Frobenius, in the quality of Corrector of the Press (c). Erasmus found the Benefit of it; for, upon Castellan's Advice, he corrected several Faults, which otherwise would have remained in his Works [E]. They left Basil at the same time, when the Romish Religion was quite abolished there. Erasmus retired to Friburg, and Castellan returned to France; and, when he was preparing to see Italy, he was desired, at Dijon, to take the Care of some young Scholars upon him, who were designed to be sent to Bourges to study the Law there, under Alciatus. Those, who requested this of him, were the chief of the Parliament of Burgundy. He accepted this Offer: but, while Matters were preparing for this Journey, he employed himself in two very different Things; he read some public Lectures on the Greek Text of St Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and private Lectures of Love to his Landlord's Daughter. Let us say rather, that That Maid, being extremely handsome, tempted and caressed him so much, that he could not resist such a dangerous Forwardness. Perceiving, that she was with Child, he told her Mother of it, and begged her Pardon for the Fault, and most humbly desired her to let her Daughter be delivered so privately, that no one should know of it. The good Mother did not fail to do it; she managed the Business so cunningly, that her Husband himself knew nothing of it. A Year after her lying-in, That Daughter was married suitably to her Condition, and under the Notion of a very chaste Virgin [F]. As for the Boy

cebat. — Percursor legum veluti stadio cum eo Episcopo Lutetiam reversus (13). That which creates some difficulty, is, that Peter Gallandius affords us no vacant time, wherein we may place the second Journey to Basil, after his Studies at Bourges: for he sends his Friend from Bourges to Paris with the nominated Bishop; and afterwards places him with a Bishop of Auxerre, for the Journey to Rome. For the rest we understand by Erasmus's two Letters to Castellan, that both of them wrote a very bad Hand. Erasmus seems vexed that he made no more of Castellan, when they were together; but Castellan was very well satisfied with the Civilities he had received from him. Quod mihi subinde occinis comitatem, humanitatem, atque etiam merita nescio quæ in te mea, usque adeo nihil horum agnosco, ut me mei pudeat quoties tecum re-puto quam parvam habuerim, quum apud nos esses, tuæ dignitatis rationem. Sed ita est hominum ingenium, præsentem virtutem, si non odimus, ut ait Flaccus, certe negligimus, sublatam ex oculis querimus invidi, aut si minus invidi, certe incogitantes. Quo magis admiror singularem istius ingenii candorem, qui toties prædices humanitatem meam, cujus Scythicam inhumanitatem merito posset inculcare: neque gravabor hanc culpam facere pro viribus, si vel sese dederit occasio, vel tu submonueris quibus in rebus tibi possum commodare (14). — As to my Courtesy, Humanity, and I know not what Merit of mine towards you, which you every now and then tell me of, I am so far from acknowledging any such thing, that I am ashamed of myself, as often as I recollect the little regard I paid to your Worth, when you were with me. But such is the Disposition of Mankind, Virtue, when present, if not hated by us, as Horace says, is certainly neglected: but, when removed from our Sight, we seek after it with envy, or, if not with envy, yet certainly without thought. For this reason, I am the more surprized at that singular Candour of Mind, which induces you so often to cry up my Humanity, whom you might justly accuse of Scythian Inhumanity: nor shall I think it any trouble to repair this Fault, with the utmost care, if either an Opportunity offers, or you shall inform me how I may be serviceable to you.

[E] Upon Castellan's Advice, Erasmus corrected several Faults, which otherwise would have remained in his Work.] Erasmus's Raileries against the French animated Peter Castellan in such a manner, that he employed Day and Night in the Study of the Greek Tongue, and Divinity, and all kind of Literature. With this Labour, and the Goodness of his Parts, it was not very difficult for him to acquire a profound Learning; which made him discover, that the Strength of Erasmus did not lie in the Greek Language. Moreover, the little time that That great Man employed in composing his Books, did not permit him to avoid all manner of Faults: It was a Happiness for him, that his Works passed through the Hands of such a learned Corrector, as our Ca-

Hic juvenis Erasmicæ gloriæ æmulatione, & ejus falsis in ingenia Gallica, quibus parum in literis tribuebat, cavillationibus incensus, noctes & dies in Græcarum literarum Theologiæque atque omnis humanioris doctrinæ commentatione ita versabatur, ut Erasmum satis præcipitater commentantem (15), & Græco non probe intellecta in Latinum sermonem male vertentem, frequenter suorum errorum admoneret. Quæ ille, qui plurimum Castellani opera uteretur, cum agnoscere, atque emendare ejus admonitu cogebatur, plurimum tribuebat atque deferbat. Memini Castellanum mihi frequenter dicere Erasmum in literis Græcis supra vulgus tum parum promovisse, in auctoribus qui ab usu communi remoti essent insigniter hæsitavisse. Itaque quæ ex illis vertebatur aut commentabatur, majore ex parte adjuvantibus doctis, qui ei hanc operam navabant, præstitisse (16). — This young Man, fired with an Emulation of Erasmus's Glory, and at his keen Jests on the French Wits, to whom he ascribed but little Learning, applied himself so closely, Night and Day, to Greek, Divinity, and all kind of polite Learning, that he frequently pointed out the Errors, which Erasmus, through too much haste, and translating out of Greek into Latin what he did not thoroughly understand, was guilty of. Which when the latter, who was greatly assisted by Castellan, was forced to acknowledge, and, upon his Admonition, to amend, he confessed himself highly obliged to him. I remember often to have heard Castellan say, that Erasmus had but a very moderate Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, and that he was remarkably at a loss in uncommon Authors. Therefore, in those things, which he translated, or commented on, out of such Authors, he was for the most part obliged to the Assistance of learned Men.

The time of those young Persons going to Bourges being come, he went with them, and improved very much in the Knowledge of the Law, to which he did not so much apply himself, but that he cultivated polite Literature very much. His Application to Study was surprizing [G]. Lastly, how do we know, but that some excellent Anatomist had fortified him against all Events by such a Discourse as this? 'Gentlemen, if you find no Obstacle in the Passage, or if the Defeat be not bloody, suspect nothing upon that account to the Disadvantage of your Wives. Believe me, in this matter, as well as in many others, a pleasing Error is better than a vexatious Truth.' This is what the Sieur Lami said to his Auditors in a Lecture of Anatomy (19).

(19) Lami Discours. Anatom. pag. 89.

Some perhaps may imagine, that there is no likelihood that Peter Gallandius said, that his Friend Castellan got his Landlord's own Daughter with Child; for it seems That Landlord should be the Father of Castellan's Disciple; in which case the Fault would have been so criminal, that the Historian, to save his Friend's Reputation, would have passed it in silence. Therefore left it should be thought, that I have translated ill, I will place here the Terms of the Original. 'Versabatur in ædibus honorati & primarii cujusdam civis, cui puella erat forma admodum venusta & eleganti, à qua frequenter multis illecebris ad amores & voluptatem invitabatur. Itaque etsi ea erat virtutis & continentiae indole ut — tantis tamen puellæ blandimentis quibus non modo adolescentia lubrica, verum etiam ætas corroborata caperetur, captus, eam gravidam reddidit. Quod ubi cognovit nihil antiquius ducens quam ut cui juvenili cupiditate incensus stuprum obtulerat, citra ignominiam quantum fieri posset, confuleret, senili quadam prudentia ad matrem accessit, culpam confessus, & veniam precatus, per omnia sacra rogare cepit honesta aliqua occasione in eum locum filiam abduceret, ubi citra infamiae notam clam parere & citra turpitudinis suspicionem in ædes paternas reduci posset. Quod ita matris prudentia administratum est, ut non modo alios sed & patrem ipsum flagitium latuerit, & anno postquam puella enixa est, in matrimonium honestissime collocata sit (20). — He was conversant in the Family of an honourable and chief Citizen, who had a very beautiful Daughter, who was ever tempting him by various Allurements to Love and Pleasure. Therefore, notwithstanding his natural Virtue and Continency was such, that — yet, captivated by the Girl's Blandishments, which were able to ensnare, not only easy Youth, but even confirmed Age, he got her with Child. Which discovering, and judging that he ought above all things to consult the Reputation of Her, whom in the warmth of youthful Lust he had debauched, with the Prudence of an old Man he went to her Mother, confessed his Fault, and, begging pardon, conjured her to take an Opportunity of sending her Daughter where she might lie-in privately, and without Infamy, and return unsuspected to her Father's House. The Affair was so conducted by the prudent Mother, that not only others, but even the Father, knew nothing of the Matter, and the Girl, a Year after her lying-in, was honourably married.' By this you see, that Gallandius gives us plainly to understand, that Castellan lodged at the Maid's Father's House; for, if he had designed to have observed only that he went very often to That Man's House, he would have made use of an Expression (21), which would have been improper, at least in this Place, by reason of an Ambiguity very dangerous to Castellan's Honour. It is a Phrase, of which the most natural, the most common, and the most reasonable Sense, is That which I give it; it leads us directly to an Idea, which aggravates Castellan's

(21) Versari in ædibus.

Crime, though his Historian has abstained from all Terms, that might represent to us the domestic Pedagogy; and that, if we carry it so far, it must be by joining together some Probabilities. I confess, on the other side, that he would have been less excusable, if he had not lodged in the same House with this Daughter; for, in that Case, he would have sought such Occasions, which he might easily have avoided: but, being under the same Roof with the Tempter, Opportunities fell in his way, whether he would or no. The Author of his History found a very wise Conduct in the Care, which was taken to save the Daughter's Reputation. 'Quæ tanta in consulendo honori puellæ prudentia & tegendo flagitio industria me adduxit, ut ne hanc quidem adolescentiæ labem silentio prætereundam esse existimaverim (22). — Which great Care of the Girl's Honour, and Industry in concealing the Crime, induced me not to pass in silence this Slip of his Youth.' There is nothing extraordinary in it. He should not have begun by telling the Mother, that her Daughter was with Child, but by telling her of her Daughter's ill Inclinations: otherwise it was to act like those, of whom it is reasonably said: they think after they have spoke. It was well for Castellan, that Beza, and other Writers of that Party, were ignorant of this Adventure.

(22) Gallandius ibid. pag. 23.

[G] His Application to study was very surprizing.] He slept hardly three Hours in the Night: he lay on the Ground, without any other Pillow than his Gown, which he wraped about his Head; and as soon as he awaked, he immediately run to his Books. It was in vain to advise him to study less; he did not listen to those kind of Remonstrances (23). When he was in the Office of King's Reader, he resumed that strong Application; and, to have a more proper time to study, he never dined, but took a piece of Bread at eight a Clock in the Morning, and supped at five in the Evening. He attended at the King's going to Bed, and did not retire till he slept. He went to sleep four Hours at most, and then to his Study without Intermission till ten o' Clock, when the King went to his Devotions. 'Hanc personam ubi tanti Regis judicio & voluntate sibi impositam esse vidit, noctes & dies, veluti Prometheus Caucasus, se rursum libris affixit, nullum non auctorum genus in omnibus linguis ita manibus pervolutavit, ut in singulis totam vitam contrivisse quavis etiam exercitissimus eum diceret (24). — Tres ipse horas, quatuor ad summum, dormiebat; quibus exactis, nocte intempesta, excitatus in horam decimam, donec Rex sacris operaretur, in literarum studia indefessus incumberebat (25). — When he saw himself self invested with this Character by the Judgment and Will of so great a King, he again fixed himself to his Books, like Prometheus to Mount Caucasus, and turned over almost every Author in every Language, inasmuch that the most conversant in them would have said that he had spent his whole Life in the Study of each in particular. — He slept but three, or four Hours at most: after which, rising in the middle of the Night, he studied indefatigably till ten in the Morning, when the King went to Prayers.'

[H] He staid not long at Rome, where almost nothing pleased him but the Remains of Antiquity (26).] He was so scandalized at the Corruptions, which he observed in the Court of Rome, that, for many Years after, he could not think, or speak, of them without Indignation. He pushed the matter so far, that he believed Religion was but a meer Farce at Rome, which they made use of to deceive the World, in order to preserve Dominion. Calvin has not said much more of it; Calvin, I say, who has been so much insulted, and so often called an egregious Calumniator for exercised in the chief Town of the Island of Cyprus. The Bishop and Inhabitants of that Town wanted a Man, who understood Greek and Latin, and who could teach Literature, and they offered him a Pension of two hundred Crowns. Castellan undertook to serve them, and taught two Years in their Town with much Success; infomuch that they were not well pleased when he left them to go and see Egypt. He saw it like an ingenious Person, for he could discourse of all that belonged to it, as if he had lived there all his Life. Having heard of the good Reception, which the Sieur de la Forêt, his most Christian Majesty's Embassador, gave to the French at Constantinople, he had a Mind to see that great City: In his Journey thither he stopped two Months at Jerusalem. La Forêt conceived a singular Esteem for him, and recommended him to Francis I, and to some great Lords of the Court. Cardinal du Bellai, and some others, recommended him to the same Prince for a very learned Man. Castellan confirmed their Testimony by the Discourses he had with the King, which were so pleasing to him, that he used to make Castellan speak of a great many things whilst he was at Dinner and Supper [I]. A little while after, he gave him the Office of his Reader, which Colin, who was fallen into Disgrace, had exercised [K]. This obliged Castellan to study more than ever, that he might be able to answer the Questions, which the King his Master, who was curious, and a Lover of good Literature, might ask him. He lulled him asleep, every Night, by the Explication of some Author (d); he allowed also some Hours for the Instruction of the Princess Margaret, That Prince's Daughter. He made use of the Favour, to which he had attained, for the Good and Advancement of Learning, and caused some good Regulations to be made for the Advantage of the Professors, and of the King's Library. It is assured, in his Life, that he laboured hard to maintain the Catholic Religion, against those who solicited the King of France to cast off the Pope's Yoke; not but that he knew, as well as any Body, the need the Church stood in of being reformed; but he foresaw, that, if Francis I. appeared never so little indifferent as to the Innovators, they would take so much Boldness upon them, that they would overturn every thing, the for having made use of these words: The first Article of their secret Theology (he speaks of the Popes and Cardinals) which reigns among them, is, that there is no God: the second, that all that is written and preached of JESUS CHRIST is but Falshood and idle Talk: the third, that all that is contained in Scripture concerning Eternal Life, and the Resurrection of the Body, are meer Fables (27). Compare this with what I am going to say of Castellan's Life, and you will find no great difference.

Memini eum aliquando, cum Pontificum Romanorum supinas libidines, avaritiam, & rapacitatem, religionis contemptum, superbiamque Cardinalium, luxum, & ignaviam, nundinationesque, cauponationes, & flagitia reliqua aulicorum Romanensium describeret, & cætera quæ tunc vidisset commemoraret, ita animo concitari & indignatione commoveri consuevisse, ut ei non modo in facie color, sed & toto corpore gestus motusque immutarentur; ut etiam mihi frequenter diceret sibi esse persuasissimum ne Pontifices quidem Romanos religionis & sacrorum antilites, tot suis fuorunque flagitiis sceleribusque contaminatos, vere & ex animo Christum colere; quæ autem in religione facerent, retinendæ dominationis causa, veluti larva ad fallendum apposita, egregie simulare (28). — I remember that, when he was describing the wanton Lust, Avarice, and Rapaciousness of the Roman Pontiffs, their Contempt of Religion; the Pride, Luxury, and Laziness of the Cardinals, their riotous Feastings, and other Vices, which he had observed in the Court of Rome, he would be so moved with Indignation, that not only the Colour in his Face, but the very Motions and Gestures of his Body, would be changed: infomuch that he would often tell me, he was fully persuaded, that the Popes themselves, the supreme Heads of Religion, contaminated with so many Vices of their own and those about them, did not sincerely and from their Hearts worship CHRIST; but that whatever shew they made of Religion, it was an egregious Cheat, carried on only for the Sake of Power. See what I quote out of Erasmus, in Remark [G] of the Article CALVIN.

[I] Francis I made him speak of a great many things, while he was at Dinner and Supper. Castellan had not only much Learning, but also a very good Grace in speaking; which made him be heard with much Attention and Delight, when he discoursed on the Questions which Francis I proposed to him. Præstanti regi fere semper astabat; & ad ea quæ in percontando ab eo ponebantur sic respondere solitus erat, ut facile quivis naris non obesse eum omnia ingenio summo, acerrimis studiis, atque usu maximo cognita, & perspecta habere judicasset. Huc accesserat vocis ea lenitas, vultus gestusque compositi decor, & sermonis comitas, elegantia, & gratia, ut, quod de Pericle prodidit Eupolis, Pitho quamdam flexanimam in ejus labris sessitare homines putarent. Itaque quoties differebat, Regem, silentibus aliis omnibus, in eum oculos conjicere, ex ejus ore veluti auribus suspensum pendere, & singula verba ab eo emissâ tanquam oracula probare animadvertisset (29). — He generally stood by the King at Supper, and returned such Answers to the Questions, which were put to him, that a Person of any Skill might easily judge, that, by dint of Genius, and Application to study, he had acquired a compleat Knowledge of every thing. To this was added, That Mildness of Voice, that graceful Aspect and Deportment, that Courtessy, Elegance, and Grace of Language, that, as Eupolis said of Pericles, Men would think Persuasion itself dwelt upon his Lips. As often therefore as he discoursed, you might see the King (the rest keeping Silence) fix his Eyes on him, hang on his Words, and receive every Sentence as an Oracle. From the first Conversations the King approved of him much (30), and, because some considerable Persons conceived a great Jealousy at it, and laboured to put him out of Countenance, and to hinder him from insinuating himself into the King's Mind by his fine Discourses, the King charged the Dauphin to tell him, that he should not regard any Body's Threatnings, but continue to speak freely and boldly. Cumque essent qui, ejus felicitati invidentes, silentium ei imperare cointenderent, atque ab hoc de rebus omnibus apud Regem dicendi instituto deterere pararent, per filium natu maximum Delphinum Rex ipse eum hortatus est ut intrepide & constanter ad suam mensam loqueretur, neque cujusquam interpellatione aut minis de sententia deduceretur (31).

[K] The King gave him the Office of his Reader, which Colin had exercised. Gallandius (32) pretends, that Colin made himself odious by Discourses, which created Quarrels, and that those, who were against him, speaking in Castellan's Favour on one side, while his Merit recommended him on the other, Colin was dismissed, and Castellan the State as well as Popery. For which Reason he thought it expedient, that Indulgence should be used towards Inquisitors and Informers [L]; tho' it happened very often, that they accused innocent Persons. On the other side, he did not approve of the Rigour of Capital Punishment, and brought also some Trouble upon himself, for having interceded in favour of some erring Persons, who were threatened with Death (e). The Exactness, with which he maintained the Episcopal Laws against the Pretensions of the Church of Rome, made him odious beyond the Alps; and he greatly displeased the Sorbonne by the Protection he granted to Robert Stephens [M]. He occasioned the Assembly of Melun (f), in which some Prelates and Doctors prepared the Instructions of those, who were to be deputed to the Council. He never appeared more eloquent, more grave, and more majestic, than when he prepared Francis I. for Death, and when he made That Monarch's Funeral Oration [N]. I forgot to say, that he had obtained of fellan advanced in his Place; Castellan, I say, who had never dreamed of such a Preferment, and who would rather have had an Employ in the Army, than in the Church. Beza relates the Thing in another manner. He says, that Castellan presented himself to James Colin, at that Time Reader in Ordinary to King Francis I. and that God would have it, that Colin offered him to the King, who was desirous to hear ingenious Persons at his Table, and chiefly those, who brought him any thing new (33). The Issue of that Presentation, continues be, was such, that Castellan thrusting Colin out, remained the King of France's Favourite until his Death. Another reports, that Colin and Castellan disputing, on a time, on something, in his Majesty's Presence, Colin grounded himself on his Books; Castellan spoke as an Eye-witness, and maintained, that the Authors quoted by Colin were mistaken. This placed Castellan so high in the King's Opinion, that he received Orders to remain at Court, and that afterwards he obtained the Bishopric of Tulle. 'Narrat Petrus à Sancto Juliano in præfatione ad historiam Burgundionum, cum incidisset quæstionem quædam inter eum & Castellanum coram Francisco primo, Colinusque librorum auctoritate tantum uteretur; Castellanus vero, qui rem, de qua agebatur, etiam oculis usurparat, sua auctoritate testibusque approbasset vera his libris non contineri, tantam hinc illum gratiam affecutum esse apud Regem, ut in aula manere jussus sit, indeque Episcopatu Tutelensi donatum (34).' It is very dangerous to recommend an abler Person than one's self. I do not question but that Castellan was very prejudicial to Colin, either without endeavouring it, or as Beza relates it.

[L] He was of opinion, that Indulgence should be used towards Inquisitors and Informers. He was not ignorant, that there were many Calumniators in the Catholic Church, who, through Hatred, Jealousy, Ambition, and Covetousness, persecuted innocent Persons, by falsely imputing Lutheranism to them: but he thought those kind of Accusers ought to be supported, though their Suspensions should be ill grounded; for, said he, the Innocent, who are accused, clear themselves; Criminals are not punished, if they are not accused. He made use of a Passage of Cicero (35), concerning the Dogs of the Capitol, from which he concluded, that, to suppress the Audaciousness of Innovators, the Dogs, who bark after them, must be protected and favoured for the sake of the public Good. 'Neque fieri posse quin in factione quoque diversa calumniatores essent, qui odio, invidia, vel nimio studio suas opes & dignitates retinendi potius, quam pietatis affectu, bonos aliquando viros pro Lutheranis persequerentur; ferendos tamen esse quoties in suspicionem, à qua etiam crimen abesset, suspectos in judicium vocarent. Quod si innocentes essent accusati, absolvi possent, condemnari autem nocentes, nisi accusarentur, non possent. Quam ad rem locum illum ex Cicerone pro Roscio de canibus Capitolinis adducebat, ut illos olim, cum fures internoscere non possent, rectè latratu appetere solitos esse quicumque noctu Capitolium ingressi essent; ita ut metu lymphaticorum quorundam compriemeretur audacia, quoties moribus & longo usu in Ecclesia recepta privata auctoritate abrogarent aut seditiose damarent, latratores, à quibus appeterentur, reipublicæ causa favore prosequendos

'esse (36).' It cannot be denied, that this Maxim is of Use for the Good of the Public, and chiefly in troublesome Times; but it is also certain, that it is a Source of Injustice. We must lament, upon this, the Fate of Mankind, and the fatal Necessity, which obliges, on so many Occasions, to sacrifice the Right of private Men to the Use of the Public. The Honour and Innocency of a Family become but too often the Prey of a suspicious or wicked Informer; Justice would require, that this Informer should be exemplarily punished, either for his Temerity or Malice; but the public Good requires, that such Persons should be left to bark against every Body, and that they should go unpunished, when they confound the Innocent with the Guilty. This keeps ill affected Persons in awe; and it is better to accuse ten times without Necessity, than to fail once to inform against those, who deserve it. This is the reason, that many good Persons are neglected, whilst the Bad are in Credit. A good Man will not take upon him the Trade of a Spy, or an Informer; an ill Man takes this Office willingly, and thereby makes himself useful, and sometimes necessary. However it be, you see on what Foundation our Peter Castellan would have Quarter given to those unjust Accusers, who blemish so many innocent Persons. The Good of the Church required Dogs, who did not only bark against Heretics, but indifferently against all those, who, by their Moderation, and Spirit of Toleration, became suspected. Castellan is not the only Man, who adopts this Maxim.

(36) Galland. pag. 58.

[M] He displeased the Sorbonne, by the Protection he granted to Robert Stephens. It was a Protection, which did not last long enough; Castellan was tired at last with resisting the Torrent of the Sorbonnists, and he gave up to them Robert Stephens, who complained of it in this manner: 'Immediately, as being agitated by I know not what Fury, he leaves him a Prey to the Divines, whom he had supported against such Furies, by an Inspiration of God rather than by a pure and sincere Affection. It was in hopes to gain a Cardinal's Cap, that he gave up himself so servilely, and without reason, to them; for he hated them much (37).' His Passion was allayed some Days after, and he was vexed, that they should oppress that learned Man, and compel him to seek another Country (38). Admire Castellan's Fate: he was suspected of Lutheranism, as well because he understood Greek and Hebrew, as because he disapproved of the Cruelty of the Inquisitors, and some Abuses of the Church: And when he turned Persecutor, to clear himself of these Suspensions, it was thought he did it only out of Ambition. Gallandius tells us all these Things himself. 'A quibusdam, qui quicquid polioribus literis tinctum est, aut ex Hebræis Græcisque literis erutum, statim Lutheranismum esse clamitant, affinem ei scilicet, ab aliis vero aulæ pontificiæ corruptos mores, nundinationes rerum sacrarum, & quam vocant superstitionem improbantibus, purpurei galeri desiderio fictum & personatum simulatorem habitum esse non ignoro (39).'

[N] He made that Monarch's Funeral Oration. It consisted of two Sermons, which Mr Baluze caused to be printed, when he published Castellan's Life, composed by Gallandius. Every body knows the Complaints of the Sorbonne on Castellan's expressing himself pretty plainly concerning Purgatory; he him the Bishopric of Tulle, and afterwards that of Macon. He designed to have retired after the Death of That Prince, but Henry II would have him continue to follow the Court as before; and, as soon as the Place of Great Almoner of France became vacant, he conferred it upon him. That Office is of a great Extent, and may become a Foundation of many good things, when it is administered by a Person, who knows and practises all the Duties of it. This our Castellan did, and, among the good Uses he made of the Money, which he disposed of, we must not forget what concerns the Women of ill Fame [O]. He quitted the Bishopric of Macon for that of Orleans, which was in the Neighbourhood of the Places, where Henry II delighted to reside. That Prince, preparing himself for the Expedition of Germany, went from Amboise to Orleans, and permitted the Great Almoner to absent himself from the Court for two Months. Castellan desired that Leave of him, in order to set the Affairs of his Diocese in Order. He had not leisure to correct the Abuses of it; but he cleared it from a great Number of vagabond Priests, who were ignorant, and led a scandalous Life [P]: He preached often; but, one Day, while he was preaching, he was taken with a violent Palsy, which soon degenerated into an Apoplexy, and carried him off in a very little time. He died the third of February, 1552 (g). The Protestants made many Reflexions on this Death [Q]. He was a Man very well versed in the Oriental Languages (h), he declared, that he believed the King's Soul went directly to Heaven. The Deputies of the Sorbonne fell into the Hands of a Banterer (40), who laughed at them. I know, said he to them, the late King's Humour; he stayed seldom long in one Place, and; if he went through Purgatory, it was but to taste the Wine there. Beza (41) and Thuanus (42) relate the Thing very amply.

[O] We must not forget what he did in relation to the Women of ill Fame. I shall only speak of the Maids, who were shut up in the House of Repentance, and who did not deserve the Name of Repentant Maids; for they were neither Maids nor repentant: they had prostituted themselves, and having afterwards put themselves into a Monastery, to expiate their Faults there, and not having wherewith to subsist, they went a begging from Door to Door, which gave them Opportunity to take up their first Trade again. Castellan tried all ways to find a sufficient Fund for the Subsistence of those Creatures, and ordered, among other Things, that they should work with their Hands. It was with difficulty he persuaded them, that they ought not to walk up and down in the City, but to keep religiously in their Monastery. Vix verbis exprimi potest quantis sudoribus & molestiis operam dederit ut mulieres, quæ Lutetiae corpore vulgato quæstum meretricium fecissent, ex vitæ contaminatæ penitentia ad castitatem, bonam frugem, & religiosam vitam in monasterio profectam convertere, verè id quod profiterentur præstarent. Nam cum iis redditus qui ad usus vitæ necessarios requiruntur destitute vicatim & ostium mendicare cogentur, & ejus rei occasione sui copiam magno cum probro facere vulgo dicerentur, re prius diligenter multumque cum prudentibus bonisque viris communicata, illis demum multis rationibus, quamquam ægrè, persuasit ne monasterium semel ingressæ, cum hac ignominiosa boni nominis & famæ jactura per urbem in posterum divagarentur (43).

(43) Galland, pag. 110.

[P] He purged his Diocese from vagabond Priests, who were ignorant, and led a scandalous Life. He began the Reformation of his Diocese with the Priests, and ordered, that all those, who had not settled Habitations, and who only went from Place to Place, begging to say Masses, should leave the Country immediately. In fifteen Days he drove so great a number of them away, that one might have formed a good Army of them. Doctrinæ & vitæ sui populi cognitionem instaurationemque à capite, hoc est, à sacerdotibus exoritur, eorum qui nullam certam stationem habentes, velut erronei circumforanei, Missas undique accupantur, tantum numerum intra dies quindecim Episcopatus sui finibus exegit, ut ex iis iustus propemodum exercitus cogi posse videretur (44). Having examined them, he found them very ignorant, and very much corrupted; yet he gave them travelling Charges. It was a very great Abuse to suffer such People, who offered themselves, as one may say, from Door to Door, to say Masses at a low Rate. Cum eos interrogatos literarum omnium ignaros,

(44) Ibid. pag. 134.

omnium sordium maculis infames, nulli certo homini aut loco auctoritas mercedula se veluti venales ad sacra obeunda obtrudere didicisset (45). This Evil has been a little remedied; but it is still so great, that it moved a Catholic, Author of a Book, printed in Holland in the Year 1681, to make very vehement Complaints about it: 'It is a comical thing, says he, in Italy, to see ten or twelve Priests in a Vestry, waiting for some Popen, who, for a Mass, gives them a Giulio to buy Bread withal, and that very often they are turned out of the Vestry, by the Sacristan, before they have earned a Penny. This is not seen at Paris; but there are above a thousand of those Adventurers, who have no fixed Parish, and have much a-do to subsist by their Masses: I shun them as Pick-Pockets, and am glad of one thing, which is, that neither Priest nor Monk ever had any of my Money by way of Payment for their Masses, and I should think it to be a kind of Sacrilege to give it: No Man should be ordained without an Office or Benefice, and then we might be free from these Vagabonds (46).'

(45) Ibid. pag. 135.

[Q] The Protestants made many Reflexions on his Death. Let us see those of Beza. Speaking of Castellan, he says, 'That he was at last provided with the Bishopric of Macon, and afterwards of Orleans, after the buying and selling of several Benefices. He was a Man of Wit, well learned in Latin, and favouring the Protestant Religion, at first, so far, that he maintained Robert Stephens' Cause a long while - - when he was attacked by the Sorbonne, who found fault with a certain Impression of the Bible, which he had made (47). - - But this good Bishop, complying so far as to persecute those, whom he had excused before as much as he could, became Bishop of Orleans, where God waited for him in the Passage. For being come, the Eve of his Entry, according to Custom, to the Monastery, which they call St. Pierre (48), and got into the Pulpit to preach, where there was a great number of People, by reason of the Novelty of seeing a Bishop preach, as he was threatening very sharply those, who were called Heretics, he was struck with such a sudden and violent Pain of the Cholick, that, being carried away, he ended his Days miserably the following Night (49), to make his Entry elsewhere than into Orleans. Five Days after, viz. the ninth of July, were also executed, &c. Beza is mistaken both as to the Day and the Year. According to what he says, Castellan should have died the fourth of July 1549; but it was the third of February 1552. Let us add another good Protestant Witness to Beza: 'Now that I am speaking of Church men, I remember one, who is seldom forgot, when they speak of such Judgments of God, (viz.) Petrus Castellanus. For, indeed, we have in him (as much as in any other) a notable Example of God's Judgment: because, after having made great Profession of the Gospel during the Reign of King Francis, the first of that Name, so far as to incur the Displeasure of the Sorbonne, (which he did not fear, by reason of the Support he had from the said Prince)

(47) Beza, Hist. Eccl. pag. 80, 81.

(48) Du Peirat, Antiquities of the Chapel, pag. 384, says, that this Prelate was struck with an Apoplexy, as he was preaching the Word of God in the Church of St. Lawrence of Orgeres, before he had made his Entry into the City of Orleans.

(49) Gallandius, pag. 135, says, that Castellan fell into an Apoplexy first on his left Side, and afterwards on his right Side, that he could not breathe, and that he was suffocated before three Days: ante triduum suffocatus sit.

and moreover so universal a Scholar, that Francis I, who boasted never to have seen any learned Man, whose Knowledge he had not exhausted in two Years [R], declared, that he had never found this Man's Erudition defective. Castellan wrote but few Things [S]. Very surprizing Effects of his Eloquence are reported [T]. We

' he turned his Coat in the Reign of King Henry, the second of that Name; (so far as he perceived that those, who made Profession of the Gospel, had not, then, the best of it at Court) and even turned it so that it was no longer known. And, not contented with that, he came to Orleans, (of which City he had newly obtained the Bishopric) to preach strongly and firmly against the Religion, which he had before maintained. And, indeed, he went sometimes into the Pulpit; but as he was disgorging Blasphemies, in a Sermon, against the True Religion and his Conscience, he was seized with a Sickness, which would not suffer him to come down from the Pulpit in the same manner as he got up into it. It is said, that one half of his Body burned, and the other was as cold as Ice: They speak also of a Dysentery; in so much that Death followed it, in a few Days, with ' horrible Cries and Groans (50). ' D'Aubigné (51) cites a Book, entitled Dan, wherein it was said, that Bishop Castellan, who sent Protestants with great Coldness to be burned, died half frozen, and half burned. Chassanion relates the same Thing, as Beza and Henry Stephens, concerning the Death of this Prelate. See the hundred and sixth and the hundred and seventh Pages of a Book, which he published in 1586, entitled, Memorable Histories of the great and marvellous Judgments and Punishments of GOD.

I believe I may say Three Things on this Subject. I. That Beza and Henry Stephens, &c. have not acted thro' meer Slander, but out of Zeal for Religion. II. That what they have said is very proper to serve their Cause, in confirming the People already reformed in their Opinions. III. That it is likely they went too fast in their Decisions. Calvin, Beza, and several others, were persuaded, that all those, who had at first favoured the Reformation, either by endeavouring to mollify the Minds of the Persecutors, or by shewing an extream Desire to see the Evils of the Church at an end, were so many Apostates and Traitors to their Consciences, if they continued in the Communion of Rome, and if they changed their Behaviour towards the Reformed. I say they were too hasty in their Judgment. To believe, that the Church stands in need of Reformation, and to approve a certain manner of reforming it, are two very different Things. To blame the Conduct of those, who oppose a Reformation, and to disapprove the Conduct of those, who reform, are two very compatible Things. So that Erasmus may be imitated, without being an Apostate or a perfidious Man, without sinning against the Holy Ghost, and without betraying the Lights of one's Conscience; and this is what, it seems, Beza did not understand: He imagined, that all those, who agreed, that Calvin and Luther were in the right in many Things, were, from that time forward, fully persuaded, that they ought to break with the Church of Rome, and raise Altar against Altar, break and cast down Images, and not stop at the Sight of the Streams of Blood, which were going to be spilt. This is an Illusion: Doubtless, there were many Persons, who believed, that, since the Reformation met with such great Obstacles, that put Europe into the utmost Confusion, God shewed, that the Time of reforming was not yet come. Many Persons will be always conceited with this Principle, That it is a less Evil to tolerate the Abuses both of Church and State, than to endeavour to heal them by Remedies, which over-turn the Government (52). It would be difficult to determine, whether Castellan was one of those. But all Persons, free from Prejudice, will grant me, That one cannot be too reserved in accusing others of preaching against their Consciences. The Chancellor de l'Hôpital made very fine Verses on Castellan's dying almost in the Pulpit. He praised this Prelate much (53). Some body has said that Castellan was poisoned. Peter de St Julien (54) testifies, that it was the Opinion of That Bishop's domestic Servants, [R] Francis I boasted never to have seen any learned Man, whose Knowledge he had not exhausted in two Years.] This deserves Attention. Francis I boasted, that, of many very learned Men, with whom he had conversed, he had found none but Castellan, who could supply him with something new for two Years. That is to say, all the rest were soon exhausted, and reduced either to repeat or be silent. They shewed the Bottom of their Bag; but Castellan was a living Spring, which never dried up. Galland's Words are fine enough to deserve to be copied. ' Cum de doctis hominibus loqueretur (Rex) dictitare solebat se permultis extra munem aliorum aleam positus doctis hominibus sæpe familiariter usum esse & delectatum, verum præter Castellum neminem sibi ad eam diem visum cujus eruditionem omnem non intra biennium exhaustisset; Hunc veluti omnium artium quandam oceanum semper vivo gurgite redundantem ad se accedentem semper videri novum nec unquam antè auditum. Eam esse ejus immortalis ingenii vim & doctrinæ fecunditatem, ut nunquam in ulla disputatione hæsitare & titubare visus esset (55). ' Perhaps there are no Persons, whose Conversation is more to be feared by a learned Man, than That of great Lords, who love Learning. For, as they are used to speak without Preparation on the Things, which are under their Cognizance, they conceive an ill Opinion of a Man who does not answer readily to the Questions, which are asked him concerning his Profession. Now how many learned Divines are there, who would be cruelly puzzled by a Question, put on a sudden, concerning the Year, Progress, Issue, and chief Circumstances of a Council? I have heard a famous Historiographer of France confess ingenuously, That he did not know in what Age Philip the Fair lived. The more a Man reads, and the more Collections he makes, the less fit is he to answer immediately to Questions about Matters of Fact; so that there are some Persons, that make their Learning no less to be admired in their Books, than their Ignorance in Conversation. The Blounts, the Salmasius's, and a very small number of such like Persons, are not subject to this Misfortune. But others fall into dangerous Hands, when they are to go through the continual Questions of a Person of Quality, who loves Books. I have heard say, that the Marshal de Crequi, being retired to a Country-House during his Disgrace (56), sent for the most learned Man of that Part of the Country. The Prior of a Monastery was brought to him. Fifteen Days had not passed before he said, that They had brought him the most ignorant Man in the World. Not but that this Prior knew a great many Things, and might have satisfied Monsieur de Crequi, if he had had Time to prepare himself; but, to tell immediately the proper Names, the Dates, and other Circumstances, was what he could not do. See the Margin (57).

[S] He wrote but few Things.] They ascribed to him a Latin Letter of Francis I, against Charles V, published in the Year 1543 (58). I have already spoken of his Funeral Oration of Francis I.

[T] They relate very surprizing Effects of his Eloquence.] He made such moving Discourses in the Hospitals, Prisons, and Cloysters of Paris, that he made all his Auditors weep, and filled them with an ardent Desire of well doing (59). Having employed Two Months in reducing an Abbot of Pontoise to Reason, who did not well administer the Revenues of an Hospital, founded by St Lewis, he did not depart till he had given the Nuns a Sermon, which touched them in such a manner, that they cast themselves on the Ground, with a thousand Sobs and Sighs, beat their Breasts, wept abundantly, and promised to perform their Duty better for the Future. ' Ea vi eloquentiæ rerumque & sententiarum è sacris literis depromptarum tum gravitate tum copia de virginittatis, caritatis, & misericordiæ officiis mundaque contemptu, nobis præsentibus dissevit, ut omnes sese humi affligentes, maximis singultibus & sulphuris

 * suspiriis editis, sua pectora pugnis contunderent, & maximam vim lachrymarum profundentes se longè aliter quam superioribus temporibus officium facturas profiterentur (60). When he preached to the Repentant Maids, he began with representing the Horrors of an impure Life, and ended with the Praises of Conversion. Each Part of his Sermon had it's Effect: The first drove almost to the Brink of Despair: The last filled with Consolation. Gallandius expresses this very nobly: Here are his Words. * Ad virum aliquando passas, sed vitæ contaminatæ tædio in monasterio castitatem professas, inrefusus, cum scditatem veneram gravissimis verbis infectatus esset, ea verba de resipiscencia & penitentia fundebat, ea è sacris literis exempla & testimonia ad laudem ejus vitæ ad pudicitiam sanctam conversæ adducebat, ut quæ prima oratione capillo passio humi consternatæ & pectora pugnis acriter tunderent, faciem unguibus deformarent, & lamentis atque ejulatibus omnia completerent, oratione postrema ad se revocatæ, manibus ad cælum versis, Deo gratias agerent, se longè felicissimas prædicarent, & in suscepto vitæ instituto constanter perseverarunt iterum atque iterum voverent (61). — Whom he preached to those, who had been debauched, but, tired with an impure Life, had professed Chastity in a Monastery, beginning with severe Inveective against the Filthiness of Lust, he discoursed in such a manner concerning Repentance and Penance, and brought such Examples and Testimonies from Holy Writ in praise of a Life converted to Modesty, that the Women, who, at the beginning of his Oration, lay stretched on the ground with dishevelled Hair, violently beating their Breasts, and disfiguring their Faces with their Nails, and filling the Place with Cries and wailings, recovering themselves at the end of his Discourse, and lifting up their Hands to Heaven, returned GOD thanks, declared themselves the happiest Women in the World, and vowed again and again to persevere with Constancy in the Course of Life they had undertaken. We may add to this what the Chevalier Casal wrote to Pope Paul III. The Bishop of Macon made the Funeral Oration of Francis I very learnedly, and much to the Purpose, except that he was not well heard by reason of the great Groans and Weepings occasioned by the said Bishop's Words. I shall endeavour to have a Copy of it, which I will send your Holiness. You will find this in the Epistles of Princes collected by Ruscelli, and translated by Belleforest (62).

[U] I shall make but one Remark, for Mr Moreri's Faults, and for those of some other Writers.] I. He supposes that Castellan was of Langres, and ignoble, against the express Testimony of Gallandius. II. That Francis I made him his Preacher, on account of a certain Answer, which I have already related (63). Is it not to scoff at That Great Prince, to pretend, that he rewarded a Jest with such an Holy Employ as That of a Preacher? It was no ways by That pretended Jest, that Castellan gained That Monarch's Friendship; It was by his fine and learned Discourses: The Place, which was given him, was That of the King's Reader, and not That of Preacher (64). III. If he had taught polite Literature at Paris, as Moreri affirms, Gallandius would have said something of it; his Silence thereupon ought to pass for a solid Refutation of Moreri: But, besides, how likely is it, that a King's Reader, who is daily waiting at his Master's Table, and at his going to Bed, should trouble himself with teaching in a College? Moreri was more in the right, when he said, That Castellan became That Jame Prince's Library-Keeper, after Budæus. IV. They did not begin, as he affirms, to reward his Virtue by the Abbey of Auberive. Doubtless, he meant the Abbey of Hauvilliers (65), which Gallandius calls, in Latin, Abbatiam Alto villarensis: But That Abbey was so far from being the first Reward of Castellan, that, on the contrary, he had it not before he parted with his Bishopric of Tulle. He parted with that Bishopric, when he received that of Macon.

(61) In Remark [A].

(64) See his Life, pag. 41. These Words of Gallandius, pag. 46. Primum omnium inter Scribas & Ministros cubicularios Reges cooptatus, signify, as it seems to me, that he was placed in the List between the Secretaries of the Cabinet, and the Officers of the Chamber; that is, that his Majesty's Reader was reckoned one of these Officers.

(65) In the Diocesis of Rheims.

It was in the Year 1543, that he obtained the Abbey of Hauvilliers; and he had been made Bishop of Tulle in the Year 1539. Mr Baluze observed (66), that Gallandius had no reason to say, That Francis I conferred Three Benefices on Castellan in one Year, (viz.) the Provostship of Eysaus (67), the Bishopric of Tulle, and the Abbey of Belleperche (68): Intra unius anni spatium tribus sacerdotiis, Præfectura Eysauniensis, Episcopatu Tuteleni, & Abbatia Bellepericensi eum ornavit (69). For John de Cardaillac was Abbot of Belleperche from the Year 1484, till 1543, as his Epitaph witnesses, published by Mesieurs de Ste. Marthe in the fourth Part of their Gallia Christiana. So that That Abbey was not given to Castellan till four Years after he had obtained the Bishopric of Tulle, to which he was certainly promoted in the Year 1539. V. It is not true, that the Dignity of Great Almoner of France was conferred upon him before the Bishopric of Macon. He had that Bishopric in the Year 1544, and he was not made Great Almoner, till the Twenty fifth of November 1547, in the Reign of Henry II (70). Thuanus has committed a Fault here; he believed, that Francis I gave the Great Almonery to Castellan (71). Several others have committed the same Fault (72), as the Sieur du Peirat observes. He is not himself free from Censure, since he believes, that Castellan was Almoner in Ordinary to Francis I, and Bishop of Macon, in the Year 1531 (73). This is very false. Father Jacob, having said, that William Budæus died in the Year 1540, adds, That the Place of the King's Library-Keeper was given to Peter du Châtel by Francis I, who afterwards gave him the Bishopric of Tulle (74). This is to confound Order: for we have seen, that That Bishopric was conferred upon him in the Year 1539. The same Author says, that du Châtel died preaching, in the Year 1558 (75). He ought to have said 1552. The Sieur Caubertin has falsely said, that du Châtel was Professor at Bourges (76). Mezerai had no reason to say he was disgraced (77).

[X] We shall repeat what Mr Varillas observes concerning the Assembly of Melun.] He says (78), I. That 'the chief Divines of the Faculty of Paris had Orders to be at Melun, and to give his Majesty their Opinions in writing, supported by the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers, and also of Reason, on the Points, which had served the Heretics for a Pretence to separate from the Communion of the Catholics. II. That those Doctors acquitted themselves of their Duty with such an Exactness, as would make at present the finest Monument of the Sorbonne, if their Opinions had been preserved with the same Sincerity as they were given,' but that the most judicious were suppressed by du Châtel, 'III. That that Man, who knew the Oriental Languages, and good Literature, in Perfection, was not so learned in Divinity. IV. That nevertheless he had an itching Desire to assist in the Council, in Quality of Ambassador of France, and that his Credit at Court was sufficient to obtain that important Commission, because, on the one side, there was no Sword-Man learned enough to maintain it with Splendor; and, on the other side, the Prelates durst not pretend to it, for fear of being ridiculed, if they appeared in the Quality of Ministers of a Secular Prince, in an Assembly, where they were to be Judges. V. That therefore he wanted nothing, in his own Opinion, but a quick and particular Knowledge of the Difficulties, which should be proposed there, that he might make his Doctrine to be as much admired as his Eloquence; and, as he was too vain to borrow it from others, he resolved to steal it so cunningly, that he could not be accused of Theft. VI. That he kept the Writings of the Doctors, to make his Advantage of them in his pretended Negotiation, and — made Extracts of them, which contained almost nothing else but the Decrees, which came from the same Faculty four Years before, against Luther's Doctrines. VII. That it was in that manner that that du Chatel, without thinking of it, and without any other Motive, than that of collecting Memoirs to signalize himself in an Employ, which was not given him, contributed to the increase of Calvin's Herefy in France; because, if the Doctors Opinions had been printed, the People, being confirmed by that means in the Belief of their Ancestors, would not have so easily inclined to Novelty. This is a terrible Accusation; and I cannot positively say, whether it is false or true; but, if Castellan committed such a Fraud, we must abate prodigiously of the Esteem he is in. However, the Historian is mistaken in two Things: He has supposed, that du Chatel was not a Bishop at the Time of that Assembly, that is, in the Year 1545; for he takes it for granted, that no Prelate durst make himself so ridiculous as to pretend to the Embassy of France in the Council: So that he must suppose, that du Chatel, who aspired to That Embassy, was no Bishop. He knew not therefore, that the Bishopric of Tulle was given him in the Year 1539, and That of Macon in the Year 1544. This is Mr Varillas's first Fault; and it is a Fault, which overthrows the chief Foundations of his Narrative. The second consists in his supposing, that, if the Opinions of the Doctors had been printed, the People would not have embraced Lutheranism. This is a great Illusion; if the Priests and the Prelates lost part of their Flock, it was not for want of having published a very great number of Books, as good as they were able to publish in those times. Calvin and Beza would as well have answered the Advices of those Doctors, as the other Books, which appeared.

Note, that Mr Varillas supposes, in the History of Henry II (79), that the Deputies of the Sorbonne, who had orders to complain of the Funeral Oration of Francis I, wherein Castellan had denied Purgatory, were also to accuse him of three other things, the second whereof was the suppressing of the Advices.

CASTELVETRO (LEWIS), a Modeneze, one of the most subtle Writers of the XVIth Century, is chiefly known by his Commentary on Aristotle's Art of Poetry. Messieurs Moreri and Teissier (a) will amply inform, concerning his History, those who shall consult them. I shall only dwell on a Particular, which they have not unfolded, and which concerns the Process he had at the Tribunal of the Inquisition [A]. He was a Man, who was too fond of criticizing [B]. Thuanus places his Death in the Year 1571.

If his too strong Inclination to criticize was blameable, his Weakness, in not bearing to be criticized, and the Passion which is imputed to him against his Censurers, were much more so. It is pretended, that he made use of violent means against them. His way of citing was very defective. I have spoken of it in the Preface to this Dictionary (b); but you may see that Matter more at large in the Continuation of the Menagiana (c). You may find there also, That Castelvetro's House happening to be set on Fire at Lyons, he cried out al Poetica, save my Poetry; and that the best Edition of That Book is That of Vienna in Austria. They might have added, that he had reason to shew, by the Cries he made during the Fire, that he looked upon That Work as the best Production of his Pen. By a like Sign it was known what Picture a famous Painter of Antiquity valued most. The other Writings of Castelvetro are much inferior to his Poetics, which is nevertheless

[A] I shall confine myself to the Process he had at the Court of the Inquisition. To avoid the Consequences of it, he retired into Protestant Countries. He would have presented himself before the Council, to have his Cause judged there; but the Pope sent word to his Legate, the Cardinal of Mantua, that, since Castelvetro had been accused before the Inquisition of Rome, he must come thither as an accused Person. The Pope caused him to be assured, that he would use him as mildly as he could; that, if he found him innocent, he would not only absolve him, but do him good also; and, if he found him guilty, he would exact nothing from him but a private Recantation. The Confidence, which Castelvetro put in these Promises of the Pope, did not last, and was of no use to him. He appeared before the Tribunal of the Inquisition, where he was three times examined (1); but, finding himself puzzled by the Questions, which were asked him, and chiefly because of a certain Book of Melanchthon, which he had translated into Latin, he fled; and chose rather to expose himself to the most infamous Sentence that could be pronounced against him for Contumacy, than to deliver himself up to the Discretion of his Judges, by imploring their Clemency. He retired to Basil, where he died, repenting of his Errors as an Author has said (2). Cardinal Palavicini thinks, that, in favour of Castelvetro's fine Writings, Credit ought to be given to That Author. Quamquam adjumentum quod ipius stylus suppeditavit politioribus jucundioribusque disciplinis, observatum raritate, commentationum subtilitate promeretur, ut grati animi causa fides benigne habeatur auctori narranti ipsum postremo resipuisse (3). — Too

[D] His Poetics are a Work, in which many Defects have been found.] Consult Mr de la Menardiere, in the Preface to his Poetics; and if you do not find That Work, have recourse to Mr Teissier, who has given some Extracts of it (9). Mr de Scudery, having refuted the Opinion of Tasso, That Morality is not a Poet's Object, who ought only to think of diverting others, adds, 'That Tasso was not alone in such an unreasonable Error: Castelvetro, though a great Man, carried the Extravagance much farther than he; and, after having spent half his Life time on Aristotle's Poetics, and exhausted all his Latin in that Work, has told us, that Poetry was only invented, per dilettae, & per ricreare gli animi della rozza moltitudine, & del commune popolo. — To amuse and divert the Minds of the Vulgar. Indeed it was well worth Aristotle's while to give himself the Trouble to prescribe Rules for that Art, if such was the end of it: and Castelvetro has well employed his time, if his Labour was only fit to divert the Mob.

He ought then to degrade Homer with the rest, and more than the rest, since there is scarce an Art or Science in all the Learning of Men, which is not found in the Iliad and Odyssey (10). I omit the other Observations, which he made against Castelvetro's Maxim.

[E] There are some posthumous Works of His.] The Work intituled, Le Rime del Petrarca sposte per Lodovico Castelvetro, was published by the Care of James Castelvetro, the Author's Nephew. This Nephew owns, that his Uncle had not put a finishing Hand to it, avvega che non habbiano ricevuto dal loro autore quella perfezione, che, vivendo egli, & rivedendogli, havrebbe potuto loro dare. He tells us in the Epistle Dedicatory, dated from Modena the first of February 1582, that the late John Maria Castelvetro, his Father, had published, 'Una operetta di Lodovico Castelvetro suo fratello — da lui dettata ne gli ultimi giorni della vita sua, per correggere alcuni falli da altri commessi in materia di lettere, & insieme con essa una giunta fatta dallo stesso suo fratello ad uno de libri della lingua di M. Pietro Bembo. — A Piece by Lewis Castelvetro, dated in the last Days of his Life, to correct some Faults committed by others, with respect to Literature, and also an Addition of the said Brother to Peter Bembo's Grammatical Observations on Petrarch.' That Exposition of Petrarch was printed at Basil, in 4to, in that Year, at the Expence of Peter Sedabunni, Bookseller.

CASTILE (ALPHONSUS X. of that Name, King of), more famous by his Application to Astronomy, than by his Crown, began to reign in the Year 1252. The first Troubles he met with proceeded from the unjust Fancy he took into his Head to repudiate his Wife (a), under pretence of Barrenness, and to look for another in the Court of Denmark. The King of Arragon, his Father-in-law, designed to oppose the Affront intended against his Daughter; but I cannot tell whether he would have succeeded in it; the Queen's being with Child, which was discovered when the Princess of Denmark arrived (b), was, without doubt, the true Reason why the Divorce did not go forward. The Queen passed from one Extreme to another; for she had nine Children; it was more than was necessary for her Husband's Happiness and Quiet: It was for his Sins that he had such a fruitful Wife (c). Yet he was not contented with this Fruitfulness, but got Children elsewhere by stealth. As for what concerns the Princess of Denmark, she did not return into her Country: The Archbishop of Seville, the King's Brother, quitted his Band for the Love of her, and married her: but this gave her but little Satisfaction; Vexation, and Repentment of the Injury, brought her soon to her end. Alphonsus was neither beloved by his Subjects, nor by the neighbouring Kings; yet his Reputation was very splendid in foreign Countries. His Knowledge, Parts, Eloquence, and Politics made a Noise there; which induced part of the Electors to confer (d) the Imperial Crown upon him [A], while the other part elected Richard, Earl of Cornwall, Brother to Henry, King of England. Alphonsus did not go to support, by his Presence, the Party, which had elected him; so that his Title of Emperor never was a real thing. They were tired with waiting for him; and, as the Suffrages could not be united in favour of his Competitor, (for he was dead) they proceeded to another Election. The Empire was given (e) to Rodolpbus, Count of Habsburg, notwithstanding the Oppositions of Alphonsus's Embassadors. The Pope acknowledged Rodolpbus for Emperor; and, not having been able to obtain of Alphonsus, who went to him at Beaucaire on the Rhone, the Renunciation of his Rights, he obtained it at last by the Threatnings of

[A] Part of the Electors conferred the Imperial Crown upon him.] They, who say, he refused it, are mistaken. Some have added a pleasant Remark to this Error; which is, that he was satisfied with the single Title of Emperor of the West: Imperium Germanicum oblatum recusavit, Occidentalis Imperatoris titulo contentus (1). When a King refuses a Kingdom, he does not reckon it among his Titles: and besides, the Empire of Germany, and the Empire of the West, are not different Dignities. The Truth is, that Alphonsus accepted the Empire, and really designed to go and take Possession of it; but, by being unseasonably, what Fabius was when there was occasion for it (2), he wholly ruined his Affairs. So that he was not satisfied with the Title; but against his Will he had nothing else. I find no kind of ground for what some say, that, after having refused the Empire, he suffered himself to be persuaded, by the interested Arts of the Pope, to accept it. 'Oblatum ab Electoribus imperium modestè deprecatus est, sapientiae suae vim eo ipso testatus. Postquam vero persuasionibus Pontificis of Excommunication, and granted him some Amends for his Loss on the Tythes of the Church [B]. I have said already, that this Prince was not beloved by his Subjects. He was exposed several times to the Plots of the Grandees, who knew very well how to hold Intelligence with the neighbouring Princes. At last he saw his Son Sanches at the Head of a powerful Faction, which grew very formidable by the Discontent the People were in on account of the Alteration of the Coin, and the unjust means he made use of to fill his Treasury. This Rebellion must have the more sensibly affected him, as it was accompanied with great Ingratitude; for he had consented (f), in favour of Sanches, to exclude the Sons of the deceased Prince Ferdinand, his eldest Son, from his Succession (g). It is true, he did it only to avoid the Troubles, which were to be feared from Sanches, if the Rights of Ferdinand's Children were not sacrificed to him. That Sacrifice brought only some Delay to the Civil Wars. Sanches, being sure of succeeding his Father, was not satisfied; he found, that Alphonso lived too long: Wherefore, tired with waiting some Years, he took up Arms, and strengthened himself with the Assistance of the King of Granada; he assembled the States of the Kingdom at Valladolid; he granted the Deputies all that they desired; and, if he refused the Title of King, it was either because he was satisfied with possessing the substantial Part of the Royal Authority, or the better to excite the Peoples Affection: in a Word, Prince Emanuel, his Uncle, pronounced Sentence of Deposition against the King in the Assembly of the States. In the mean time, the King held another Assembly, but much less numerous, at Toledo, where, being too desirous to preserve a certain Medium, he had not Boldness nor Circumspection enough. The Succours, he received from the King of Morocco, did him but little Service. The Curse, which he solemnly pronounced against Sanches, raised no Scruple in the Soul of this Rebel [C]: This hardened Son regarded neither the Thunders of his temporal Father, nor those of his spiritual Father; for he laughed at the Pope's Excommunication [D]. But some Cities left him, by reason of the Interdiction, which came from Rome, on those, who should follow his Party. Two of his Brothers left him also. The Death of Alphonso put an end to this Civil War, in the Year 1284. He ordered his Heart to be buried on Mount Calvary; but that Order was not performed. His Heart and his Bowels are at Murcia, and his Body at

‘Alexandri aures dedit qui sui commodi — causa cum instigavit ut oblatum imperii axioma à Germanis acciperet, & quem recularat titulum usurparet — multas — molestias — expertus est (3).’

‘— He modestly declined the Empire, offered him by the Electors, in which very thing he gave an Instance of his Wisdom. But after that, in compliance with the Persuasions of Pope Alexander, who, for his own Interest, pressed him to accept of the Empire offered him by the Germans, and take upon him the Title, he had refused, he experienced many Troubles.’ They add, that his Son deprived him of the Kingdom, and afterwards restored it to him again (4). The last of those two Facts is very false.

[B] The Pope made him some amends for his Loss on the Tythes of the Church. The Pope permitted him to appropriate the third Part of the Tythes to himself, which were used to be employed in building and repairing sacred Places. At that time the Kings of Castile began to lay hands on the Ecclesiastical Revenues. This is what Mariana tells us (5). But Mr de Mezerai goes farther: we must hear him. He says (6); King Alphonso yielded and remitted his Right to the Pope's Disposal, on the granting him the Tythes upon the Clergy of his Kingdom, to make War against the Moors. Thus the Amends, whatever happens, are always laid on the People, who pay all. For that time, the People were not charged anew; Had they not paid the Tythes without it? None but the Clergy suffered by it: Now they have good Shoulders; they need not be pained. Perhaps Mr de Mezerai meant, that the Clergy never wanted Inventions to make themselves amends on the People: That is another matter.

[C] The Curse, which he solemnly pronounced against Sanches, raised no scruple in the Soul of This Rebel. My Readers will not be displeased to find here the Words of Mariana. ‘Ab Alphonso Rege Hispalensi in publico conventu Sanctus furiali carmine devotus, & jure paterno diris execrationibus caput revinctus, regnique successione spoliatus est, octavo mensis Novembris die (7). — Sanches was solemnly cursed, with dreadful Imprecations, by his Father, in a public Assembly, and declared disinherited, on the eighth of November.’ Alphonso gained nothing by it; his Son felt no Remorse for it (8), and had also the Fortune to reign like a good Prince: so that he gave Salust's Maxim the Lye; ‘Imperium facile iis artibus retinetur quibus initio partum est (9).’ ‘Power is easily kept by the same Arts, by which it is at first gained;’ he exercised well an Authority, which he had criminally obtained. ‘Spoliati ejusque patris nota ad posteritatem infamis: alioqui in bonorum Principum numero; imperium enim flagitio partum bonis artibus exerceat (10).’ ‘Branded with Infamy to Posterity for depriving and banishing his Father: in other Respects to be reckoned among the good Princes; for he exercised that Authority well, which he had wickedly obtained.’ This is something: it is even very much.

[D] His Son laughed at the Pope's Excommunication. Let us see Mariana's Expressions again. ‘Novum, says he (11), ex Italia (subsidiis petitis) religionis objecta specie. Sanctius apud Martinum Pontificem Maximum per oratorem de impietate atque ingrati animi noxa postulat, superstitie patre in omnia regni jura invasisse, neque præ ambitione regnandi senis obitum expectare. Ergo in impiorum loco haberi mandatum est quicumque relicto Alfonso filii partes sequerentur: dati etiam judices à Pontifice in causa: urbes & oppida Sanctio addicta ex ritu Christiano sacrificiis interdixerunt. Itaque eodem tempore non eadem de causa in Aragonia & Castella sacrorum veluti justitium fuit, mæsta provincia, Sanctioque judicibus, si eos nancisceretur, extrema quævis comminanti. — A new Subsidy was demanded from Italy, on Pretence of Religion. Sanches was accused to Pope Martin of Impiety and Ingratitude, in seizing the Royal Authority during the Life of his Father, and, through an Ambition of reigning, not waiting the Death of the old King. It was decreed therefore, that whoever, deserting Alphonso, should follow the Party of his Son, should be deemed impious. The Pope likewise appointed Judges in the Cause: The Cities and Towns, which submitted to Sanches, were forbidden the use of Sacrifices after the Christian Manner. At the same time therefore, tho' not upon the same Account, there was, as it were, a Vacation, or Intermiſſion of the Performance of Religious

* Religious Rites, both in Arragon, and Castile; the Province being in Affliction, and Sanches threatening the Judges with the utmost Extremities, if they fell into his Hands. This is the Account he made of the Thunders of the Vatican; he threatened the Pope's Sub-delegates with the most rigorous Punishments, if they fell into his Hands.

[E] He was the first King of Castile, who permitted the public Acts to be drawn up in the vulgar Tongue. I cannot tell why Mariana attributes to that Regulation the Ignorance and Barbarity, which spread over Spain; for they were no less in France, tho' such a Regulation was not settled there till the Reign of Francis I. And it is as true, that the Study of fine Latin was never more in fashion in That Kingdom, than since it was ordered, that all the public Acts should be written in French. Let us hear Mariana: 'Primus Hispaniae regum vendendi atque pacificandi vulgari Hispanorum lingua potestatem concessit; eam linguam nimirum quae rudior erat excolere locupletareque eo decreto cupiebat; sacros Bibliorum libros in maternam linguam vertendos etiam curavit. Ex eo tempore in regis diplomatis ac publicis tabulis Latina lingua cujus antea usus erat desit usurpari, unde pudenda literarum ignorantia in nostram gentem atque utrumque ordinem invasit (12). — He was the first of the Kings of Spain, who granted leave to sell, and bargain in the vulgar Spanish Tongue; he desired, no doubt, by this Decree to cultivate and enrich That Language, which was the more barbarous; he took care likewise to get the Scriptures translated into the vulgar Tongue. From that time, the Latin Tongue, which was before in use, ceased to be employed in the Royal Mandates and Public Acts; from whence a shameful Ignorance of Learning ensued, and invaded both Clergy and Laity.'

[H] — the Censure, which he is said to have passed on the Works of GOD. Mariana says in general, that Alphonfus was so bold as to blame the Works of Providence, and the Construction of our Bodies (18). For the Proof of this Fact, he alleges but a vulgar Tradition, which had been preserved from hand to hand. It is a sign, that the contemporary History did not mention, and had not warranted, those Libertine Discourses of the King of Castile, to prevent doubting of it in future Ages. That Historian adds, that GOD most justly punished Alphonfus's rash Tongue by Sanches's Rebellion. 'Emanuel sane patruus (Sancti) suo & aliorum procerum nomine Alphonsum publica sententia in conventu pronunciata regno privavit, ea calamitate dignum quod divinae providentiae opera, & humani corporis fabricam, insigni linguae prociacitate ingenique confidentia accusare ausus fuerit, uti vulgo hominum opinio est, ab antiquo ducta per manus. Vocis stoliditatem nimen iustissime vindicavit. — Emanuel, the Uncle of Sanches, in his own Name, and in the Name of other Nobles, deprived Alphonfus of his Kingdom by a public Sentence; which That Prince merited for daring severely and boldly to censure the Works of divine Providence, and the Construction of the human Body, according to the common Opinion, founded on Tradition. Heaven most justly punished the Folly of his Tongue.' Although the Silence of so wise an Historian, as to the System of Ptolemy, ought to be of some weight; yet I believe, that, if Alphonfus exercised his audacious Censure on any part of the Universe, it was on the celestial Sphere. For, besides that he studied nothing more, it is certain, that, at that time, Astronomers explained the Motion of the Heavens by such intricate and confused Hypotheses, that they did no Honour to GOD, nor answered in any wise the Idea of an able Workman. So that it is likely it was from considering that Multitude of Spheres, of which Ptolemy's System is composed, so many eccentric Circles, so many Epicycles, so many Librations, so many Vehicles, that he happened to say, That if GOD had asked his Advice, when he made the World, he would have given him good Counsel (19). Before we proceed any farther, let us put a Salvo here, which a modern Author suggests to us (20). If the King of Castile had said conditionally, what they will have him to have said absolutely, he would have been very excusable: instead of the Words abovementioned, make use of these: That if GOD had made the World such, as is supposed in the System of Ptolemy, he might have good Advice given him for another time; and you will diminish the scandalous Boldness of Alphonfus very much. Lipsius does not report the thing, as if it concerned the Disposition of the Heavens in particular, but keeps to general Terms: 'Mitior, says he (21), Alphonfus X. Hispaniae regis, sed non melior vox aut sensus, qui solitus providentiam itidem culpae & dicere; si principio mundi ipse Deo adfuisse, multa melius ordinatusque condenda fuisse. — The Words and Meaning of Alphonfus X, King of Spain, were not a whit better, though less outrageous: This Prince used to blame Providence, and say, that, If He had been of GOD's Counsel at the Creation, many Things would have been contrived and ordered better.' Lipsius quotes no body; but Theophilus Raynaud (22), in relating this same Impertinence, alleges Mariana, Rodericus Sanctius (23), and Alphonfus Spina (24). A modern Compiler adds, 'That the King had no sooner spoken this Blasphemy, but the Thunder fell into the Bed where he

He says, pag. 15, of the Edition of Holland, The Confusion of all these Circles was so great, that, at a time wherein nothing better was yet known, a King of Arragon (a Fault of Imprecision, I believe, for King of Castile) a great Mathematician, but probably very little devout, said, that if God, &c.

very sure, that Mariana does not speak of it, and that he would have mentioned it, if any certain Tradition of such a wonderful Accident had been in Spain. Doubtless he knew what another Historian relates of it: Since then he has adopted nothing of it, we must believe, that he had great reason to look upon it as a Forgery. However it be, here are the Particulars of Rodericus Sanctius's Relation (26) Hist. Hispan. Part IV, cap. v.

(26). The King repeated his Blasphemy often, That, if he had been of GOD's Counsel at the Creation of Man, certain things would be in better order than they are. 'Si à principio creationis humanæ Dei altissimi consilio interfuisset, nonnulla melius, ordinatiusque condita fuisset.' The Governor of the Infant Emanuel saw an Angel in his Dream, who informed him, that it was resolved in the celestial Council, that Alphonfus should die dethroned, and even die a cruel Death, if he did not do Penance. That Governor asked the Reason of it: he was answered, that it was because Alphonfus had been so rash as to censure the Works of GOD: Blasphemiam Alphonfi vanamque temeritatem divina opera corrigere molientis id meruisse: and he was commanded to exhort That Prince to repent. The Governor obeyed; but Alphonfus laughed at him, and repeated his Blasphemy. He was then at Burgos. Some Days after, as he was at Segovia, an Hermit had a like Vision, and went and gave him an Account of it, and exhorted him to retract: the King was angry, and called him Fool, and continued in his Sin. The Night following there were such horrible Storms, accompanied with Thunder and Lightning, as if Heaven was falling. The Fire from Heaven burned, in Alphonfus's Chamber, the King and Queen's Cloaths; then the Prince in Distress sent for the Hermit, confessed his Sins to him, cried, humbled himself, and retracted his Blasphemy: The more he wept, the more the Storm diminished, and at last quite ceased. Rodericus Sanctius, in the beginning of this Relation, alleges the Annals of Spain (27), and in this at least it is not to be questioned but that he is mistaken; for, if the Annals had mentioned it, Mariana, who wrote after him, and who was infinitely more ingenious and judicious than he, would not have alledged only the popular Tradition, nor suppressed the Dreams, the Storms, and the Repentance. However, the French Compiler relates this Prodigy unfaithfully. A Lutheran Minister applies Alphonfus's Blasphemy to the System of the Heavens; and adds, that the Punishment of This King was, to die an Exile in a foreign Country (28). This is false; for he died at Seville (29), one of the Cities, which continued loyal to him.

[I] It is pretended, that Astrological Predictions were the Cause of the Misfortunes which crushed him.] It is said, that, knowing by Astrology, that he should be dispossessed of his Kingdom, he became so suspicious, so mistrustful, so cruel, that he raised an innumerable number of Enemies, which ruined his Affairs. It is very possible, that a Prediction, which is in itself only a Chimera, may become a most real Evil by the Course it makes one take. The Examples, which are alledged of Predictions that have been accomplished, are almost all built on this Foundation. But let us hear Mariana. 'Id fore astra memorant portendisse ejus artis non ignaro, si ars est & non potius inane mortalium ludibrium, quod à prudentibus semper accusabitur, & semper tamen patronos habebit. Ex eo ferunt suspicacem esse redditum, atque ex metu suscepta crudelitate magnam ejus odii partem constitasse quæ illi calamitati fuit (30). ---- They relate, that, through his Knowledge in Astrology, (30) Id. lib. xiv, cap. v.

he discovered by the Stars that it would be so; if That really be a Science, and not rather a vain Delusion, which prudent Men will always decry, and which yet will never fail of Patrons. Hence, they say, he grew suspicious, and, becoming cruel thro' Fear, raised great Part of That Odium against him, which was his Ruin.'

[K] The Sciences ---- with which he was adorned.] He understood Astronomy, Philosophy, and History, as if he had been only a Man of Letters, and composed Books on the Motions of the Heavens, and on the History of Spain, which are very fine. 'Quid admirabilius quam in castris educato armaque à prima ætate tractanti tantam fuisset astrorum, philosophiæ, rerumque gestarum cognitionem, quantam vix otiosi homines in umbra assequuntur? Extant de astrorum conversionibus, de Hispanica Historia ab Alfonso edita volumina magno ingenio, incredibili studio (31). ---- What can be more surprising, than that a Prince, educated in a Camp, and handling Arms from his Childhood, should have such a Knowledge of the Stars, of Philosophy, and the Transactions of Men, as Men of Leisure can scarce acquire in their Retirement? There are extant some Books of Alphonfus on the Motions of the Stars, and the History of Spain, written with great Skill, and incredible Care.' Rodericus Sanctius gives us to understand that Alphonfus had only ordered some learned Persons to write those Books. 'Idem Alphonfus rerum in orbe gestarum librum accommodatissimum per sapientes scribi fecit, quem generalem Historiam Hispani appellant (32). ---- Astrologus appellatus est. Cujus nomine, nescio an sapientia, tabulæ Alfonsoe & aliæ Astrologicae considerationes compilatæ sunt, & sub ejus regio nomine lustrantur (33). ---- Alphonfus caused a most useful Piece of what passed in the World to be written by some learned Men, which the Spaniards call a General History. ---- He is called an Astrologer; under whose Royal Name the Alphonfine Tables, and other Astrological Considerations, were compiled and published.' Those who can consult Nicolas Antonio (34) may doubtless satisfy their Curiosity on this Point. I cannot tell where a Minister of Rotterdam (35) has read what he says concerning Alphonfus's Knowledge of Law.

Without doubt this has no other Foundation, than what has been said above (36), concerning the Compilation of the Law-book, or Code, of Castile, made in the Reign of Alphonfus; which is not a Proof, that That Prince understood the Civil-Law, unless we will maintain, that Justinian was the most learned Civilian of his Age. Consider well what I quote out of Rodericus Sanctius, and you will not question, but that the Minister of Rotterdam's Words come from thence: it is perhaps from the thirtieth Hand. 'Alfonfus legibus condendis deditissimus fuit ---- leges enim Romanas in regnis suis legi fecit licet minime eis subiceretur. Reign. That great Work was finished by his Care. No regard was paid to his Will, by which he had left his Kingdom to his Grandson Alphonfus [L], by Entail to Ferdinand, the Brother of Alphonfus, and afterwards to Philip, King of France (i). Sanches maintained himself on the Throne, while his Nephews could scarce enjoy their Liberty. Jolante, their Grandmother, was fled with them in time to the Court of the King of Arragon, to avoid the Attempt, which their Uncle might probably form against their Life, even whilst Alphonfus was yet living, if he had them in his Power. So true it is, that the desire of reigning stifles all Sentiments of Humanity, and perverts all Justice! This Reflexion is made by Mariana [M].

'human Judicature, but those likewise, which concerned the Direction and Promotion of Divine Worship.' It would be to deceive one's self most grossly, to pretend, that Alphonfus himself was the Compiler of those Laws. He performed, in this, the Part, which Theodosius, Justinian, Lewis XIV, have acted in the Compilation of the Codes, which bear their Name. Mariana does not permit us to question it. They who say, that Alphonfus had read the Bible fourteen times (37), ascribe to him what belongs to another Alphonfus, King of Arragon and Naples, who lived in the XVth Century. I speak of it in his Article (38). It is not the only thing, which is taken from the latter, and ascribed to the former: Mr Hofman has attributed to the King of Castile, besides the fourteen times reading of the Old and New Testament, what Anthony Panormitanus reports concerning the King of Naples's Inclination to Learning, and concerning the Cure of a Fit of Sickness by the reading of Quintus Curtius. To make amends, Mr Lloyd transfers the King of Castile's Labour, and the Expenses of the Astronomical Tables, to the King of Arragon.

[L] He had left his Kingdom to his Grandson Alphonfus. Conclude from hence, that the Monk Don Peter de St Romuald has drawn from very muddy Springs what he wrote, 'that Alphonfus declared the youngest of his Children his Successor to the Crown, preferring him before his eldest Son Sanches, having found by the Rules of Astrology, that he would be most favoured by the Stars; which was the Cause of their mutual Hatred, and at last of the Death of that youngest Son, and of himself: for the Elder, not being able to bear his being disinherited, rebelled against him, made him die in Prison, and killed his Brother, and then seized the Crown (39). It is impossible to accumulate more Falsities than are here; and yet this Passage has (40), and will, serve many other Compilers for an Original.

[M] This Reflexion is made by Mariana. Let us set down his Words. *Violantes Castellæ regina nepotum ætatem in quos potissimum erat propensa ludibrio esse dolens Sanctio prælato, neque satis ab ejus injuria tutam, usque adeo omnia jura pervertit exitiabilis imperandi cupiditas fugam meditata — cum illis in Aragoniam abiit, Alfonso nequicquam cum res esset indicata prohibere conato dolenteque, adeo ut nulla sui propria regni clade moveri magis potuisset (41). — Gallo regi curæ erat ne in patris potestatem redacti salutis, libertatis certe periculum adirent, non ignaro naturam mortalium ambitiosam & imperii cupiditate in crudelitatem pronam esse (42). — Violante, Queen of Castile, being grieved, that the Age of her Grand-children, whom she was particularly fond of, was had in contempt, and Sanches preferred to them, and thinking that they were not safe from his Attempts (so far does the destructive Thirst of Power pervert all Justice!) fled with them into Arragon; Alphonfus, upon the News, endeavouring in vain to prevent it, and grieving more than for his own and his Kingdom's Misfortunes. — The French King, who knew that humane Nature was ambitious, and prone, through Lust of Power, to Cruelty, took care they should not fall again into the Hands of their Uncle, and risk at least their Liberty, if not their Lives.' This Picture is very good.*

CASTILE (BLANCHE of), Queen of France, Mother of St Lewis, had very great Qualities. She was Daughter of Alphonfus, the ninth King of Castile, and was married to Lewis of France, the eldest Son of Philip Augustus (a), the Twenty third of May, 1200. She was crowned, with her Husband Lewis VIII, the sixth of August, 1223, and declared Regent by That Prince's Last Will, in the Month of November, 1226. Their eldest Son, Lewis IX, began then his twelfth Year, and at that Time the Kings of France were not of Age 'till Twenty one Years complet. So that the Regency of this Lady was of Continuance long enough to give her an Opportunity of shewing her Ability and Courage. She stood in need of both these Talents; for the young King was scarce crowned, the first of December, 1226, but there arose a terrible Civil-War. The Princes and Grandees of the Kingdom confederated together, and laid for the Foundation of their Confederacy, That the Regency of the Kingdom was given to a foreign Woman (b). Blanche was not disturbed in such a nice and dangerous Conjunction, and, making use of all the means, that her Prudence could suggest to her, she baffled That formidable Party, as often as they renewed their Plots. It is said, that her Beauty was not useless to her [A] on these Occasions, and that it did her very good Services, without injuring her Honour. Every one is not agreed as to this last Point, and but few Queens have more experienced the Malignity of Slander. She

[A] Her Beauty was not useless to her.] A Modern Historian (1) speaks of that Beauty, as one would do in Clelia, or in some other Romance: he says; No Lady 'durst contest for Beauty with Blanche, and all of them confessed freely, That she infinitely out-did them in a good Mien. — Neither Seasons, nor Years, had altered her Beauty, and the Ten Children that she brought into the World neither diminished the Freshness nor the Delicacy of it. But let us come to the Matter in hand. Her Chastity, continues he, was impetrable; yet That Virtue was most doubted of during her Life, and after her Death. There are yet some Satires, which attack her in so nice a Part; and the worst was, That she gave Pretence to Calumny. She was persuaded of one of the most dangerous Principles, wherewith Ladies can be prepossessed, That there are Conjunctions, rare indeed, yet possible, which permit them to neglect the out-side of their Honour, provided they preserve the Solidity of it inviolably: that is to say, That Queen Blanche laid down for a Foundation of her Politics, that the might in Conscience endeavour to make such great Persons in love with her, as she despaired to engage in her Interests by any other way, when it concerned her was not only accused of Love Intrigues (c), but also of lending a Hand to those of the King her Son [B], to make him neglect the Government of the State, and to preserve a more absolute Authority. The particular Care she had taken in educating him [C], and the good Fortune wherewith she dissipated all the Storms, which were formed during his Minority, inspired this young Prince with much Respect and Affection for her. It may be affirmed, that he suffered her to assume too much Authority over him: History has preserved some Particulars of it [D], which persuade us, that this Queen had brought too haughty an Humour with her from her Country. It was not the way to correct it, to fall out, as she did, with the Queen her Daughter-in-law: On the contrary, That Rivalship in Authority could only render her Passions more imperious. It is easy to imagine, that St Lewis was not very quiet among all those Disputes between his Mother and his Wife; for, fearing to disgust the former, he durst not so much as caress the latter (d). He took his Wife with him into the Holy Land (e), when he engaged in the Crusade, and left the other as Regent in his Kingdom. It must be confessed, to the Glory of the Queen-Mother, That, though she expected, without doubt, to reign in the Absence of her Son, yet she endeavoured to dissuade him from that unfortunate Expedition (f). She did not live 'till the Return of St Lewis; for she died in the Year 1252 (g), having signalized herself in that second Regency by many prudent Actions, in divers nice Conjunctions. The Kingdom suffered much at that Time, by

to avoid or to end a Civil War. There will be but too many Proofs of it in the Sequel of this History. See the Article of THIBAUT, Earl of Champagne.

[B] She was accused — of lending a hand to the Gallantries of the King her Son. St Lewis shewed himself, all his Life-time, to be much addicted to Virtue; but it was almost impossible, that he should preserve the Appearance of Chastity before he was married. Private Persons stumble much more in that regard, than in all the other Duties of Christianity, either because their Constitution drives them with more force towards Impurity, than towards other Vices; or, because the Point of human Honour is incomparably more favourable to young Men, who sin against Chastity, than to those, who commit other Crimes. If this be true as to private Persons, much more will it be so with respect to a young Prince. Nevertheless it is pretended, that he, of whom we speak, did not stumble in so slippery a way. 'It is true, it did not please God, he should escape the Strokes of Calumny. It could not be imagined, that, being yet but Nineteen Years of Age, he could live without Blemish in the midst of the Dangers of a Court, and in a Place, where every thing prevents one's Desires. And besides, the corrupt Courtiers, pleased with authorizing their Disorders by the Example of their Prince, supported, (if they did not form them) some Reports, which ran, and which were accompanied with probability enough to alarm those, who interested themselves in his Virtue. A good Monk, among others, thought himself obliged to give the Queen notice of it, and told it her in such a manner, as to persuade her, that he questioned it less than he desired. Nay, he made her sensible, that she was suspected of knowing it as well as any Body, and that she troubled herself but little with what her Son did, provided she governed. She could hardly receive a more sensible Blow. But, considering the Zeal of That Fryer, more than the manner wherewith he spoke, she justified the King, and herself, with so much Modesty, that it was not possible to doubt, but that she thought herself assured of her Son's Chastity, and that, on her Part, she was not capable of having any Hand in the Faults he might commit. He was himself so far from it, and all his Actions shewed it so plainly, that those vain Reports vanished immediately, and for ever (2).'

[C] The particular Care she had taken in educating him. She suckled him herself, nor would suffer him to take any other Milk. A Circumstance is related about this, which is not only extremely singular, but also very proper to shew us how strongly she was possessed with this Resolution. 'One Day, when the Queen was in a violent Fit of a Fever, which lasted extraordinarily, a Lady of Quality, who, to please her Majesty, or to imitate her, suckled her own Child also, seeing little Lewis cry for Thirst, took upon her to give him the Breast. The Queen, coming out of her Fit, asked for her Son, and gave him her Breast; but little Lewis would not take it, either because he was satisfied, or because he did not like hot Milk, after having taken as much of the cool as he wanted. It was not difficult to guess at the Cause, and the Queen suspected it presently. She pretended to be in pain to thank the Person, to whom she was so much indebted for the good Office she had done to her Son in her Illness; and the Lady, thinking to make her Court, confessed, that the Tears of little Lewis had so sensibly moved her, that she could not forbear assisting him. But the Queen, instead of answering, gave her a scornful Look, and, putting her Finger in her Son's Mouth, compelled him, in that manner, to bring up all that he had taken. This Violence made all those wonder, who saw it; and the Queen, to make their Astonishment cease, said, That she could not endure, that another Woman should have a Right to dispute the Quality of Mother with her. So much they were then persuaded, that the suckling of Children made Part of their Education (3).'

[D] Her Son suffered her to assume too much Authority over him. History has preserved some particulars of it. This imperious Woman, having conceived some Hatred towards her Daughter-in-law, hindered her, as much as she could, from living with the King her Husband; and That Prince submitted, against his Will, to this new kind of Servitude. For, when he durst venture to go to his Wife's Bed, he took care not to be surprized there. Can you see a greater Tyranny, than That, which a Husband and a Wife suffer, who have not the liberty of performing the Conjugal Duty at their Pleasure? Queen Blanche would not so much as suffer her Son to visit his Wife, when dangerously ill. Let us prove all this by a cotemporary Author. The Reason, why the Queen did not love the King's Mother, was the severe Usage she received from her; for she would not suffer the King to visit, or be in Company with, the Queen his Wife, but forbade him as much as she could. And when the King went his Progress sometimes in his Kingdom, and had his Mother Queen Blanche, and his Wife Queen Margaret, along with him, his Mother commonly made them to be separated from each other, and they never lodged together. It happened one Day, that, they being at Pontoise, the King's Lodging was above That of the Queen his Wife, and he had instructed his Yeomen of the Hall in such a manner, that, when he had a mind to lie with the Queen, and when Queen Blanche was coming to the King or Queen's Chamber, they beat the Dogs, that they might make a Noise, which the King hearing, he would hide himself from his Mother: but the same Day Queen Blanche happened to find the King in the Queen his Wife's Chamber, who was come to see her, because she was very ill of a Miscarriage, and found the King hid behind the Queen, for fear he should be discovered; but the Queen-Mother perceived by the Fury of a great number of weak People (b), whom certain Fanatics infatuated [E]. The Oppression of the People under the Yoke of the Clergy was lamentable. A vigorous Action was done, to cure it in some measure [F]. The News of Blanche's Death afflicted the King her Son very much. The Queen her Daughter-in-law wept also heartily for it; but she was sincere enough to own the true Reason of her Tears [G]. Some Authors tell certain Things of Queen Blanche, which chiefly prepare the way for her Canonization [H]. On the other side, certain Monuments still remain of the Passion, which the Earl of Champagne had for her, which seem to signify, that he did not always sigh in vain. I shall speak of it in That Earl's Article. The new Historian of St Lewis vindicates her strenuously on that Article, but does not deny, that She had some Faults [I]. His manner of expressing himself engages me to set down his own Words.

(b) They are called Passoureaux. See the History of St Lewis, lib. x, pag. 113, & seq. ad Ann. 1252.

'perceived him, and took him by the Hand, saying to him, Come away, you have nothing to do here, and put him out of the Chamber. When the Queen saw, that Queen Blanche separated her Husband from her, she cried out aloud, Alas! will you not let me see my Lord, neither living nor dying? and saying so she fainted away, so that it was thought she was dead: and the King, thinking so too, returned immediately to see her, and recovered her from her swoon (4).'

[E] The Kingdom suffered — by the Fury of weak People, whom certain Fanatics infatuated. Queen Blanche did not at first discover their pernicious Errors. An Author 'makes it a very meritorious thing in her, that she owned she was mistaken in her Judgment of the Passoureaux; a very mean Praise, in my Opinion. For to take wicked Men for good Men is but an human Error, which may proceed from the Goodness of the Heart, and which Self-love takes a delight to confess: But if, being good Men, they had been calumniated, without any other Support than their Innocence, in that case such a Confession could not be praised too much, and in that case also it must be but seldom expected (5).' This Reflexion of the new Historian of St Lewis is very fine and judicious.

(5) History of St Lewis, lib. x, pag. 125.

THE Tyranny of the Chapter of Paris, punished by Queen Blanche.

[F] The Oppression of the People by the Clergy was lamentable. A vigorous Action was done, to cure it in some measure. 'The Chapter of Paris had imprisoned all the Inhabitants of Chatenai, and of some other Places, for divers Things, which were imputed to them, and which were forbid to Bondmen; for such was then the People's Condition, and especially the Inhabitants of the Country (6). They were sold with the Lands, as a Dependence, which belonged to it (7). So that a Crowd of those miserable People languished in the Prisons of the Chapter, where, wanting necessities for Life, they were in danger of being starved to Death. Blanche, moved to Compassion by the Complaints, which she received from them, sent to desire that, in Consideration of her, they might be released upon Bail, assuring, that she would inform her self of the Matters, and would do all manner of Justice. But the Chapter, after having answered, That no Body had any thing to do with their Subjects, and that they might put them to Death if they pleased, sent again to seize the Women and the Children, whom they had spared at first. Then, in hatred to see them honoured with such a Protection, they were used in such a manner, that many of them died either through Famine, or the Inconveniences they suffered by Heat, in a Place hardly able to contain them. Blanche, full of Indignation at an Action no less insolent than inhuman — went with main Force to the Prison of the Chapter, and ordered the Gates of it to be broken open: And, because some Difficulty might have been made about it, for fear of the Censures, so common in those Times, she gave the first Stroke with a Stick she had in her Hand. That Stroke was so well seconded, that the Gate was broke down in an instant, and a Crowd of Men, Women, and Children, came out with disfigured Faces, who, casting themselves at her Feet, prayed her to take them under her Protection, without which the Favour that she had done them would cost them very dear. She did it, and so effectually, that, after having seized on the Revenues of the Chapter, till they had submitted to the Authority, wherewith she was entrusted, she even obliged them to enfranchise those Inhabitants for a certain Yearly Sum. It was almost at that Time that those kind of Affranchisings began, or, at least, that they became very common. If any one thinks that I have cited too long a Passage here, they must complain, That, in shewing them a fine Piece of our Blanche's History, I have also exposed two or three very singular Facts to their View. So that their Complaint will be very ill grounded.

[G] The Queen, her Daughter-in-law, wept — But she had the sincerity to own the true Reason of her Tears. It would be a little surprizing, that a Queen, so constrained in her Matrimonial Rights, as the Wife of Lewis IX was, should be afflicted to see, that she should no longer find, at her return into France, The Author of her Constraint. The Sire de Jonville did not fail being surprized at the young Queen's Affliction; he knew how much, and for what reason, she hated the deceased; but see here the unfolding of his Surprise: 'After I was gone out of the King's Chamber, says he (8), Madam Mary de Bonnes vertus came and desired me to go and comfort the Queen, who was very much afflicted. When I was come into her Chamber, and saw her cry so bitterly, I could not forbear telling her, That Womens Tears are not to be believed; for the Moan that she made was for the Woman she hated most in the World. Then she told me, That it was not for her that she cried, but for the great Uneasiness wherein the King was, and also for their Daughter, who was left in the keeping of Men: who was since Queen of Navarre. He adds the Occasion of this Hatred: It is, says he, because Queen Blanche hindered the King her Son, as much as she could, from lying with his Wife: And the Reason why the Queen did not love the King's Mother, was, the great Severity with which she treated her; for she would not suffer the King to visit or keep the Queen his Wife Company, but hindered it as much as she could (9).'

(8) Jonvil. ubi supra, pag. 262.

[H] They relate certain things of her, which prepare the way for her Canonization. She was not contented to be enrolled in the third Order of St Francis, according to the Devotion of those Times (10), but she made also Profession of the Order of Citeaux (11), to the Abbess of Maubuisson, a few Days before she died. When she was brought to That Abbey (12), where she would be buried, she was dressed with Royal Ornaments over her Religious Habit (13). But this is no very extraordinary Thing. I do not mention it as a Proof of what is in Question here: I only think it has been of some use to procure, in Process of Time, the Title of Blessed to Queen Blanche, to place her in some Martyrologies, and to relate some Miracles and Apparitions about her (14).

'Few Princesses, says he (15), have been seen, who deserve to be cleared from so many Calumnies, if this were a Place for it. Not that she never committed any Faults. By what Privilege should she be exempted from them? She was a Woman, and reigned. But, if some Faults are found among so many great Qualities, ought she therefore to be exposed to Malice, and to the fantastical Judgments of those, who are pleased to undervalue what is so universally esteemed? She had perhaps too much haughtiness in respect of the Grandeess, in her first Regency: and, perhaps

CASTOR, an ancient Author. See the Remark [O], of the Article DE-JOTARUS.

CASTRITIUS (MARCUS) was a Magistrate of Placentia, in the 669th Year of Rome [A], when the Consul Cneius Carbo, endeavouring to engage all the Towns of Italy in the Party of Marius, against Sylla, required Hostages of them. As Castritius would not suffer the Inhabitants of Placentia to give him any, Carbo pretended to frighten him, by saying, that he had many Swords; and I many Years, answered Castritius; and the thing went no farther. A like Answer was made by Solon, and by some others [B]. They meant by it, that the few Years, which remained, were not worth the making a false Step. This Castritius cannot be He, whom Cicero mentions in the Oration for Lucius Flaccus; for it appears by the Honours, which the Inhabitants of Smyrna did to the latter, that he did not die very old (a). Besides Cicero expresses himself in a manner, which shews that he had not a very great Opinion of that Man's Merit. The same Cicero speaks elsewhere of a MARCUS CASTRITIUS (b), who is, doubtless, different from the other two; for he praises him in earnest, and says, that Verres, being Pretor in Sicily, made him some Presents. Now the Magistrate of Placentia was very old, when Verres was yet but Questor, under Cneius Carbo, in the Six Hundred and Sixty ninth Year of Rome.

[A] He was a Magistrate of Placentia, in the 669th Year of Rome.] The Commentary Variorum on Valerius Maximus places this Event in the Year of Rome 621; which is a great Blunder: But Mr Moret de la Fayolle, who places it in the 667th Year, and Father Cantel (1), who places it in the 671st Year, have their Reasons for it: They follow some Fassi Consulares, two Years different from others. I cannot tell upon what Mr de la Fayolle builds, when he calls Cn. Castritius him, who has the Prænomen of Marcus, in Valerius Maximus, whom he cites. See his History of the Roman Commonwealth (2). In the Supplement to Moret, this Article is placed under the Word Castriatus. We shall say hereafter (3), that Charles Stephens has committed the same Fault.

[B] He made to Carbo an Answer, like That, which had been made by Solon, and some others.] I shall set down what is found in Cicero upon this Subject: 'Hoc illud est quod Pisistrato tyranno à Solone refponsum est, cum illi quaerenti qua tandem ipse fretus sibi tam audaciter obfisteret, respondisse dicitur, senectute (4). — This is the Answer Solon gave to Pisistratus the Tyrant, who asking him, upon what Hope relying, he so boldly resisted him, the other is said to have replied, On old Age.' Confidius made a like Answer to Julius Caesar (5), and Cesellius to the Triumviri (6). CASTRITIUS (TITUS) taught Rhetoric at Rome, in the II^d Century, with more Reputation than any of his Contemporaries. Aulus Gellius, who was his Disciple, speaks of him as of a Man of great Importance (a), and of great Judgment; and it is easy to know, by his Remark on a Period of a Speech of C. Gracchus (b), that he ingeniously discerned those false Thoughts, which become almost imperceptible, when they are hid under the harmonious Cadence of fine Language. Another Sign of his discerning Faculty appears elsewhere (c) [A]. His Probity contributed, no less than his Learning, to make him esteemed by the Emperor Hadrian (d), and, if it be never so little considered, how he censured some Senators, whom he instructed (e), and who appeared one Day before him, clothed in a manner very unbecoming their Rank [B], I mean undressed, and, as we should say at present, in a Morning-Gown, we shall easily perceive, that he preserved the grave

[A] We meet with another Sign of his discerning Faculty.] It was when he refused some Critics, who took it ill, that Metellus, making a Speech to the People, to recommend Marriage to them, had owned, that it was a necessary, troublesome, State. 'Si sine uxore, Quirites, possemus esse, omnes ea molestia careremus. Sed quoniam ita natura tradidit, ut nec cum illis satis commode, nec sine illis ullomodo vivi possit, saluti perpetue potius quam brevi voluptati consulendum (1). — If, my Countrymen, we could all live without Wives, we should be free from this Trouble. But since Nature has so ordered it, that we can neither live conveniently with them, nor at all without them, we should consult a lasting Happiness, rather than a short Pleasure.' It is, said they, as much to deter People from Marriage, as to advise them to it; and they shewed how he ought to have turned the Thing. It cannot be denied, that they gave a good Turn to it. But Castritius reprehended them, that a Man of Metellus's Character, who exercised the Censor's Office at that Time, ought to speak otherwise than a Rhetorician; that a Rhetorician is permitted to make use of false and captious Reasons, and that it is a Shame for him not to make the best of a bad Cause; that it is not the same with a Magistrate, who is venerable by the Gravity of his Manners, and by his Dignity; for he ought not to say any thing in public, of which he and others are not convinced, and chiefly when the Question is about a Fact exposed to daily Experience, and public Evidence (2); and therefore that Metellus had done well to acknowledge what was plain to every Body, by which he had made himself more fit to establish the important Point, on which he spoke (3); for his Ingenuity, having sheltered him from all Suspicions of Disguise and Art, disposed the Auditors to believe the rest.

(1) A. Gellius, lib. i, cap. vi.

[B] He censured some Senators — who appeared — clothed in a manner unbecoming their Rank.] It is hard to guess what Mr Moret meant, when he made A. Gellius say, that Castritius made use of great Severity against two of his Auditors, who were too magnificently dressed. I. A. Gellius does not re-grave Spirit of ancient Rome. It cannot well be determined, whether he was the Son, or a Relation, of That Castritius, whom Pliny cites, as an Author, who had written of Gardening (f) [C], nor whether those two descended from a Castritius, who discovered Murena's Conspiracy to Augustus (g), and whom That Prince helped afterwards out of a very bad Business, only by the way of Intercession.

duce the censured Auditors to two; he says, discipulos quosdam suos. II. He adds, that they were Senators; and this is what Mr Moreri ought not to have suppressed. III. He does not say, that they were too magnificently dressed, but, on the contrary, that Castritius saw them tunicis & lacernis indutos, & Gallici calceatos. These Faults are corrected in the Edition of this Country; but they have cited the Twenty first Chapter of the thirteenth Book of A. Gellius, instead of citing the twentieth, which Mr Moreri quoted right (4); and they have over-looked what he said, that Castritius was more commonly called Castroitius; for they have retained his Castritius, see Castroitius, and given the Article of This Rhetorician under the Word Castroitius, as he has done. Note, that it is no mistake to cite Chapter 21: there are Editions, which cite thus the Chapter relating to Castritius; but, there being others, in which it is Chapter 20, to correct it right, it should be said; See the thirteenth Book of A. Gellius, Chapter 20, according to some Editions, or Chapter 21, according to others. Charles Stephens gives the Name of Castratius both to That Rhetorician, and to the Magistrate of Placentia; two Articles which do not appear in Lloyd's Dictionary. Mr Hofman, who copied them from Charles Stephens, advertises, in the Article of the Rhetorician, that it must be read Castritius, and he lengthens his Original, to refer us to the Censure of the two Auditors, too well clothed, in A. Gellius, severitatem ejus contra duos auditores nimium ornatos. This it is to trust to bad Guides.

[C] We cannot determine, whether he was the Son, or a Relation, of that Castritius, whom Pliny cites as an Author, who wrote about Gardening. Father Hardquin (5) censures a Mistake of Simler, who has said (6), that Titus Castritius, mentioned by A. Gellius, wrote a Book, intitled Cepurica (7), out of which Pliny took many Things. If the Fountain-heads were consulted, these Mistakes would be avoided, and then Simler would have found, that A. Gellius speaks of a Castritius, whose Disciple he was, and, consequently, who could not have wrote Books, quoted by Pliny.

CATALDUS, one of the Saints of the Church of Rome, and the particular Patron of the City of Taranto, was Bishop of the same City (a). It is reported, That, about a thousand Years after his Death, he appeared to a Priest, and said to him, Go and dig up a Book, which I have composed, and which I hid in such a Place; carry it immediately to the King: It is a Work, which contains the Secrets of Heaven. It was in a Dream that he appeared to this Priest, and gave him this Order: He repeated this Apparition divers times; for little Faith was given to this Dream, and his Order was not obeyed. At last he shewed himself in another manner; the Curate being alone in his Church, and perfectly awake, saw St. Cataldus in his Episcopal Ornaments, who commanded him to go and dig up his Book the next Day, in the Place he had shewed him in his Dream, and to carry it speedily to the King. He threatened him with severe Punishment in case of Disobedience. The Priest proved more tractable at that time; for the next Day early he walked in Procession with the People to the Place, where That Work was buried. It was found there in a leaden Box (b); and they found, that it contained the Miseries, which would speedily oppress the whole Kingdom of Naples, and of which you will find the Description in the Writer whom I cite (c). It is pretended, that this happened in the Month of April, 1492 (d). Some affirm, that this prophetic Book gave some Hopes, that the Kingdom of Naples would be secured from this approaching Ruin, provided the King should execute what St. Cataldus prescribed to him [A]. This Clause, of which Alexander ab Alexandro makes no mention, might confirm the Suspicions of those, who take this for a pious Fraud [B]. They would not be contented with meer Suspicions, if they had read

[A] He appeared to a Priest — and directed him to a Book, concerning the Miseries, from which the Kingdom of Naples might be secured, provided the King should execute what St. Cataldus prescribed to him.] This Condition is mentioned by Spondanus. Nimirum mense Aprili, ex revelatione prædicti Sancti repertum fuisse librum tabellis plumbeis ab eo dum viveret jussu divino scriptum, obferatumque; quo vaticinium continebatur de calamitatibus & miseriis quibus regnum vexandum esset, nisi Rex, ad quem illico librum mitti præcepit, ad accusum observaret quæ in eo præcepta reperiret (1). — To wit, that, in the Month of April, by the Revelation of the aforesaid Saint, a Book was found, in a leaden Box, written by him, during his Life, in pursuance of a divine Command, and locked up; in which was contained a Prophecy of the Calamities and Miseries, which the Kingdom was to suffer, unless the King, to whom he ordered the Book immediately to be sent, should exactly observe what he should find prescribed in it. He adds, that Philip de Comines spoke of this Work of St. Cataldus. But this cannot be said, without taking too much Liberty; for Philip de Comines makes no kind of mention of This Saint. These are his Words: Le Roy Ferrand — porta grande passion en son cœur de voir venir sur luy cette armée — & si trouva un livre escrit, comme m'ont certifié des plus prochains de luy, en deffaisant une chappelle; où y avoit dessus: La Vérité, avec son Conseil secret: & vœut l'on dire qu'il contenoit tout le mal qui luy est advenu: & n'estoient que trois à la voir: & puis le jetta au feu (2). — King Ferrand — took it much to Heart, to see so great an Army come against him — and found a Book written (as those that were near him have assured me) at the demolishing of a Chapel, whereupon were these Words, Truth with it's secret Council; wherein it is pretended all the Evil that happened to him was contained. Three Persons only saw it; and he threw it into the Fire.

[B] This Clause confirms the Suspicions of those, who take this for a pious Fraud.] It is certain, that Ferdinand King of Naples, and his eldest Son, led a scandalous Life, and tyrannically oppressed the People (3). They feared the Preparations and Confederacies, which were forming against the Kingdom of Naples. The People always fear such Wars; but they are chiefly more afraid of them, when they imagine, that the Crimes of the Sovereign, and his long Impenitency, have exposed him to the Wrath of God. It is then necessary to have recourse to the read the Passage I shall cite out of a cotemporary Author, who relates the History and the Motives of the Imposture [C]. It is not agreed where Cataldus was born, nor at what time he lived; some say he was born in Scotland, others in Ireland. There the most proper Expedients, to avoid the public Misfortunes; it is a very good Expedient to pretend a Prophecy, which may affect the Sovereign, and inspire him with such a good Amendment of Life, that his Subjects may promise themselves the Assistance and Protection of appeased Heaven. So that it is probable, that, in those Times, some Persons, well affected to the public Good, thought on this religious Contrivance: a Box of Lead was made; a Book was put in it, which contained what was thought necessary; it was buried; an Ecclesiastic was produced, who declared, that, sleeping and waking, he had received an Order, of the utmost Importance, from St Cataldus; the Book was easily found in the Place directed to, with the Threats and necessary Counsels in it. Here are then divers Circumstances, fit to persuade, that the Discovery of that Prophecy was an artful Contrivance; but, if it be supposed, that Cataldus threatened only, and that he did not prescribe a certain Method to Ferdinand to prevent the Calamities, it is much harder to discover, that there was a religious and politic Trick in it.

I need not say, that there is no manner of likelihood, that Cataldus buried such a Book, or that, after many Ages, he revealed That Treasure, and ordered it to be presented to King Ferdinand; but, as it is probable, that such a Thing was pretended, it will not be improper to touch upon the Reasons, which might make one doubt of it. I say, that the Fact of That Supposition is probable; for, besides the Use which might be hoped for it, in the Necessities of the State, and the Unquietness of the People, we have a cotemporary Author, who reports for a certainty (4), that this Book was dug up. He not only lived at that time, but dwelt near the Place, which was the Scene of the Event. He affirms, that the People accompanied the Priest in Procession, who dug up That Prophecy. Moreover, he is a learned Man. Could he be deceived in such a Fact? Durst he have told a Lie on such an Adventure? This is what causes a Belief, that a Prophecy of St Cataldus was supposed. But here are some Reasons to question it. That Author, with his great Learning, shews much Credulity. Philip de Comines, speaking of a prophetic Writing, shewed to King Ferdinand (5); does not speak of Cataldus, nor of the other Circumstances, mentioned by Alexander ab Alexandro. It may then reasonably be believed, that those, who related to him what concerned That Writing, told him nothing concerning the Apparitions of That Saint, nor concerning the Procession, which is supposed to have marched at the Discovery of the Book. It is therefore very likely, that no such Procession was made; for, if it had been made, it would have been the first Thing that would have been told to Philip de Comines. Now if Alexander ab Alexandro deceives us in this Point, he deserves no Credit in the rest.

Having mentioned the Reasons to believe, and the Reasons to doubt, I must add, that, the other Day one of my Friends maintained against me, that it is impossible to attain to a full Certainty about this. He said, we are too far distant from that time, and no verbal Processes were made of That Adventure; or, if any were made, they could not at present exclude all Suspicions. I have observed, in another Article (6), the prodigious Negligence of those, who love to relate mysterious Events: they take no Precautions against those, who are not disposed to believe any thing of it: they want Charity for those, who stand most in need of it. Why do they not cause legal Informations to be made? Why do they not cause verbal Processes to be drawn up? For Example, the Tarantines ought to have desired the Magistrates to cause to be engraved on a Pillar, that, on such a day, such a Priest had dug up a Book in the Presence of all the People, and that he had taken his Oath, that St Cataldus had appeared to him, &c. (7). An authentic Copy of the Act, that the Magistrates had drawn up, ought to have been sent to the Places where the Records of the Kingdom were kept; the Ambassadors of all the foreign States ought to have been desired to send their Masters such a Copy. You will tell me, that the Legend of St Cataldus, cited by Spondanus, witnesses this great Event: I answer, that it is only of use to those, who have no need of it. They, who believe such a thing on the Credit of a Legendary, would believe it as well on a Hearsay; and they, who are incredulous, and consequently Objects of Charity for the great Promoters of extraordinary and ill proved Adventures, are not moved with the Testimony of the Legend. So that they are cruelly forsaken, when the Remedy that should cure them is neglected.

For the rest, let us not wonder, that it is difficult to averr things, which are said to have happened towards the end of the XVth Century; for I do not think it possible for private Men to discover certainly what concerns the Blacksmith of Salon (8). The thing is yet fresh; it is but two or three Months ago (9), that he was sent to Paris, to acquit himself of a Commission, which an Apparition had given him, to go and tell the King certain things. He was at Paris, and at the Court, and was sent home again. This is all that is certain of it; a thousand other Facts, which have been vended in the public News, are doubtful; for some Persons deny them, and others affirm them: Some maintain, that he spoke to the King himself; others say that he spoke only to a Secretary of State. The most indefatigable Inquisitors would lose their Patience, before they had cleared the Truth, buried under a Heap of opposite Affirmations and Negations. The strangest and most likely thing to deceive Posterity is, that an anonymous Author had the Presumption to cause a Letter to be printed (10), wherein he relates I know not what familiar Conversations he had with the Blacksmith of Salon. He sets forth many strange Particulars, which cannot be sufficiently wondered at. Must the Public be so soon deceived, and must a Snare so soon be laid for Posterity? Should any thing be suffered to appear about this, but what is well attested, and may pass for an incontestable Fact? For our part, let us advertise the Public to reject these Impostures. The Audaciousness of those Writers cannot be better punished than by giving no Credit to their Relations. The News Writer, who declared he believed the anonymous Author's Letter to be apocryphal, when he published it (11), is much to be praised: This will serve for something in a proper Time.

I have given you the Particulars of a long Conversation, wherein Mr - - - maintained to me, that we cannot be assured, that the Discovery of the pretended Book of St Cataldus was made in Taranto. We shall see presently, that he went too fast, and that the Reality of that Procession, and its Consequences, is a Fact certain enough.

[C] I shall cite a Passage - - - which shews the History and the Motives of the Imposture. I desire my Reader to look upon the foregoing Remark only as a Picture of the Vanity of Conjectures; I speak of the most plausible Conjectures, which can be made, when the Circumstances of an Action are but imperfectly known, and when we judge of things without hearing both Parties. We hear but one of them in the present Business, if we only consult Alexander ab Alexandro, and those who have copied him. And therefore we run the hazard of making fallacious Conjectures, what care soever we take to consult Probability. To proceed prudently in it, we ought to enquire, whether other Authors, as credible as he, have not related the thing differently. I have found one, who informs me, that the Account of that Writer is That of the People, and that some learned Persons, acquainted with the Court, related that Adventure after another manner. Jovian Pontanus informs me, that a bold and ambitious Spanish Monk set up for a Preacher, though he knew nothing.

(7) Note, that this Inscription ought to have been made during the Novelty of the Event; for, without that, it would not be a good Proof at this time.

There are some, who pretend, that he lived in the IVth Century, or the beginning of the VIth; but Johannes Juvenis says, that he converted the Tarentines, in the Year 160 (e), after the Ascension of the Son of God, or else in the 166th Year of the Christian Æra (f). Bartholomew Moron, and Bonaventura Moron his Brother, who have written his Life, the one in Prose, and the other in Verse (g), follow, very nearly, the same Chronology, since they assert, that he entered into Taranto under the Pontificate of Anicetus, and in the Reign of Marcus Aurelius, about the Year 170. Dempster makes him flourish after the middle of the IVth Century (h). Alexander ab Alexandro makes him younger about an hundred Years. Consult the learned Usher (i), who maintains, that Cataldus was not born in Scotland, as Dempster pretends, but in Ireland; and he quotes several Authors. I am surprized that he was ignorant of the Passage of Jovian Pontanus, which I have set down in the Remark [C].

thing. He preached with so much Audaciousness, that he boasted of a particular Communication with an Angel, of whom he learned, as he said, what he taught the People concerning Religion: He affirmed, that That Angel revealed to him what Persons enjoyed the Blessedness of Heaven, or suffered in Hell (12). Lastly, Not being able to persuade Ferdinand to drive all the Jews out of his Kingdom of Naples, as his Cousin Ferdinand, King of Arragon, had expelled them from his Dominions, he bethought himself of a Trick. He engraved what he pleased on a leaden Plate, pretending that St Cataldus was the Author of it, and buried This Piece of Metal under the Wall of an half ruined Chapel near Taranto. Three Years after, having suborned a Priest, who declared that St Cataldus had appeared to him, &c. he caused That Piece of Lead to be digged up. Some Enigmatical Words were found in it, which tended to acquaint the King, that he was bound to extirpate Judaism. The pretended Order of Cataldus was, that Ferdinand should not read That Writing, but with one of his Servants, whom he should know to be most virtuous and faithful. This Prince discovered the Cheat, and did not employ the Monk to decypher the Prophecy. The Monk was so angry at it, that he inveighed against every body: He could hardly spare St Cataldus; and he grew so hot, that all the States of Italy, and chiefly the Court of Rome, were alarmed at the Discovery of the leaden Plate. A great number of Persons, who understand Latin, have not Pontanus's Books; therefore they will be well pleased to find his Narrative here in the original Tongue: 'Denique cum Ferdinando persuadere arte nulla aut ratione posset, ut universam Judæorum gentem omnino exterminaret: ò regni finibus, exemplo Ferdinandi patris Hispaniarum regis, Tarenti cum ipse ageret, commentum hoc inivit. E plumbo tabulam divi Cataldi nomine clanculum à se inscriptam haud Taranto procul in facello semiduro sub parietem occultui, quam triennio post erucendam curavit, corrupto sacerdote, qui diceret, in somnis assistisse sibi Cataldum monstrantem quo in loco tabella esset abdita, commonentemque uti cum populo supplice, collegioque sacerdotum, iret ad effodiendam illam, quam effossam curaret ad regem deferendam, communicandam ab eo uni tantum viro, quem è suis optimum nosceret, ac maximè fidem. Deum enim iratum illi futurum, clademque ac calamitatem immisurum, ni quod in tabula scriptum esset, & cautum, à rege præstaretur. Scriptum verò ipsum per ambages quasdam ac latebricosa verba eò spectabat, uti Judæorum exterminatio indicaretur. Rex accepta tabula deprehendit fraudem, qua deprehensa minime Franciscum ad eam legendam secum adhibuit, arbitratus eum interpretaturum verba in eam sententiam, dissimulavitque rem ipsam summa cum tacurnitate ac prudentia. At Franciscus re cognita, furore percitus, quòd tantum commentum falsum eum habuisset, non populo, non regi, vix ipsi Cataldo publicis pepercit in predicationibus, in tantumque incanduit, ut Italia ferme omnis, ipseque in primis Romanus Pontifex de tabulæ hujus fuerit inventione sollicitus, atque anxius (13). Note, that Philip Camerarius relates the Story of the Neapolitan Civilian (14) as a true History: It is in the second Volume of his Historical Meditations (15). He adds to it Philip de Comines's Words. Simon Goulart, the French Translator of That Work of Camerarius, has often inserted his own Collections in it between Crochets: I am certain he would have inserted Pontanus's Narrative with all his heart, if he had known it. He has inserted another Fact in that Place, which may properly be produced here: 'John de la Gessie, Secretary of the Chamber to Francis de Valois, Duke of Alençon and Anjou, caused his poetical Works to be printed at Antwerp by Plantin, in the Year 1583. In the sixth Book of the Miscellanies, pag. 678 and 679, he translates a Latin Prediction of Cataldus against the Apocalyptic Babylon, beginning with these Words, Heu heu plange, infelix Babylon. This is all the Latin that is there, the Poet having been contented to give Forty two French Verses, which mention wonderful Exploits of a King of France, his signal Victories, and his Death on Mount Calvary, after a long Course of Years employed in War. He promises at that time a great Restoration of Things, and speaks of it as of the end of the World: which I would not decypher more particularly for good Reasons (16). Here we have an Example of prophetic Cheats. The pretended Book of St Cataldus concerned only the Kingdom of Naples, and it was scarcely seen by any body. And yet here is a French Poet, who, an Age after, pretends that there were Threats in it against the Babylon of St John, and most magnificent Promises for a King of France. They, who make use of such kind of Contrivances, are very glad to screen themselves under some great Name. That of Cataldus seemed fit for this Design; and thus they built one Cheat upon another. You must remember, that Pontanus's Narrative made no great Progress, and did not stop the Course of Lies. There are some Writers, who relate the Discovery of Cataldus's Predictions as a Truth, without making any mention of the other Relation: Bartholomew Moron does so, in the Life of St Cataldus, which he wrote: he quotes the Records of the Church of Taranto, the Testimony of Alexander ab Alexandro, and what he might have read in the first Chapter of the eighth Book of Peter Galatin, De Ecclesia destituta (17). Antony Caraccioli published, at Naples, in the Year 1626, an anonymous Annalist, with four other ancient Chronologers. This Annalist says, that, in the Year 1494, were dug out of the Ground some leaden Plates, on which St Cataldus had engraven his Prophecies, and spoke of the sudden Death of the King; and that the King accordingly did die immediately after they presented that Monument to him. 'Isto anno mccccxciiii. fuit repertus Tarenti liber Sancti Cataldi consistens in tribus laminis plumbeis, videlicet duabus extremis semiscriptis, & media scripta ex utroque latere; qui præsentatus fuit Domino Regi, loquens de dicti Regis repentina morte; & sic fuit repente mortuus (18). We have seen, that This Discovery is placed in the Year 1492. This did not serve the turn of our Annalist; he wanted that the King of Naples should die suddenly; but found no such thing at that time; he therefore pitched upon the Year of Ferdinand's Death.

CATIUS,

CATIUS, an Epicurean Philosopher, whom Cicero mentions [A]. Horace speaks also of him in one of his Satires, if we believe the Commentators [B]. Mr le Fevre confuted them by Arguments, which Mr Dacier, his Son-in-law, opposed [C], making use of the Liberty which prevails in the Commonwealth of Learning.

[A] Cicero mentions him.] He says, that Catius called Speſtra what Democritus and Epicurus had called εἰδῶλα; whereby they understood the Images, which represent the Objects of the Senses to us, and which the School-men call Intentional Species. He says also, that Catius had not been long dead, and gives him the Surname of Infabrer. These things are found in a Letter (1), which he writ to That Caius Cassius, who conspired against Cæſar, and who was much addicted to the Epicurean Sect. This Man, thinking that Cicero had rallied the Epicureans on their Rusticity, because of those Speſtra of Catius, answered him (2), that he would quote so many Rustic Stoics, that he would make him confess, that Catius was of Athens. He adds, that Catius was one of the ill Interpreters of Epicurus's Words; and, because he says so on occasion of a very grave Sentence of the Head of the Sect, viz. (3) That a Man cannot live voluptuously, without doing that which is good and just, he gives us to understand, that Catius, explaining the Doctrine of εἰδῶλα very badly by his Speſtra, was moreover one of those unworthy Epicureans, who understood of the Voluptuousness of the Body, what their Master meant only of the Joy of the Soul. This is, without doubt, the chief Foundation of those, who will have it, that Horace made choice of Catius, to set forth divers Kitchen Precepts and Maxims, fit to turn the Parasites and voluptuous Epicureans into Ridicule, Epicuri de grege porcos.

[B] Horace ----- likewise, if we believe the Commentators.] If it is an Error to pretend, that the Catius of Cicero, and the Catius of Horace, are the same Person, People have been a long time mistaken on that Subject; for we read in the old Interpreters of Horace, that That Poet, to laugh at the Epicureans, made use of the Person of M. Catius the Epicurean, Author of four Books about the Nature of Things, and the Supreme Good. We find there also, that the same Catius boasted in his Work, when he treated of any thing relating to Paffry (4), that he was the Inventor of it: Hæc primus invenit & cognovit Catius Miltiades, said he, speaking of himself. It must not be questioned, but that the Author of those four Books is the same, of whom Quintilian spoke thus in the first Chapter of the tenth Book of his Institutions: Catius, of the Sect of the Epicureans, is no profound Author; but is however agreeable: In Epicureis levis quidem sed non injucundus tamen autor est Catius. Neither must it be questioned, but that This Man is the Catius Insuber of Cicero. The Surname of Miltiades might occasion a Difficulty, and determined Crugnius to believe, that Catius Insuber is not he whom Horace laughed at so often. The other Commentators find no Difficulty in it. Lambinus, Chabot, Fabrini, &c. pretend, that the Poet speaks of the Epicurean Philosopher Catius. Petrus Viatorius (5) and Gassendus are of the same Opinion. In a word, it was the general Opinion when M. le Fevre confuted it.

[C] Mr le Fevre confuted them by Arguments, which Mr Dacier has attacked, &c.] Mr le Fevre's (6) chief Reason is, that Catius, being dead before Cicero, was not living when Horace composed the fourth Satire of the second Book. Mr Dacier says, that This Proof is very weak, and that we ought to keep to the general Opinion. See here how he argues: 'Because Catius was dead, when Cicero wrote the sixteenth Letter of the fifteenth Book, must it therefore follow, that he was dead, when Horace wrote That Satire? It is certain, that Cicero's Letter was written in the fourth Consulate of Augustus, in the Year of Rome dccxxiiii. Horace was then Thirty fix Years of Age. Why could he not then have wrote That Satire before That Age? There is not the least room to raise a Doubt about it? So that the Passage of Cicero, instead of proving what Mr le Fevre pretended, serves, on the contrary, to inform us, that That Satire is one of Ho-

'rate's Works, which he composed when he was
' yet young, and on this side of Twenty five Years
' of Age (7).'

This is one of those Passages, on which one can hardly believe one's own Eyes, and which might pass for a Prodigy, if one had not experienced what Inattention can do. There are some Geometricians, who, having laboured three or four Hours to rectify a Calculation, and to find out the Cause of their Misreckoning, have found at last, that it proceeded from saying, in multiplying, three times seven is twenty two. It is by a like Inattention that Mr Dacier has written in his Copy, and has left in the Printer's Proofs, that Cicero wrote to Cassius in the Year of Rome 722, in the fourth Consulate of Augustus *; and consequently it is a Mistake, which concludes nothing against his Capacity, of which he has otherwise given so many Proofs. Every one knows, that Cicero perished in the fatal Proscriptions of the Triumvirate in the Year of Rome 710. It is not then certain, that the Letter to Cassius was written in the fourth Consulate of Augustus, in the Year of Rome 723: It was in the fourth Consulate of Julius Caesar, as is noted in the Summary of That Letter, and probably it was That occasioned the Inattention. However it be, Mr le Fevre's Proof will have some force, if, for this, it be sufficient that Catius was dead, when Horace composed the fourth Satire of the Second Book: for, since the fourth Consulate of Julius Caesar falls in the Year of Rome 708, which was the Twentieth of Horace more or less, it follows from thence, that, when that Poet was twenty Years of Age, Catius was not then living. Now there is little likelihood, that Horace composed, at that Age, the Satire in question. I confess it would not be impossible, and it is not without example, that very young Poets have made very good Satires. Perhaps also Horace took care to correct that Satire before he published it as we have it; but however, this ought to have been made use of in criticizing Mr le Fevre.

There is another much better way of doing it, which is to say, that the Death of Catius ought not to hinder Horace from making use of the Fiction, or Dialogism, which he used. The Jurisdiction, which Poets have given themselves over Time, is sufficiently known; Antidotes are no shameful Faults in them: So that, if this Epicurean Philosopher was held, at Rome, in the same Repute, which Montmaur was in at Paris, nothing could hinder Horace from making use of him, after his Death, as an Interlocutor in a Poetical Dialogue, to turn Gluttony, and the Parasitical Spirit, which might reign at that time among the false Epicureans, into Ridicule. I do not think, that any Difficulty would have been made, in France, to use Montmaur's Name in a Satire, Fifteen or Sixteen Years after his Death, in the same manner as That of Catius is made use of in Horace. Perhaps also This Poet did not pretend, that his Satire should be taken for a seditious Dialogue between Catius Infelix and himself, and that he only made choice of That Name, because he was to utter such Thoughts as agreed with that Philosopher (8). This seems to me to be most likely; but, if he had taken it the other way, I do not think he ought to be blamed for it, as Plato was for having made use of Interlocutors, some of whom were dead and others living (9). Poets are more privileged in that than Philosophers. All things duly considered, Cicero's Passage does not seem a Proof, that Horace composed that Satire in his Youth. One would be much mistaken, to pretend, that all those, of whom Juvenal speaks in the present Tenue, were yet living (10). Boileau, in his tenth Satire, spoke lately of Robertal, as of a Man yet living: If Posterity should conclude from thence that Robertal was not dead in the Year 1694, they would be much deceived.

Mr le Fevre's other Reasons testify, that he had not taken notice enough, that, in Catius's time, generally

Learning [D]. Gassendus deserves a little Censure here [E]. Costar deserves it no less [F]; Glandorp has committed another Mistake [G]; and I would not warnerally speaking, the Epicureans were ridiculed on the account of good Cheer; without any regard being had either to the Frugality of Epicurus, or to the Purity of his true Maxims. The Irregularity of divers Epicureans drew this Blame on the whole Sect; and it must not be imagined, under pretence, that Horace and his Friends followed the same Sect, that he would spare those, who disgraced it, and thereby lose the occasion of making use of his Jest and Railleries. A Satirist is too eager, to neglect such Advantages. Do we not see, at this present time, that the true Cartesians are the first, who cry out against those, who have built Chimeras on Mr Des Cartes's Principles, though those Chimeras be not prejudicial to good Manners, as the false Interpretations of Epicurus's Doctrine were, which became thereby actually and justly more exposed to the Strokes of censuring Writers? Who would believe, that Boileau, if he were of Mr Des Cartes's Sect, as perhaps he is, would abstain on that account from jesting upon it in a Satire, and from shooting Darts at it sometimes, even when he should find himself in a way to utter good Thoughts, and it should happen, that the Abuse should be carried so far as to bafe and infamous Practices? Credat Judæus Apella.

But if Mr le Fevre has not proved, that the Fourth Satire of the Second Book of Horace does not concern the Epicureans in general, and the Philosopher Catius in particular, he teaches us at least, by the Passage of Cicero concerning the Death of That Catius, that the ancient and modern Interpreters of Horace have not rightly apprehended in what manner Catius is introduced there. Doubtless, they believed, that he lived at the time, when the Satire was published, and that the Poet's Intention was, that his Narrative should be taken for a real Fact, I mean for a real Conversation with That Philosopher. But, as it is very likely that Catius was dead, when Horace made That Satire, it must not be imagined, that he gave it as a true Dialogue with the deceased; he only feigned a Person, who was called Catius, which was sufficient for him.

[D] — making use of the Liberty, which prevails in the Common-Wealth of Learning.] This Common-Wealth is a State extremely free. The Empire of Truth and Reason is only acknowledged in it; and under their Protection an innocent War is waged against any one whatever. Friends ought to be on their Guard, there, against their Friends, Fathers against their Children, Fathers-in-law against their Sons-in-law, as in the Iron Age.

DRYDEN.

Every body, there, is both Sovereign and under every-body's Jurisdiction. The Laws of the Society have done no Prejudice to the Independency of the State of Nature, as to Error and Ignorance: in that respect, every particular Man has the Right of the Sword, and may exercise it without asking leave of those who govern. It is very easy to know why the sovereign Power ought to leave every one at liberty to write against Authors, who are mistaken, but not to publish Satires. It is because Satires divest a Man of his Reputation, which is a kind of civil Homicide (12), and consequently a Punishment, which ought only to be inflicted by the Sovereign; but the criticizing of a Book tends only to shew, that an Author has not such and such a degree of Knowledge. Now as he may enjoy all the Rights, and all the Privileges, of the Society, with this Defect of Knowledge, without his Reputation of an honest Man and a good Subject of the Common-Wealth receiving the least Blemish by it; no Usurpation is made on the Majesty of the State, in shewing the public the Faults, which are in a Book. It is true, the Reputation of being a learned Man, which an Author has acquired, is, sometimes, diminished thereby, as also the pecuniary Profit, which he drew from it: but if it be done in Support of the Cause of Reason, and for the Interest of Truth only, and in a civil manner, no Body ought to find Fault with it (13). Such Critics have nothing in common with the Writers of diffamatory Libels; they advance nothing without Proof; they are both Witnesses and Accusers, exposed to the Punishment of Retaliation; they run the same hazard they make others run; but a Libeller hides himself, that he may not be obliged to prove what he publishes, and that he may do evil without being answerable for it. So that natural Justice requires, that every Member of the Common-Wealth should preserve his Independency as to the Refutation of Authors, without any regard to the Relation of Father, Father-in-law, Husband, Brother, &c. We have several Instances of it: Joseph Scaliger, and Isaac Vossius, have not spared their Fathers Opinions; and we see that Mr Bernoulli, Professor at Basil, and Mr Bernoulli, Professor at Groningen, do not spare each other, notwithstanding their being Brothers (14).

[E] Gassendus deserves a little Censure here.] He observes, that Horace's calling Catius Insuber a learned Man, is a thing very honourable to his Memory (15); but, if he had consulted the place well, he would have seen, that it was meer Irony, and that Horace is so far from being fit to be cited in favour of Catius's Learning, that, on the contrary, his Testimony can only serve to make that Philosopher ridiculous. It is not many Years ago, that a Cartesian having said in his Conferences, that this Proposition Two and Two make Four admits of no Difficulty, found himself soon after crowned with the praise of a learned Man for that Thought. Two and Two make Four, said one of the Company, as Mr sub an one has learnedly observed. If the Acts of that Conference were public, I would rather make use of them to prove, that this Philosopher had been called learned, than to alledge, as Gassendus did, the Doctæ Cati of Horace's Satire, in honour to the Memory of Catius Insuber. It had been better not to have passed over in Silence the four Books he had written De rerum natura & de summo bono.

Permit me to observe by the way, that there are so many Citations in the Writings of Gassendus, that it must not be wondered at, if they are not all right, since his main Design consisted in something else, viz. Philosophical Doctrines. It may be affirmed, that he was the most excellent Philosopher among the Humanists, and the most learned Humanist among Philosophers: Philosophorum literatissimus, litteratorum maxime Philosophus. Those who took care of the Edition of his Works, after his Death, had not patience enough; from whence it happened, that they have very often misplaced the Citations. For example, in the Fifteenth Page of the first Volume, they cite Terence in Andr. over against a Passage of Perfius; whereas they ought to have placed the Citation three or four Lines higher, where the Author had quoted a Passage of Terence.

[F] Costar deserves it no less.] There are his Words: 'Is Catius, who discourses in Horace * so seriously and gravely about Cookery, a less polite * Author for it, and has he lost any thing of his * esteem (16)?' The least School-Boy, who had read That place of Horace with a little Attention, would answer yes to this Question of Costar, since it is plain, that the Catius of Horace is a Person, who is turned into ridicule. I do not know why Mr de Girac took no notice of this Fault of his Adversary.

[G] Glandorp has committed another Mistake.] Having spoken of Catius Celsus, Pretor in the Consulship of L. Cotta and L. Torquatus, which was in the Year of Rome 688, he adds, that there was another Catius before him (17): it is he, who makes the subject of this Article; for Glandorp attributes to him what Quintilian and Cicero say of Catius the Epicurean; nay, and he pretends, that it is of him that Horace spoke in the Fourth Satire of the Second Book. How then could he imagine him anterior to rant, on Chabot's Authority, that Catius taught Virgil Epicureism [H]. A particular Reason engages me to insert, in this Article, a Mistake of Scaliger, in relation to the Colossus of Rhodes, of which I spoke in the Project of this Work [I].

Catius Celsus? It must be, that he neither thought on the common Opinion, that he, of whom Horace speaks, was then yet living; nor on the Passage of Cicero, which informs us, that Catius Infaber died a little before the Year of Rome 708.

[H] I would not warrant, on the Authority of Chabot, that Catius taught Virgil Epicureism. If I should be asked, from whence Chabot (18) had it, that Virgil relished Epicureism by the means of our Catius, born at Milan, I believe I might answer, without any Mistake, that it is out of the Commentary of Joseph Scaliger on the Catalesta of Virgil; but, for all that, I should not be the more certain of the Fact, since That great Critic gives no good reason for it. I find indeed in Servius (19), that Virgil and Varus had learned Philosophy under Siron (20): but nothing at all of Catius: and besides, all the Insubrians were not of Milan.

[I] A Fault of Scaliger — of which I have spoken in the Project of this Work. I had resolved to suppress this Remark, since I could not insert it in its natural place, which was the Article of the Colossus of Rhodes, which I do not give in this Edition: I say, I had resolved on it, when a particular Reason made me take other Measures. I will explain what it is; but first of all I shall set down the Remark, as it is found in the Project of this Dictionary.

REMARK on the Effect of Inattention. Scaliger quoted for an Example.

(21) Scaliger. Animadvers. in Chron. Eusebii, pag. 138, Edit. 1658.

(22) History of the World, Tom. IV, pag. 20, Edit. of Holland, 1687, and pag. 310, Edit. of Holl. 1693.

The great Scaliger, who exercised himself oftner in the Rules of Arithmetic, than any Banker or Financier, fell doublets into such an Inattention, when he computed the weight of the famous Colossus of Rhodes. He found by his Calculation, that, since the Merchant, who bought the pieces of That Colossus, loaded Nine hundred Camels with them, the weight thereof amounted to Seven hundred twenty thousand Pounds, or to One hundred and forty four Quintals (21): for, says he, the Burthen of a Camel is double to That of a Mule, and contains Eight hundred Pounds. By the Rule of Multiplication it is easy to averr, that Nine hundred Camels, each of them loaded with Eight hundred Pounds, carry Seven hundred twenty thousand weight; but to find that One hundred and forty four Quintals are equivalent to Seven hundred twenty thousand weight, Five thousand must be taken for an hundred in multiplying: that is to say, one must have forgot, that a Quintal is but an hundred Pound weight, and take it to be five thousand Pounds weight. A great Wit will sooner fall into these Mistakes than an indifferent one, and does not deserve any Insult for it. Therefore the Harshness of Leo Allatius, who has reproved this Error in Multiplication with very injurious Words, is but little excusable. Mr Chevreaux takes him to task roundly for it (22): He ought to be thanked for it; but he will give me leave to say, that, since he believed, that Scaliger reckons nine hundred Pounds for the loading of a Camel, he should not have overlooked, as he has done, this Mistake of Scaliger, viz. that the loading of nine hundred Camels make but Seven hundred and twenty thousand Pound weight. After being mistaken in setting down Nine hundred instead of Eight hundred, he ought to have found a Mistake in That Sum of Pounds, and not be satisfied with finding one in the Equivalency, which Scaliger has put between That same Sum and One hundred and forty four Quintals. He had erred consistently, which is a sort of exactness not to be despised. Mr Chevreaux believes, that this Passage was misprinted, and consequently he would not have it serve for the use, to which I employ it here, that is to say, as an Example of the Effect of Inattention.

I have inserted in this place this Passage relating to the Colossus of Rhodes, for the sake of those, who might have objected to me, that I suppose, without reason, that it is sometimes said, in multiplying, three times seven is twenty two. The cause that I assign of this small Mistake of Scaliger, seems to me to be so much the more likely, because I find no ground for a Conjecture, which might at first present itself to the mind; which is, that perhaps the Quintal, of which he speaks, and which is That of Guienne and of Spain, weighed five thousand Pounds (23): but some Persons, who have informed themselves well of the matter, have assured me, that no such Quintal is known either in Guienne or in Spain.

This is what I said in my Project. I would not have repeated it in this Article, if Mr Chauwin, a Minister of Rotterdam, had not communicated a Memorial to me, sent from London, containing some critical Remarks on my Project. They were sent to be inserted in his new Journal of the Learned, published at Rotterdam. I cannot tell whether he will do it or not: I have desired him to do it, and to add my Answer to those Remarks (24). One of these Remarks contains a Conjecture, much more probable than mine, of the Cause of Scaliger's Error. I am very glad that the Public gains by it; and I am not ashamed that another has guessed better than myself. Here is the Passage of the Memorial.

I believe it may be conjectured how the great Scaliger mistook in the Calculation he made of the weight of the Colossus of Rhodes, the Pieces whereof were the Loading of Nine hundred Camels. Scaliger values each Loading at Eight hundred Pound weight, which is, according to him, the double Load of a Mule, and whereof the total amounts to Seven hundred and twenty thousand Pound weight, which he reduces, by an enormous Error, to One hundred and forty four Quintals. Commonly, good Arithmeticians cut off the Cyphers in their Multiplications, which are at the end of the Number they intend to multiply, and of the Multiplier, and multiply only the Figures, to avoid an useless redoubling of the Cyphers. Afterwards they add as many Cyphers to the Product of their Multiplication as they had cut off from the Multiplicand, and from the Multiplier, if it has also any Cyphers. For example, I would know what the Price of 400 Hogheads of Wine amounts to at 90 Livres the Hoghead; I multiply only 9 by 4, which are the Figures of my two Numbers, and which give me the Product 36; to which I add afterwards the three Cyphers, which are in both my Numbers, the Multiplicand and the Multiplier, which makes just 36000 Livres, and is the Price that I would know. Likewise Scaliger, having valued every Camel's Loading at the rate of the double Loading of a Mule, at 800 Pound weight, which make just 8 Quintals, and, there being 900 Camels, he multiplied 9 by 8, which produced 72. Now, as it happens often, that those, who calculate, prepossess themselves so much, that sometimes they not only do what they think not of, but likewise the contrary of what they intend to do; Scaliger, having the double loading of a Mule for that of a Camel in his Head, instead of adding the two Cyphers, of the multiplied Number 900, to the Number 72, which was the Product, which would have made 7200, which is the just Number of the Quintals, doubled the Product 72, which made 144; such a different Number from 7200, the just Total of the Quintals, that it is impossible to conceive how it could happen otherwise, there being no probability in the Author's Conjecture, who pretends, that Scaliger, forgetting, that a Quintal is but an hundred Pounds, counted it at the rate of Five thousand Pounds.

What the Author of the Memoir has been saying, seems to me a very happy Thought, and I do not question but that he guesses at the true Cause of Scaliger's Error; an Error, which by this way is no less a strong Proof of the Effect of Distractions, than by the way I have shewed.

(23) Vulgo ut mercatores nostri & Magnarii in Aquitania & Hispania loquuntur (septingenta viginti millia pondi) efficit centum quadraginta quatuor Quintalia. Scaliger. Animad. in Chron. Eusebii, pag. 138.

CATO the Cenfor. Look for PORCIUS (MARCUS).

CATTHO (ANGELO), Archbishop of Vienne, in the XVth Century, was of Taranto. As he had addicted himself to the Party of Anjou, in the Kingdom of Naples, the Dukes John and Nicolas of Calabria (a), who pretended successively to the Marriage of the only Daughter of Duke Charles of Burgundy — kept him near the said Duke's Person, to negotiate that Marriage on their Part. This Negotiation had no Success; they did not live long, but died soon after one another. After their Death, the Duke of Burgundy, knowing the great Sense and Virtue of Angelo Catto, retained him in his Service, and gave him a Pension. Catto civilly took his leave of him after the Battle of Morat, and retired to the Court of Lewis XI (b), where he was well received; and the Dignity of the King's Almoner was conferred upon him, and afterwards the Archbishopric of Vienne. Some say he served Lewis XI as a Physician and Astrologer [A]. He was a Person of a good Life, great Literature, and Modesty, and very learned in Mathematics (c). — He died, having lived holily and austerely, and lies in his Church of Vienne (d). A strict Friendship was formed between him and Philip de Comines, whilst they were at the Duke of Burgundy's Court; and it continued whilst they were in the Service of Lewis XI (e). It was at the Solicitation of Angelo Catto, that Philip de Comines wrote the Memoirs which we have of his composing. He declares so in his first Lines, and addresses his Discourse to him in several Places of his Work, which he does sometimes, to praise him for having foretold things to come, a long time before they came to pass [B]. Some surprizing Particulars are told of This Person's Gift of Prophecy [C], and which might afford Matter for many Reflexions. I must take notice

[A] Some say, that he served Lewis XI, as a Physician and Astrologer. Peter Matthieu, having written, that That Prince, being fallen into a fainting Fit, was so speedily assisted by the Lord du Bouchage, who was his Physician, and afterwards Archbishop of Vienne, that, after having taken a Clyster, he recovered, advertises us, in the Index, that we must put out the Name of du Bouchage, and read Angelo Catto (1). When he speaks of the Astrologers, which Lewis XI employed, and had an Esteem for, he expresses himself thus (2): 'But he had chiefly a great Esteem for Angelo Catto, a Neapolitan, who came into France with the Prince of Taranto, and had foretold to the Duke of Burgundy, and the Duke of Guelderland, their Misfortunes. The King gave him the Archbishopric of Vienne, on which he could not refuse, by reason of the great Disturbances he met with from those of Dauphiné, and was forced to retire to Rome (3). Naudé says the same Thing (4), and quotes the Life of Angelo Catto, composed by Sleidan (5). I shall quote Claudius Robert below, who assures us, that our Catto was Physician to Lewis XI. Let us hold this for certain: for Philip de Comines mentions it. You came there, says he (6), speaking of a Sickness of Lewis XI, immediately, my Lord of Vienne, you who was then his Physician. I do not think, that Peter Matthieu is in the right, when he says, that Catto came into France with the Prince of Taranto; for it appears plainly by Philip de Comines (7), that That Prince left the Duke of Burgundy, to come to Lewis XI, the Eve before the Battle of Morat, and that Angelo Catto was with That Duke after the Loss of That Battle. The Historian, having spoken of the Duke of Burgundy's Affliction, after the Misfortune of That Day, does he not speak thus? 'And this, my Lord of Vienne, you know better than myself, as being the Person, who helped him to drive away his Melancholy, and caused his Beard to be shaved, which he had let grow (8). I cannot tell whether we may believe what Don Juan Vitrian says, that Angelo Catto took refuge in France, with John of Anjou, Duke of Calabria, and that, after That Duke's Death, and That of his Son Nicolas of Anjou, he put himself into the Service of the Duke of Burgundy (9).

[B] Comines — sometimes praises him for having foretold Things to come. He relates, that Dom Frederic of Arragon, Prince of Taranto (10), who had been a Year with the Duke of Burgundy, in hopes of marrying his Daughter, was disgusted with the Delays, and took leave of That Duke, the Evening before the Battle of Morat. — Some say, continues he, that he made use of your Advice, my Lord of Vienne; for I have heard him say so, when he came to the King, and also the Duke of Ascoly, called Count Julio, and divers others, and that you wrote, and said, in Italy, what would happen in the first and second Battle, several Days before they were fought (11). See here how he speaks to him in another Place. 'King A'phonfus — had a Son, who was a fine Man, whose Name was Don Ferrand, aged Twenty two or Twenty three Years, bearing Arms also, and well beloved in That Kingdom; and a Brother, called Don Frederic, since King, after Ferrand, in our Time, a wise Man, who commanded their Naval Forces, having been educated a long time in these Parts, of whom you, my Lord of Vienne, have many times assured me, by Astrology, that he should be King; and he promised me, from that time, Four thousand Livres, yearly Revenue, in the said Kingdom, if it should so happen to him: And That Promise was made Twenty Years before it came to pass (12).

[C] They relate some surprizing Particulars of his Gift of Prophecy. There is a Summary of the Life of Angelo Catto, prefixed to the Pieces, which serve for Proofs and Illustrations to the Memoirs of Philip de Comines. That Summary was found among the Papers of an ancient Man, studious and curious of History; He, who composed it, declares, that he relates there what had been collected and heard concerning him (13), by the Report of three Persons of great Credit, Prudence, and Authority (14). You will find these Words there (15): 'Being in the Service of King Lewis — happened the third Battle, fought at Nancy, in which the said Duke was killed, the Eve of the Epiphany, in the Year 1476; and, at the Hour that the said Battle was given, and at the same Instant that the Duke was killed (16), the said King Lewis heard Mass in the Church of St Martin at Tours, at least ten Days Journey distant from the said Place of Nancy; and, at the said Mass, the said Archbishop of Vienne served him as Almoner, who, giving the Pax to the said Lord, said these following Words to him: 'Sir, God give you Peace and Rest: You have both if you please, quia consummatum est: Your Enemy, the Duke of Burgundy, is just now killed, and his Army defeated. Which Hour, being set down, was found to be the same Hour, wherein the said Duke was really killed. And the said Lord, hearing these Words, was greatly astonished, and asked the Archbishop, whether what he said was true, and how he knew it. To which the Archbishop answered, that he knew it, as the other Things, which our Lord had permitted him to foretell to him, and to the late Duke of Burgundy: and, without any more Words, the said Lord made a Vow to God, and to St Martin, that, if the News he told was true, (as it proved effectually fectually soon after) he would cause the Bars of St Martin's Shrine (which were of Iron) to be made all of Silver: Which Vow the said Lord performed afterwards, and caused the said Grate to be made, to the Value of an Hundred thousand Livres, or thereabouts.' See two other Predictions: 'Angelo Cattbo met, one Morning very early, Messire William Brignonnet — General of Languedoc, who was going to Lewis XI, to Plessis at Tours. Having been some time without speaking, and looking up to Heaven, and then on the said General, he said at last these Words to him: General, I have told you many times, that the passing and frequenting of Waters is dangerous for you, and that, some time or other, it would prove very dangerous to you, and perhaps the Cause of your Death: I come from du Plessis, where you are going; the Waters are out at Pont-Sainte-Ann, the Bridge is broke; and there is a bad Boat: if you believe me, you will not go thither. Nevertheless the General would not believe him, but went on: and, indeed, he was in the greatest danger in the World of being drowned; for he fell into the Water, and, if he had not taken hold of a Willow-Tree, he had been lost: He was carried back to his House, where he lay a long time sick, as well through the Fright, as the great Quantity of Water, which had got into his Body through his Mouth, Nose, and Ears (17).' In That Sickness, he was visited by Angelo Cattbo, who said, one Day, to him, you will make a great Figure in the Church, and be very near being Pope. Brignonnet was married to Raoullette de Beaune, a young Woman, who had already brought him some Children, and who was not very well pleased with the Prediction; 'For it was as much as to say, that she should should die first (a Thing, which Women do not willingly love to hear): nevertheless the said Lady lived a long time after, and had several Children, and, for that Reason, she, and divers others, said often, that the said Archbishop did not always say true: But, at last, she went off first, and the said General, her Husband, survived her, who lived a long time a Widower without talking

'of becoming a Churchman (18);' but, at last, having followed Charles VIII to the Conquest of Naples, 'he was made a Churchman at Rome, Bishop of St. Malo, and Abbot of St. Germain des Prez, and then Cardinal, and afterwards Archbishop of Reims, and of Narbonne, and had some Votes in the Election of a Pope, after the Death of Alexander VI (19).' Some Authors report, that Angelo Cattbo foretold to Bajazet's Brother, 'That one of the greatest Kings of Christendom should endeavour to re-establish him; but that it would be without any Effect, and that he had much more reason to fear his private, than his public, Enemies: that he had no need to fear the Sword or the Bowstring; that his Fate was occult, and that his Death was hid (20).' This Brother of Bajazet fled at first to the Island of Rhodes, from whence he passed into France, where he lived some Years. He was afterwards sent to Rome, to be kept by Innocent VIII. He lived there till the Year

These are things, which nonpluss Philosophy; for there is no good System to be invented, which can account for them. And therefore most Philosophers deny the Facts of this Nature, which are so frequent in Books, and yet more frequent in common Discourse. But it must be owned, that the denying of all these Things has it's Inconveniences, and does not satisfy the Minds of those, who weigh exactly the Reasons pro and con. The Reason of a Christian Philosopher will, without any Difficulty, admit the Supposition, that God communicates to some Persons the Quality of a Prophet, when it is requisite to establish or confirm the Truths of great Importance to Salvation, or to stop the over-flowing of Sin, or to strike some very great Blow, necessary for the Good of the Church. If Angelo Cattbo had been in Circumstances of this Nature, it might be comprehended, that God had raised him up to Prophecy; but that was a Courtier, who laboured only to negotiate an advantageous Marriage, according to the World, for his Masters, or to settle himself in a good Post; he was moreover one, who pretended to Astrology. Now nothing seems more unworthy of God, than to reveal Things to come to an Astrologer; I mean, to reward the most impertinent and chimerical Study with so exquisite a Favour. If a Devil, or any disorderly Spirit, should reveal Things to come to Calculators of Nativities, and Makers of Figures of Geomancy (22), such things might be comprehended; for, since he is criminal, nothing hinders him from being capricious and fanciful, and from directing his Conduct by Puerilities, the better to make a Mock at Things. But besides, can a created Spirit see, that, in twenty Years, the Husband of a young Wife shall be a Cardinal? To predict this, must he not know the Series of an almost infinite number of corporeal and spiritual Motions? Can the Knowledge of a Creature contain so many Things at once? And, if it contains them, there is no Free-Will: All the Thoughts of Man are linked, with a natural and indissoluble Tie, to the Tail of each other. These are then Abysses, wherein a Philosopher's Reason cannot but lose itself; it chooses rather to deny whatsoever is said of Predictions; an inconvenient Resource! for who can think, that Philip de Comines would tell a Lie, in affirming, that Angelo Cattbo had told him several times, that Frederic of Arragon should be King, twenty Years before the Event?

I do not deny, but that there is reason to place most of the Stories, which are spread about Predictions, in the Rank of Fables; for it must be owned, that they, who cry them up with the greatest Confidence, have too much neglected to guard against an incredulous Reasoner: They seldom speak of Predictions till after the Event; they take no care to prove them according to judicial Forms: they do not strengthen them with the Authority of an incontestable Monument. Now, as they neglect this, on Occasions, where it would be most easy to oppose an impenetrable Buckler against the Strokes of Incredulity, they ought not to wonder, that their Relations are called in question. One of Those Occasions is the Mais, at which they pretend, that Angelo Cattbo declared to the King the Death of the Duke of Burgundy: They ought to have presented a Petition to That Monarch, to request him most humbly to declare, to his whole Council, what Angelo Cattbo had said to him, and order his Chancellor to draw up an Act of it, which should be inserted in the Archives of the Crown, and among the Records of the Parliaments of the Kingdom. They should have exhorted him to cause some Columns to be erected, with an Inscription, containing the Fact, or to desire him, at least, to cause it to be engraven on the Bars of the Shrine of St Martin, since, in consequence of such a Prophecy, he had vowed a Silver Grate for That Shrine, and had accomplished his Vow. What could incredulous Men have said in such a Case? And what could they have opposed against such cotemporary and authentic Monuments? But, without taking such Measures, if This Adventure had been true, it would have maintained itself against Incredulity. Lewis XI would have told it an hundred times at Table, and before the Embassadors of Princes; and so there would have been some Writings, which would testify, that it came from his Mouth. I am certain, that the Records of St Martin's Church would have contained an Act about it, if it were true, that That Prince had caused a Silver Grate to be made, in Performance of his Vow. Since, then, This Adventure is only supported by the Witnesses of an anonymous Writer (23), who declares, that he does not relate any thing of Angelo Cattbo, but what he heard three Persons say, we may reasonably reject it. Besides, since Philip de Comines does not speak of it, we have reason to decide, that it is a Fable. It is impossible, that he should have been ignorant of That Dialogue between his Friend and Lewis XI, and that, having known it, he should have said nothing of it in his Memoirs, wherein he speaks of some other Predictions of Angelo Cattbo of less Importance than That. His Silence is a negative Argument, which is, in this Case, a good Demonstration, or, at least, of quite another

(22) I have said, in the Remark [D], of the Article RUGGIERI, that, if Astrology be a means of divining, it is necessarily a Part of Magic.

Weight, than the Affirmation of three Persons named by the anonymous Author. Observe, that the anonymous Author does not say, that those three Persons gave Testimony about that Dialogue; so that it may be pretended, that he heard it but from one of them. Now, when the chief of the three Predictions is a Fable, the other two may be rejected; and so the Author of the Summary cannot reasonably cure any Body of the Spirit of Unbelief.

(24) Amyraut, Of the Elevation of Faith, and the Abatement of Reason, p. 258, 259.

Note, that Mr Amyraut has made use of These three Facts, to shew, that Things to come may be foretold, without being a Prophet (24). His Design is to answer this Argument of the Catholics: There have been some Doctors in the Roman Communion, who have foretold Things to come: It is, then, the true Church, since GOD preserves the Gift of Prophecy in it.

[D] I shall take notice of some Faults of Mr Moreri. I. He says, that Angelo Cattho was born at Benevento; but those, who might very well know the thing, make him a Native of Taranto. II. He makes him Great Almoner of France; but he ought to have known, that That Title did not begin but in the Person of Cardinal de Meudon, in the Reign of Francis I (25). Before That Time they used the Title of the King's Great Almoner; and this very Title was unknown in the Time of Lewis XI; It began to take place in the Person of Godfrey de Pompadour, Bishop of Perigueux under Charles VIII (26). III. Claudius Robertus informs us, That Angelo Cattho was buried in his Metropolitan Church. See his Words here: 'Angelus Cato Tarentinus, ex Medico & Eleemosynario Ludovici XI. cujus suavis scriptis commentarios rerum Francicarum Philippus Comineus. Jacet in sua Metropoli. Ejus erat symbolum: ingenium superat vires (27). — Angelo Cattho of Taranto, formerly Physician and Almoner to Lewis XI, by whose Persuasion Philip de Comines wrote an History of the French Affairs. He lies buried in his Metropolis. His Motto was; Ingenium superat vires — The Abilities of the Mind are superior to Those of the Body.' This makes me question what Mr Moreri says; That, in 1494, he went to Benevento, and that he died there, in 1497. We have seen, that another Author (28) affirms, That he was obliged to retire to Rome. This is doubtful. As for Mr Moreri's Omissions, they may be known by comparing his Article with mine.

[E] — And of Dr Nicolo Toppi. He speaks of an Angelo Catone of Benevento, and of an Angelo Catone of Taranto. The first, says he, was very well versed in all Sciences, and for that reason most dear to Charles VIII. His Merit, and that Monarch's Favour, raised him to the Archbishopric of Vienne. The second was Physician and Almoner to Lewis XI, who engaged him to write li Commentarii delle cose di Francia, — An History of the French Affairs; as Philip de Comines informs us, quoted by Claudius Robertus, pag. 182 of the Gallia Christiana (29). It is plain that the Author of the Biblioteca Napoletana has split one Author into two; for the same Angelo Cattho, who was Physician and Almoner of Lewis XI, was Archbishop of Vienne; and That was before Charles VIII ascended the Throne: It is false, that he wrote a Book at the Solicitation of Lewis XI, and that Philip de Comines speaks of it, and that Claudius Robertus alleges Comines for a Proof of such a Thing. How much are Matters of Fact altered, when the Words of an Author are wrong understood! Yet those of Claudius Robertus are very intelligible. Nicodemo has not criticised Nicolo Toppi upon it.

[F] — And of Mr Varillas. See here what he says (30): 'The Favourers of Judiciary Astrology triumph here upon the Credit of Philip de Comines, who reports, That the famous Angelo Cattho had taken Part with the Duke of Burgundy; either because he had at first preferred That Prince to the King of France, or because he had only followed the Example of other learned Persons of his Time, who were wont to go and seek their Fortune in the Netherlands, for the only reason, that they made it there with more ease, than elsewhere. He continued That Duke's Domestic, till, having exactly cast his Horoscope, he foresaw, that he should die in a pitch'd Battle. From that Time he sought an Occasion to leave him as decently as he could; and, having found it after the Battle of Morat, he laid hold of it, as a Man of Understanding. He made his Treaty before-hand with Lewis XI; who was not contented to honour him with his Confidence; but his Majesty gave him also the Archbishopric of Vienne, and kept him nevertheless at his Court. He said Mass before him in the Church of St Martin of Tours, at the same time when they fought at Nancy; and, when he gave him the Cover of the Chalice to kiss, he said to him: Sir, GOD gives you Peace (31). There are divers Faults in this Narration. I. The Favourers of Judiciary Astrology cannot make any Advantage of what Cattho said to Lewis XI, during the Mass, at the Moment that Duke Charles was killed; for it is plain, that he did not know by Astrology what passed at that time near Nancy. II. It is not true, That Astrologers take Advantage of this, on the Credit of Philip de Comines. How should they do it, since he says nothing of it? III. It is not true, that the learned Persons of Italy, or other Places, were wont to go and seek their Fortune in the Netherlands. IV. Nor that they did it there with more ease than elsewhere. Can any Examples be given of it? Had it not been better to have said, That Angelo Cattho was left with the Duke of Burgundy, to negotiate his Master the Duke of Calabria's Marriage? This was what engaged him first at That Court. V. It is not to be found in the Summary of his Life, that he foresaw, by the Horoscope, that the Duke should die fighting in a pitch'd Battle. This is only to be found there; 'After the Battle of Morat, knowing the Obstinacy of the said Duke, and, it may be, the Misfortunes, which were to befall him and his Family, he civilly took leave of him (32). What a wide Difference is there between this, and what Mr Varillas reports! How enormous is it! The worst is, that Philip de Comines, the Author cited by him, does not so much as advance the Conjecture, which we have just now seen. VI. It is not true, that Angelo Cattho was Archbishop of Vienne, when Duke Charles was killed.

The Spanish Author (33), who commented on Philip de Comines's Memoirs, says, That Angelo Cattho, having conjectured or divined the Death of the Duke of Burgundy, passed into the King of France's Service, a little before it happened, and foretold That Monarch the Loss of That Duke's Battles. This is not exact; for, from the time that This Astrologer was with Lewis XI, the Duke lost but one Battle. I forbear to say, that That Author is too modern, to be believed, when he speaks, without quoting Authorities.

[A] He was born at Verona. St Jerom does not believe what Mr Moreri attributes to him, That our Poet was born in the Peninsula of Sirmio (He does not say so in the least, but names Verona positively); much less has he placed his Birth in the CLXXth Olympiad. Moreri was deceived by these Words of Giraldu (1): 'Natus quidem in Peninsula Sirmione lacus Benaci in agro Veronensi, ut ipsemet ad ipsam Sirmionem cecinit, Olympiade

ciriter CLXX. ut Hieronymus ex Chronicis Eusebii observat. — Born indeed in the Peninsula Sirmio of the Lake Benacus, near Verona, as he himself declares in Verses to that very Sirmio, about the CLXXth Olympiad, as Jerom, from the Chronicles of Eusebius, observes.' It was easy to perceive two Citations here, and to see, that St Jerom was not alledged for the Place of his Birth.

were then at Rome, in great Abundance; and, as the ancient Romans had not laid down those Rules of Politeness, which at present make those, who compose obscene Verses, and full of bare-faced Debaucheries, fall into public Contempt and Hatred (c), Catullus did himself no great harm by the gross Obscenities, and infamous Impurities, with which he poisoned many of his Poems. It is believed (d), that he gave the Name of Lesbia to the most famous of his Mistresses, in honour of Sappho, who was of the Island of Lesbos, and whose Verses pleased him wonderfully. He translated, or imitated, some of them. The true Name of That Mistress was Clodia (e). He is very far from the Method of our Poets, who complain always of the Rigour and Insensibility of their fair ones; as for him, he speaks of his Lesbia, as of a Woman, who asked him how many Kisses would satisfy him [B], and, which is worse, as of a Woman, who prostituted herself to the first Comer. He composed some satirical Verses against Cæsar (f), which served only to shew the Moderation of the offended Person [C]; he was not silent indeed about the heinous Injury he had received from him; but he was contented to oblige the Poet to make him Satisfaction, and the same Day he invited him to Supper. Suetonius adds, that Cæsar continued to lodge at Catullus's Father's House (g); but some learned Men believe, that That Historian did not well observe the Times [D]. All our Poet's Verses are not of an ill Example; in some of them (h), he expresses such inconsolable Grief for the Death of his Brother, as is altogether edifying. He neither made his Fortune by his Verses, nor in his Travels into Bithynia with Memmius (i), who had obtained the Government of it after his Pretorship. It may easily be known, that he was poor (k). Those who say, that Furius and Aurelius were his intimate Friends, made but a scurvy Knot of them [E]; for Those two Men

[B] He speaks of his Lesbia, as of a Woman, who asked him how many Kisses would satisfy him.] It is in the seventh Epigram;

Quæris, quot mihi basiationes
Tux, Lesbia, sint satis superque?

Lesbia, my Fairest, you require
How many Kisses I desire.

He answers, that he desired as many as there are Grains of Sand in the Deserts of Lybia, and Stars in the Heavens. As for this Mistress's prostituting herself, see how he speaks of it:

Cæli, Lesbia nostra, Lesbia illa,
Illa Lesbia, quam Catullus unam
Plurquam se, atque suos amavit omnes,
Nunc in quadrivis & angustis Glubit magnanimos Remi nepotes (2).

Lesbia, my Friend, the beautiful She,
Who more than Life was dear to me,
Now plies in Alleys and in Streets,
And lies with every Man she meets.

It is said, that this filthy Woman was the Sister of the infamous Clodius, the great Enemy of Cicero. See the Article METELLUS CELER, Remark [A], Citat. (3).

[C] His satirical Verses against Cæsar served only to shew the Moderation of the offended Person.] I shall set down all that Suetonius says of it, whereby it will appear that Moreri gave a very erroneous Account of that Action. 'Valerium Catullum, à quo sibi versiculis de Mamurra perpetua stigmata imposita non dissimulaverat, satisfaciendam eadem die adhibuit cœnæ, hospitioque patris ejus sicut confueverat uti perseveravit (3). — Notwithstanding he could not be ignorant, that Valerius Catullus had stigmatized him for ever in some Verses concerning Mamurra, yet he the same Day invited him to an Entertainment, and continued to lodge with his Father, as before.' Crininus confounded the last Part of this Narrative; since, instead of saying, That Cæsar continued to lodge at Catullus's Father's House, he says, That Catullus had Leave to continue in Cæsar's House as before, or to make use of the Law of Hospitality, that was between their Families, as before (4). He had reason to conclude from That Law of Hospitality, established between Cæsar and the Father of Catullus, that This Poet was of no mean Birth; but he should not have said, that Suetonius tells us, that the Father of Catullus lodged familiarly in the House of Julius Cæsar. Suetonius says nothing of it; and perhaps that Person never set his Foot in Rome. Father Briet (5) has transcribed all these Faults of Crininus.

[D] Suetonius did not well observe the Times.] Scaliger pretended to have surprised him in a notorious Fault (6); but he himself is guilty of a great Mistake. He will have it, that the Reconciliation of Catullus with Cæsar happened after the Triumph of the latter, and he builds on the satirical Verses of Catullus, which make mention of the Spoils of Pontus, and of those of Spain; consequently they were made after the Victory of Munda over the Sons of Pompey. Now Cæsar went no more into Gaul after that last Triumph; so that he could lodge no longer with the Father of Catullus, who lived on the other side of the Po. This seems convincing, and Scaliger would have done well to stop here, as Casaubon did in making use of this Remark (7); but he says, that, after the Passage of the Rubicon, Cæsar went no more into Gaul. 'Cæsar non potuit uti ejus (Catulli) patris hospitio nisi ante bellum civile quum proconsulari imperio obtineret Gallias Cisalpinam & Transalpinam. — Post transitum Rubiconis, Cæsar nunquam postea in Gallias suas reversus est (8).' This is manifestly false. He returned thither, when he went into Spain, first to drive out Pompey's Lieutenants before the Battle of Pharsalia (9), and afterwards to drive out Pompey's Sons themselves, after the Defeat of Cato and Scipio in Africa. We shall see, in the Remark [I] (10), that it is not very certain, that Cæsar did not lodge with his Host at Verona, after he was reconciled with Catullus.

[E] Furius, Aurelius, and He, make but a scurvy Knot.] According to Crininus, these two Men were Catullus's dearest Friends (11). It is true, that, in the eleventh of his Epigrams, he represents them as ready to go to the end of the World, and into the wildest Places, with him; but he says so many disobliging Things of them in other Places, that it cannot be thought their Friendship was of any Continuance. He represents them as open-mouthed Wolves, that, for want of having wherewithal to live, could never free themselves from Hunger.

Aureli pater esuritionum,
Non harum modo, sed quot aut fuerunt,
Aut sunt, aut aliis erunt in annis (12).

Aurelius!
Father of Famine, present, and to come!

He could not have described a Beggar otherwise than he does them (13). On the other side, he represents them as greedy of Sodomy (14), as of

Bread, and threatens them with an horrible Treatment (15), if they they slander him, or debase the Object of his Flame. This goes beyond Railery: No body makes such Verses on the best Friends he has; and, if it was true, that these Persons were ill lodged, ill provided with Household-stuff, and ill fed, it was therefore the more disobliging to jest upon them for it. So that it is very likely, that Catullus passed from Friendship to a furious Hatred against those two Persons, and all for an infamous Love. 'Cum horum utroque graves postea inimicitias gessit, eosque acerbissimis versibus insectatus est, tum quod ipsum mollem notassent, tum quod puerum ipsi carum Aurelius quidem tentasset, Furius vero etiam contempnisset' (16). — He had afterwards a grievous Quarrel with these two Persons, and satirized them in the bitterest Verses, both because they had branded him with Effeminacy, and because Aurelius had indeed attempted a Youth, whom Catullus loved, and Furius had actually debauched him. But, admire the Fondness of the Poets for their Productions; they rather chuse to let the Public know the Praises they have given to Persons, whom they afterwards defame, than to suppress the Verses, in which those Praises are contained. We have such Examples in the Poems, and also in the Letters, of some modern Authors. When Authors fall out with any one, after the first Edition of a Book, it is usual to leave the Praises, they had given him, out of the second; it must be then, that Poets and Epistolary Writers, who do not so, or who, in Imitation of Catullus, insert in the first Editions the good and the bad Things, which they have said, of the same Persons, do it because they are pleased with the manner, in which they have turned their Thoughts. They prefer the Praise, which they hope to draw from it, to the Blame of having blown both hot and cold. When I said, in Imitation of Catullus, I considered, that he himself published the Collection of his Poems, as appears by his Epistle Dedicatory to Cornelius Nepos. As for what remains, Vossius durst not decide, that the Aurelius of Catullus is L. Aurelius Cotta, as some think; but he believes his Furius is Furius Bibaculus, who was far, says he, from being a starveling; for we learn from Horace, that he was thick, and fat, and a great Eater. Iste nihil minus fuit quam esuritor, erat quippe obesus & vorax, ut ex Horatio constat (17). The Place of Horace, which Vossius hinted at, is in his fifth Satire of the second Book:

--- seu pingui tentus omafo
Furius hybernas cana nive conspuet Alpes.
Or, strutting big behind a monstrous Paunch, Furius with hoary Snow bespews the wintry Alps.

According to some Interpreters (18), tentus pingui omafo signifies, that Furius was swelled up with the Tripes that he had eaten; as if Horace would have said, that Furius fed on none but such kind of Meat: But others will have it, that these Words signify, that Furius had a great Paunch, a great Belly. Vossius adopts both these Significations. He would not get clear so easily of Catullus, as of Horace, since the Furius of Catullus was so far from having a great Paunch, that he was so dry, as scarce to have any Spittle.

Atqui corpora sicciora cornu,
Aut si quid magis aridum est, habetis,
Sole, & frigore, & esuritione.
Quare non tibi sit bene ac beate?
A te sudor abest, abest saliva,
Mucosque, & mala pituita nati.
Hanc ad munditiam adde mundiorum,
Quod culus tibi purior salillo est,

Nec toto decies cacas in anno:

Atque id durius est faba & lapillis,

Quod tu si manibus teras, fricesque,

Non unquam digitum inquinare posses (19).

(19) Catull. Epigr. 23.

The Substance of these Verses is, that Furius was so dry, with Heat, Cold, and Hunger, that he had neither Sweat nor Spittle left, nor could blow his Nose; and that he was so cleanly, as not to go to stool ten times in a Year, &c. I leave it to those, who wrote so many Satires against the Parasite Montmar, to judge, whether esuritor and vorax are Terms so opposite, as Vossius pretended: However it be, he cannot be justified, for having taken the Furius of Catullus for a very fat Man.

[F] We have not all his Works.] Crinitus observes, that Terentianus Maurus speaks of an Libyphallic Poem of Catullus, and that Pliny (20) ascribes to him a Poem on the Incantments used to make one's self beloved; a Matter, which had been treated of, before him, by Theocritus, and which Virgil treated of after Catullus. As for the Libyphallic Verses, or concerning the impure Divinity of Priapus, Crinitus should not have said, that they are lost.

[G] What remains, has been printed and commented upon several times.] The chief Editions of Catullus are those of Scaliger, and Passerat. The first of those two Critics corrected many Passages, with great Penetration of Mind, and an uncommon Erudition. The oldest Edition, if I am not mistaken, is That of Venice 1488, with the Commentaries of Antony Parthenius. The Commentaries of Muretus, Those of Achilles Statius, and the Lectiones of Titius, are not to be despised. Mr Grævius, to whom the Public is indebted for so many good Editions, procured one of Catullus at Utrecht in the Year 1680, wherein he inserted the entire Notes of a very great number of Commentators. The Edition of Isaac Vossius, printed at Leyden (21), in the Year 1684, is accompanied with a very learned Commentary. See, upon this, and on the Edition in usum Delphini, the News from the Republic of Learning, 1684. A Florentine, called Tuscanella, made a very ample Index to Catullus, which was inserted by John Gebbard in his Edition Variorum of Frankfort 1621.

[H] His Death is ill placed, by St Jerom, in the CLXXXth Olympiad.] The Britannie Expedition is spoken of in the Verses, which Catullus made against Cæsar. Now That Expedition was made the first time in the 698th Year of Rome. It is then most certain, that Catullus was not dead in the Year 696.

[I] He lived not so long as Joseph Scaliger pretended.] Let us examine his four Reasons a little. He says (22), I. That Catullus was living, when Virgil composed his Æneid, and to prove it he alleges these Verses of Martial:

Sic foran tener ausus est Catullus Magno mittere passerem Maroni (23).

(23) Mart. Epigr. 14, lib. 4.

Perhaps the best Catullus dared to send His Sparrow to great Maro, as his Friend.

Now Virgil did not compose That Work till a long time after the Death of Julius Cæsar. II. That the Satire of Catullus makes mention of the four Triumphs of Julius Cæsar: there passed but little time then between the Poet's Reconciliation with the Emperor, and the Death of the latter, since Cæsar was killed a Year after his Triumphs. III. That it seems Cornelius Nepos wrote under Augustus: Now Catullus makes mention of the Chronicles of Cornelius Nepos. IV. Lastly, that Catullus, aged Seventy one Years, saw the Secular Games celebrated in the 737th Year of Rome: This appears plainly by his Carmen Seculare; for why would he have made That Poem, if he had not been living when those Games were celebrating?

It

above Seventy one Years : This is to run into another Extream ; and we shall make it appear, by many Reasons, that this great Critic is wrong in advancing an Opinion so different from every Body else.

The second Reason is not strong; for it is most uncertain, that Catullus made mention of Cæsar's last Triumphs. See how he speaks :

Paterna prima lacinata sunt bona,
Secunda præda Pontica, inde tertia Ibera, quam scit annis aurifer Tagus :

(30) Catul. Epig. 30.

Hunc Gallie timent, timent Britannie (30).
*His Goods and Patrimony quite consumed,
And next his Pontic, and Iberian Spoils,
Yet Gaul, and distant Britain, dread his Sword.*

I wonder Isaac Vossius took no notice of the last of these four Verses, which confirms his Conjectures so powerfully. He will have it (31), that Præda Pontica does not signify the Spoils of King Pharnaces, conquered by Cæsar after the Death of Pompey; but the Money, which Cæsar drew from Bitthynia by the Correspondence he had with King Nicomedes (32).

(31) In Catull. pag. 72.

(32) See Suetonius, in Cæsar. cap. 2.

As for the Præda Ibera, the same Vossius explains it of the Booty made by Cæsar in the War of Portugal in 693, and laughs at those, who understand it of the Victory of Munda; for Munda, says he, is above two hundred Miles from the Tajo. All this is wonderfully confirmed by the following words; Hunc Gallie timent, timent Britannie. Here is the fourth Booty; The Gauls and Britain, being stripped by this Conqueror, feared him. The Booty of Spain had therefore preceded That of Gaul; it does not therefore belong to a Triumph later by some Years than the Conquest of Gaul, such as was That of Munda. Why did not Vossius add, that, if Catullus had spoken of the Spoils of King Pharnaces, he would not have forgot those of Egypt, nor those of Africa, since it is certain, that Cæsar's three triumphal Entries, one for Egypt, one for the Kingdom of Pontus, and one for Africa, were made in three Days successively (33) after the Defeat of Cato? The Year following, he triumphed over the Sons of Pompey for the Victory of Munda. How could Catullus have ended his Catalogue with the plundering of Gaul, if he had spoken of the Triumphs, which followed the end of the Civil-Wars; or how could he have forgot the Spoils of Egypt, and those of Africa, if he would have mentioned Those of Pontus, and those of Munda? All this persuades me, that he made his Satire a little after the Invasion of Britain: for, besides that Isaac Vossius (34) shews plainly enough, that the last words, fecerit generique perdidit omnia, ought not to be understood of Cæsar and Pompey, but of Cæsar and Mamurra, it may be said, that, before the breaking out of the War, the Disputes between Cæsar and Pompey had brought Matters to such a pass, that every body might know, that the Republic was upon the brink of Ruin. 'Fortunatus illius (Hor-tensii) exitus quicquid non vidit cum fierent quæ providit futura; sæpe enim inter nos impendentes casus de-flevimus, cum belli civilis causas in privatorum cupiditatibus inclusas, pacis spem à publico consilio esse exclusam videremus (35). — Hortensius 'luckily died, not seeing what he foresaw would happen; for we often lamented in private the impending Misfortunes, when we saw the Ambition of particular Men likely to draw on us a Civil War, and the Hopes of Peace excluded from the Public Councils.' After all, there is no likelihood, that Catullus would have dared to make such outrageous Verses against Cæsar, when Pompey's Party was entirely ruined at the Battle of Munda. Cæsar's Authority was then too terrible. I should be apt to believe, that That Satire was composed before the Passage of the Rubicon, and that therefore Suetonius is not mistaken, when he says, that Cæsar continued his Commerce of Hospitality with the Father of Catullus after his Reconciliation with the Son. The Title of Imperator unice, which is given to Cæsar, should seem to be contrary to this, by I know not what Allusion to a Decree of the Senate, who gave him that Title (36): but, as Scaliger does not insist on that Proof, it ought to be looked upon as weak. He owns that unicus may be taken for eximius. I believe another Sense may be given to That Word.

(33) Plutarch. in Cæsar. p. 733. Dion. lib. 43. ad Ann. 708. says, that Cæsar entered four Days successively in triumph, 1. for Gaul, 2. for Egypt, 3. for Pontus, 4. for Africa.

Eone nomine Imperator unice
Fuit in ultima Occidentis insula,
Ut ista vostra diffutata mentula
Ducenties comesset aut trecenties (37).

That is to say; Is it for That you are the only General that has been in Britain? Is it only to the end, &c. In the Article of MAMURRA (38), I shall confute those, who say, that Cæsar, at his Return from the last Expedition of Spain, heard the News of Catullus's Verses at Cicero's House.

The third Reason is altogether void; for, under pretence, that Cornelius Nepos flourished, according to St Jerom, in the 714th Year of Rome, it must not be inferred from thence, with Scaliger, that he was at that time busy in writing the Chronicle, mentioned by Catullus. Scaliger's Principle, that an Author is said to flourish or become illustrious, when he publishes a Work, cannot be proved by the Witness he alleges (39), considering the great variety of Ages, wherein Writers publish the Work, which procures them most Honour. Some publish their first Book early, and afterwards write many, which are much better, and are the true Epoch of their Glory; others do not set up for Authors till they are advanced in Years. Who shall tell us after what manner Cornelius Nepos governed himself? He composed several Books: Suppose he published many of them under Augustus, must it therefore be believed, that his Chronicle did not appear under Julius Cæsar, and even before the Passage of the Rubicon? Did not Henry Valois flourish in the Reign of Lewis XIV? Can any one say, that this is no exact Phrase? And yet he had published some excellent Books under Lewis XIII.

The fourth Reason must needs have appeared very strong to Vossius (40), since, to ward against it, he supposes, of his own Authority, and without the Testimony of any Author whatsoever, that the Secular Games were celebrated in the beginning of the VIIIth Century of Rome, and before the Death of Catullus. As for me, I had rather say, that this Poet, considering that the last Secular Games had been celebrated in the Year of Rome 604 (41), thought that others would be celebrated in the Year 704, and prepared his Carmen sæculare ad Dianam before-hand, and published it, although those Games had not been celebrated. How many Poems for Feasts, or for Ceremonies, do we find, whereof the Celebration, which seemed infallible, was not performed? I shall not enquire, whether it be very certain, that Catullus is the Author of the Title of That small Poem, or whether the Praises he gives to Diana may have no relation to the secular Games, as it is commonly believed, that the Twenty first Ode of the first Book of Horace has none. I am willing to believe, what Mr Dacier says concerning that Ode, that it is but preparatory to the secular Hymn, which is to be seen at the end of the fifth Book, and a mere Exhortation to the two Chorus's of young

Maid and Boys (42). If Horace made an Ode, which was but preparatory, might not Catullus make Verses, which were but preparatory? I observe by the way, that those Verses of Catullus are somewhat contrary to this Tenet of Mr Dacier: *There were two Chorus's in the secular Hymn, which were sung to Apollo and Diana, one of young Boys, and the other of young Maids, both singing by turns, the first the Praises of Apollo, and the other the Praises of Diana. Catullus makes the Praises of Diana to be sung as well by the Boys, as by the Girls (43). However it be, and what difficulty soever may be found in the Carmen sæculare of Catullus, it seems to me, that there are fewer Inconveniencies in supposing what I do, than in saying, either with Vossius, that there was a Celebration of Secular Games in the beginning of the VIIIth Century of Rome, or, with Scaliger, that Catullus was yet living in the 737th Year. Vossius's Supposition is not only destitute of Witnesses, but also contrary to the Testimony of Dio (44). That Historian declares, that the Secular Games, celebrated in the 737th Year, were the fifth: now we know that the fourth were celebrated a long time before the end of the VIIIth Century of Rome. Scaliger's Supposition is surrounded with a thousand Intricacies: For how can it be conceived, that Catullus was above thirty Years without making any Verses, and that a Reign like That of Augustus, so fruitful in great Events, and so favourable to Poets, should have drawn nothing from his Vein? How can we imagine, that no Poet of that Court spoke of him as of a living Man? Why should not Ovid have placed him in the number of the Poets, to whom he endeavoured to be known in his Youth? Lastly, Should Cornelius Nepos have been of such a depraved Palate, as to place Virgil and Horace, and all the other Poets of that Rank, below Catullus? Now this is what he must have done, according to Scaliger's Supposition. See here the Words of Cornelius Nepos: 'L. Julius Calpurnius, quem post Lucetii Catullique mortem multo elegantissimum Poetam, nostram tulisse ætatem vere videor posse contendere — expedit (45). — He dispatched L. Julius Calpurnius, whom our Age may, I think, boast of as the most elegant Poet, after the Death of Lucetius and Catullus.' This Conjunction of Lucetius and Catullus is already somewhat strange, if it be true, that the latter did not die till after the Year 737; for it is unquestionable, that the first died towards the beginning of the VIIIth Century of Rome. But, not to insist upon this, let us content ourselves with this other Difficulty. Is it possible, that Cornelius Nepos, who, according to Scaliger, lived some Years after the Secular Games of the Year 737, and consequently who saw Virgil and Horace in the Height of their Glory, did not believe, that they were able to dispute the first Rank with Julius Calpurnius, that first Rank, I say, which he did not hold till after the Death of Lucetius and Catullus (46)? How much reason has Vossius to say, that Scaliger's long Dispute concerning the Age of Catullus* contains nothing but what deserved to be suppressed! 'Hæc si attendisset Scaliger, profecto non institisset longam istam disputationem de ætate Catulli, in qua nihil omnino est quod non melius sit tacuisse. Sane ne semel quidem scopum attigit (47). So true is it, that great Wits sometimes sleep (48).

[K] Some learned Men believe, that Cicero pleaded for Catullus; but I do not find that they bring any Proofs for it.] Mr de Balzac declared himself for the Opinion, which does not seem to me to be solid. I shall transcribe what he has said upon it; and I begin with the Latin Verses, wherein he has spoken of Catullus without naming him:

— — — pestem tamen ille minorem
Scaligeri, Tullique Cliens, & Cæsare læso Conspicuis sæclis, nigro devovit Averno,
Nec tales Verona tulit sine vindice chartas (49).

He a less Mischief did detest, who boasts
The Patronage of Scaliger, and Cicero,
And famed for stand'ring mighty Cæsar's Name;
Nor could such Papers in Verona claim Impunity.

There was a Critic, who did not understand, who was spoken of in these Verses. Now here is Balzac's Reflexion on the pretended Obscurity, which he was reproached with. 'Those, who alledge that ancient Poet, without naming him, content themselves with calling him the Poet of Verona: witness, Veronensis ait Poeta quondam.

'But, as for me, to make him the easier to be known, and to give more light to the Description I give of him, I add the two most remarkable, and the most known, Passages of his Life, to the City where he was born. I have also inserted in it the greatest Honour, that was done to his Memory since his Death. And I maintain, that one, who is no Stranger to Antiquity, and who is not ignorant of the present State of our Republic of Letters, is obliged to know, that Catullus offended Julius Cæsar by a slanderous Epigram; that, in his Lifetime, he was defended by Cicero's Eloquence; that, since his Death, he has been re-established by Scaliger's Critical Observations; that he owes the gaining of a Law-Suit to the one, and the Preservation of his Honour, that is of his Writings, to the other; which is a second, better, and more glorious Life than the first (50). You see, that Balzac supposes, as a certain and known Fact, that Cicero pleaded for Catullus. He is not the only one, who affirms it: Achilles Statius says it also (51). Petrus Crinitus had already said it, and had made use of a Proof, taken from the Thanks, which Catullus gave Cicero in the Epigram: Disertissime Romuli Nepotum, &c (52). These are his words: 'Ingenii facilitate & doctrina adeo Romæ acceptus, atque civibus gratus fuit Catullus, ut Marci Tullii patrocinium meruerit: quod ipsum eleganti epigrammate ingenue testatus est, quo gratias Cicroni patrono egit (53). — Catullus had so far ingratiated himself with the Romans by his ready Wit, and Learning, that he merited the Patronage of Cicero; which he in ingenuously confesses in an elegant Epigram, in which he thanks his Patron Cicero.' But it is most false, that Catullus thanks Cicero in his Epigram for having pleaded for him: He thanks him in general, without particularizing any thing. Muretus owns, that the Cause of the Thanks cannot be guessed at: 'Agit gratias M. Tullio, quod ob beneficium ab eo acceptum divinare non possumus. Nam qui ad fundum Tiburtem hoc loco confugiunt, nihil aliud quam inscitiam pateficient suam (54). — He thanks Cicero, but for what favour we cannot guess. They, who have recourse, on this Occasion, to the Estate at Tibur, only discover their own Ignorance.'

It is for this Reason you will meet with it below, with greater extent [C]. I have been advised likewise to add some farther Particulars to those found in Moreri. I shall say then, that our Guido, Son of Cavalcante de Cavalcanti, having engaged himself in the Party of the Guelfs, experienced the Vicissitudes of Fortune: He was banished, and afterwards recalled, and shewed great Constancy in his Misfortunes, and never forgot to cultivate his Mind. He was not only an able Philosopher, but a very good Poet likewise. He composed, in Italian, a Work on the Rules of good Writing, and there remain some of his Verses, which are much esteemed. His Song on terrestrial Love has been commented on by many learned Persons [D]. He was married to the Daughter of [A] A noble Florentine.] We find, in a Letter, written from Rome, the fourteenth of April 1581, by Alphonso Ceccarelli da Bevagna (1), that a Chronicle, composed about Two hundred Years before, made the Family of the Cavalcanti very ancient. 'Le dico che le posso mostrare — una Cronica manoscritta di un Giovanni, Figliuolo del Conte Nicolo de Barbiano, scritta circa a 200 anni sono, dove si tratta a pieno delle Famiglie di Firenze secondo l'istoria scritta da Piero Canigiano nel 1103, e della Famiglia de' Cavalcanti dice che hebbe la sua prima origine della nobilissima stirpe Steellesia de Gotti, da Ariberto Cavalcante Steellesio, e che furono padroni di Pefcia con titolo di Conte (2). — I advance what I can prove — that a Manuscript Chronicle of John, Son of Count Nicolo de Barbiano, written about Two hundred Years ago, which fully treats of the Families of Florence, according to the History written by P. Canigiano, in 1103, and of the Family of the Cavalcanti, says it is descended from the noble Steellesian Race of the Goths, from Aribert Cavalcante, a Steellesian, and who were Patrons of Pefcia, with the Title of Counts.' The same Chronicle says, that Ansaldo, who is the Stock of the House of Medicis, settled in the City of Florence in the Year 806, and that he was married to Irinia Cavalcante. The Letter, which I have cited, makes mention of another Chronicle (3), which said but little of that Family. Di casa Cavalcanti dice molto poco, e tocca l'origine di questa casa imperfettamente e con poche parole (4). Note, that Michael Poccianus, speaking of our Guido Cavalcante, does not represent him as being of an ancient Extraction; but he observes one thing, which shews, that he was a considerable Person: He says, the Chiefs of the Tradesmen banished him, because he followed the Faction of the White. At last he was recalled, and died in the Year 1300 (5).

[B] It was said, that his profound Speculations had no other Aim, than to find that there was no GOD.] I freely confess, that I borrow the following Passage from Balzac only: 'Percioche alcuna volta speculando molto astratto da gli huomini deveniva, si diceva tra la gente volgare, che queste sue speculazioni erano solo en cercare se trovar si potesse che Iddio non fosse (6).

[C] It will be seen below more at large.] Boccace relates, that there were at Florence several Clubs, composed of rich Persons, who, in their turn, gave an Entertainment, and that That of Betto Branleschi had endeavoured to gain over Guido Cavalcante, and not without reason; 'for, besides that he was the best Logician in the World, and a perfect Natural Philosopher (Things which the Company never troubled their Heads about) he was also a very polite Gentleman, of a good Address, and knew better than any one how to do every thing becoming a Gentleman; and with all this he was very rich, and knew how to do honour to those he thought deserved it, as far as Words could express it; but Betto was never able to gain him; he and his Companions believing the reason to be, that Messire Guido, often buried in Contemplation, became an absent Man in Company; and, inasmuch as he held part of the Epicurean Notions *, the meaner sort said, that all his Speculations tended only to enquire, whether we might not discover, that there was no GOD (7). One Day Betto, and his Company, passing on Horseback by the Piazza of Santa Reparata, and seeing Guido among the Marble Monuments in that Quarter, said thus. 'Let us go, and teize him. Upon which, spurring their Horses, as if they would attack him, they came upon him unawares, and began to say to him; Guido, you refuse to be of our Society; but why? When you have found out, that there is no GOD, what will you have done? To whom Guido, seeing himself surrounded by them, replied. Gentlemen, you may make me what you please in your own House: then, laying his Hand on one of the Monuments, he leaped over, with great agility, to the other side. And, thus getting clear of them, he went away. They all stood astonished, looking one at another, and began to say, that he had no sense, and that what he had replied was not to the purpose; for that they had no more to do where they were than other Citizens, nor Guido more than themselves. To whom Betto said; 'Tis yourselves, who have no sense, if you understood him not; He has, decently and in few Words, said the severest thing in the World on us; for, if you consider it well, these Sepulchres are the Houses of the Dead, because they lay the dead in them, and they continue there: such he says is our House, giving us to understand, that we, and other Ignoramus's, are worse than dead, in comparison of himself, and other learned Men, and, being thus here among these Tombs, we are in our own House. Then every One understood what Guido meant, and were ashamed at it, nor ever meddled with him again, and from that time looked upon Betto as a subtle and understanding Cavalier (8).

Here we surprize Balzac in just such a Fault as we have seen elsewhere (9). If he had cited the Decameron of Boccace, which is a Book universally known, we should not have had a great Idea of his Reading; but, by not telling us whence he had This Passage, he was in hopes, I. That it would be supposed he had met with it in some Piece of Secret History: II. That he himself should be the Author quoted, when any one should mention this Character of Cavalcante; for of a thousand Persons, who read the Decameron, scarce two or three remember what is not an Adventure of Gallantry, or Pleasantry. Now the Novel, where Cavalcante is spoken of, is not of this Nature.

[D] His Song on Terrestrial Love (10) has been commented on by several learned Men.] The famous Egidius of Rome, who was General of the Augustins, and Archbishop of Bourges, and one of the most consummate School men of his Age (11) wrote a Commentary on This Song (12). Some think, this was the first time any one commented on the Verses of another composed in the vulgar Tongue (13). We find with this Commentary some Notes of Celsus Cittadini on the same Song, in the Edition of Siena, 1602, in 8vo (14). Dino del Garbo, a Florentine, and a great Philosopher, and Physician to Pope John XXII, followed the Steps of Egidius of Rome, with whom he was almost cotemporary: He likewise commented on this Song of Cavalcante.

of Farinata de gli Uberti (c) [E]. The famous Poet Dante boasts of having had a share in his Friendship (d); but he makes him the Son of one, whom he places in the Shades, among the Followers of Epicurus, who denied the Immortality of the Soul (e); and thus our Guido followed his Father's Footsteps. I believe, I am not mistaken, in supposing that ANDREW CAVALCANTE (f), the fine Genius, who flourished in the XVIIth Century, was of this Family. Tbuanus asserts it, with regard to BARTHELEMI CAVALCANTE, a Person famous for his Writings and his Negotiations, who was born at Florence in the Year 1503, and who died at Padua, the ninth of December, 1562 (g). See his Article in Moreti; but give no Credit to Tbuanus, when he says (h), that Guido (i) was cotemporary with Petrarch, and that we have still the Verses, which Petrarch addressed to him. Guido died before the other was born.

Paolo del Rosso, James Mini, Plinius Tomacelli, and lastly Jerôme Frachetta, a Philosopher of Roigo (15), commented likewise on it (16); and all This has been printed (17). The Author, who informs me of these things, observes, that the Italian Poetry is greatly obliged to Cavalcante, who gave it both Strength and Beauty. La prole che l'a reso immortale, sono i suoi nobilissimi Componimenti, a i quali molto e tenuta la Volgare Poesia, perciocche da essi ricevute non poca robustezza, e splendore (18). Compare this, if you please, with these Words of a Commentator on Dante. Cavalcante di Cavalcanti — bad a Son named Guido Cavalcanti, a Man of great Learning, a good Philosopher, and tolerable good Poet; but, for want of having read the Greek and Latin Poets, deficient in the Politenses requisite in a complete Poet (19).

Observe, that we find, in a Work of Marsilius Ficinus (20), an Explanation of the Doctrine of our Cavalcante, touching the Nature of Love. The Author there bellows great Commendations on him.

[E] He married a Daughter of Farinata de gli Uberti. He is one, whom Dante lodges, in the Shades, in the same Quarter with Cavalcante di Cavalcanti, and who became Head of the Gibeline Faction, which, by his Counsels, gained a signal Victory over the Guelphs of Florence (21). Our Guido was yet alive, when Dante composed the Tenth Canto of his Hell.

CAULIAC (GUY DE), a Physician of the University of Montpellier (a), and Author of a Book of Chirurgery, which was greatly esteemed [A], flourished in the XIVth Century. He studied, at Paris, under Henry de Hermondavilla, chief Physician of Philip the Fair (b). He was Physician of Pope Urban V (c), and of Pope Clement VI (d). He was at Montpellier, and pretty old, when he wrote his Treatise of Chirurgery, in the Year 1363 (e). He speaks very modestly of them, and as of a Book, in which he had only collected what he had read in good Authors (f).

[A] He is Author of a Book of Chirurgery, which is greatly esteemed. It would be endless to repeat the Names of all those, who have translated it, or who have procured Editions of it with Notes, or with Supplements (1). Let us be contented to point out some few. Jobn Tagaut, a very learned Physician, enlarged and improved the Chirurgery of Guy de Cauliac, taken from the Arabians, from the Chirurgery of the Greeks, together with his fine Latin, which is as pure as That of Cicero, though the Subject Matter of it be very different (2). They printed, at Lions, in 1579, the Chirurgery of Guy de Cauliac, newly restored to its dignity by Laurence Joubert, who, besides his new Translation, has inserted several fine Remarks in the Margin (3).

CAURRES (JOHN DES), born at Moræul (a), in Picardy, was Principal of the College of Amiens, and Canon of St Nicolas in the same Town. He had taught the Youth twenty Years (b), when, in 1575, he published a Work, which I shall speak of below [A]. He published some others, the Titles of which you will find in La Croix du Maine, and in Du Verdier Vau-Privas. He was yet alive in 1584, and ceased not being of Service to the Public, as well by his learned Writings, as by the Instruction he gave the Youth, whom he had in Charge, at the College of Amiens (c). He wrote some French Verses, which were not good. He made some very passionate on the Death of the Admiral de Coligni, and on the Punishment of the Count de Mongommeri, and was not ashamed to make an Ode in praise of the Massacre of Paris. All these Pieces are found in the fourth Book of his Moral Works.

[A] He published a Work, which I shall speak of below. He intitled it, 'Moral Works, diversified with Stories full of fine Examples, enriched with Lessons of Virtue, and embellished with various Sentences and Discourses. The whole taken from the most distinguished and remarkable Authors, Greek, Latin, and French, who have ever wrote, for the instruction of all Persons, who aspire to Virtue, and Christian Philosophy.' He got it printed at Paris, for William Chaudiere, in the Year 1575, in 8vo. It is a Book of Three hundred and fifty seven Leaves. I have not seen the Edition of the Year 1583, which is enlarged more than half (1). It was difficult for the Author to augment such a Work; for he had not recourse to the Originals; he only copied the modern Compilers, as Du Verdier Vau-Privas observes very justly. 'He has borrowed and collected, Word for Word, his Moral Works from several French Authors and Translators, to wit from the Anthology of Peter Bressay the Angevin, from the Commentary of Jobn Coras on the Arrêt de Martin Guerre, from the Translation of the Books of the Imposture of Devils by James Grevin, and many others (2).'

We must add, that he is a Compiler, who falsifies things, or who fetches them from a poisoned Source. I will give an Instance. He says, that the cruelty of Caligula proceeded from his Nurse; and he proves it thus. 'Dio, a Greek Historian, relates, that this cruel Man, during his Infancy, was suckled by a Nurse of Campania in Italy, named Priscilla, who contrary, to the Nature of Women, had as much Hair on her Stomach, as a Man has Beard on his Chin; and, besides This, few of the Roman young Gentlemen could equal her in throwing a Lance, in dextrously managing a Horse, and in drawing a Bow with Certainty. It happened, one Day, as she was preparing to give the Breast to Caligula, one of her Servants Maids gave her some little Offence, which the took Works. He had a good Opinion of his own Merit, and he thought that his fine Qualifications had exposed him to the Persecutions of Envy [B]. He has informed me of a Particular, which I was entirely unacquainted with; namely, that there was a time, when Women carried Looking-glasses over their Bellies [C]. I know not whether he was ever cited among the Roman Catholic Authors, who have related the Story of Pope Joan; but he deserves to have been; for he tells it, without the least Doubt of the Truth of it (d).

(d) Des Caurres, Moral Works, Book 5, chap. 16, fol. 225, verso.

took so ill, that she immediately killed her, and so covered her Breasts with her Blood, that Caligula drank several Times, and very abundantly, of it: imitating in this the Custom of the Women of her Country, who usually wet their nipples with the Blood of a Goat; in order, say they, to render their Children more strong and robust (3).

(3) Des Caurres, Moral Works, Book 2, chap. 25, fol. 73.

It is not true, that Dio relates these things. I suspected, in reading the Book of Des Caurres, that he stole them from Antony de Guevara, and, to satisfy myself, I consulted The Horloge des Princes, and found, that my Conjecture was true. This Spanish Impostor (4) relates this pretended Story of the Nurse of Caligula, as if he had read it in Dio, in the second Book of the Cæsars. There are many other Things, which Des Caurres has robbed him of, without naming him, and without depriving himself of the liberty of disguising them a little.

(4) Ant. de Guerre, Horloge des Princes, lib. 2. cap. 21. pag. m. 703.

[B] He believed, that his fine Qualifications had exposed him to the Persecutions of Envy. He dedicated his Moral Works to Monseigneur Antony, Lord of Crequy, and forgot not the Common Place, that he did so, that, by prefixing so illustrious a Name to his Works, he might make head against, and repel the Attacks of Zoulus's, perpetual Enemies of human Felicity (5). For I can assure you, my Lord, adds he, that if we believe, &c. to moreover exclusively: In Fol. aiii verso, of the Epistle Dedicatory of the Works Moral and Diversified of John Des Caurres, Paris, William Chaudiere, 1575, in 8vo. It must be this Edition, the Epistle Dedicatory not being to be found in That of 1583. Compare This with Remark [C] of the Article ANTESIGNAN.

(5) Epistle Dedicatory to Des Caurres's Works, fol. aiii, verso.

[C] He informs me — that there was a Time, when Women wore Looking-Glasses over their Bellies. I believe This Fashion continued not long; but it will not be amiss to take notice, that it made it's appearance in the World. John des Caurres condemns it with great severity: I am going to quote a long Passage, in which he censures some other Fashions. 'On this occasion (Ladies) give me leave to ask you, whether it be possible you can please God, and be saved, and yet do what he forbids. No sure: and, whether you will or no, you must either no longer wear your Hair, like the Wings of a Bat, or in Fashion of a Net, by which diabolically to catch and ensnare Men, in order to gratify your disorderly Appetite; or you must be lost, and damned. For undoubtedly This is forbidden you in the Old and New Testament. And if the King had so commanded, you would have done it: but for the Commandment, which God gives you, you will not comply; but rather, you will die (as it is said) in your disobedience and Pride, through this Worldly-mindedness, which deceives you; nay, which renders you so ugly and abominable to look at, that, if you knew how ill it becomes you, you would rather set Fire to it, than shew it, for the ill grace it gives you. And I wish to God it were permitted to call all those, who wear these things, Whores, in order to cure them of so doing! Good God! Alas! what an unhappy time are we fallen into, to see such depravity on Earth, as we see, to see our Women carry, even into Church, Looking-Glasses hanging over their Bellies! Read all Histories, Divine, Human, and Prophane; you will not find, that the Immodest, and Harlots, ever wore them in public, 'till this Day, when the Devil is let loose in France: which is still more detestable, before God and Men, than all other Abominations. And, though only Courtisans and Masquerading Ladies make use of them, in time no City Lady, or Servant-Maid, will be without them (6).'

CAUSSIN (NICOLAS), a French Jesuit, Confessor to Lewis the Just, was born at Troies in Champagne (a), in the Year 1580. He entered himself among the Jesuits at Twenty six Years of Age, and acquired much Glory by teaching Rhetoric in several of their Colleges. Afterwards he betook himself to preaching (b); and, as the Reputation, which he acquired, on that Account, was supported and increased by the Books he published, he was thought worthy to be placed near the King as Director of his Conscience. He did not acquit himself of that Office to the Satisfaction of the Prime Minister [A]; and, according to the most common Opinion, it was because he behaved himself in it as a good Man ought to do. Some have

[A] He was thought worthy to be placed near the King, as Director of his Conscience: but he did not acquit himself of that Office to the Satisfaction of the Prime Minister. Father Caussin's Disgrace was one of those Events, which occasion much Speculation, and are little spoken of, and whereof the Cause is never plainly known. Nevertheless, something of it is come to the Knowledge of the Public. It is pretended, that this Jesuit, a little before his Death, gave one of his Friends the Original of some Letters, written with his own Hand to the General of his Order, to Father Seguiran, and to the Prince of Condé; and the Public saw, by some Fragments of those Letters (1), that Father Caussin drew that Disgrace upon himself, for having refused to reveal certain things, which he had heard from Lewis XIII, in his Confession, and to consult his Superiors concerning the Direction of that Prince, when, to know their Advice, he must have discovered part of the Secret of the Confession. The same Fragments discover to us, that he disapproved Lewis the XIIIth's Conduct towards the Queen his Mother. Now That was the most proper means to incense the Cardinal. Mr de la Barde has observed, that That Cardinal caused Father Caussin to be turned out, by reason of the Scruples which he raised in the Prince's Mind with relation to the Hardships exercised towards Mary de Medicis. 'Hic postea Ludovici XIII. Regis Confessarius fuit, qui quoniam ei scrupulum iniecerat, de Mariâ Reginâ matre haud satis pie habita, atque Aulâ, & regni finibus abscedere coactâ, Aulâ & ipse Richellii operâ, cui cum Mariâ lites intercessere, facessere pridem jussus fuerat (2).' The Author of Father Caussin's Elogy has reason to say, that he ought to be admired, because he chose rather to draw such a Cardinal's Hatred upon himself, by following the Dictates of his Conscience, than to please That Cardinal in flaying from the right way. 'It must be said, for the Honour of That generous Father, that he behaved himself in such a manner at Court, that he left a Subject for Admiration behind him, and obliged People to confess with wonder, that his Soul was of an extraordinary Magnanimity; since, having such a Power against him, able to load him with Good or Evil in an Instant, he did not seek his Favour, either for himself or any of his Relations, and feared Disgrace very little, choosing rather to suffer all in his Person, than to fail in the Duty of a faithful Confessor. It is indeed an advantageous and very bold Word, which St Augustin spoke in have said, that he suffered himself to be too much surprized by the Artifices of a Jesuit of the Duke of Savoy's Court [B]. There is some likelihood, that he intrigued, to cause Cardinal de Richelieu to be expelled from the Court [C]. How-

The Silence of Father Alegambe, and his Continuator, cannot be sufficiently admired. The former, publishing his Book after Father Caussin's Disgrace, did not so much as take notice, that he had been the King's Confessor: the latter, publishing his since the same Jesuit's Death, observes indeed, that he was Confessor of Lewis XIII, but without speaking the least Word of his Disgrace. Mr Moreri has been no less mysterious, than the two Jesuits, who have written the Bibliothèque of the Writers of their Order: he neither says any thing of That Employ of Father Caussin, nor of his Banishment from the Court.

[B] It is said that he suffered himself to be too much surprized by the Artifices of a Jesuit of the Duke of Savoy's Court. Let us abbreviate what Mr Aubert published on that Subject (7). Father Monod, Confessor of the Dukes of Savoy, designing to embroil France, laboured vigorously to have the Queen-Mother re-called. For which reason he took care, in the Journey that he made to the Court of France, to contract Friendship with Father Caussin, a Jesuit also, and the King's Confessor, and to have several Conferences with him; wherein he had no great Trouble to persuade him, and to gain all the Credit he desired to have with him, being quite another Statesman and Courtier, than the other was, and having as much Wit and Malice, as we must believe what the Cardinal Duke said in some Dispatch, as Father Caussin had Simplicity and Ignorance. So that, having already that Advantage, he did no longer question the Success of the Business, and that such a Religious Prince, as Lewis XIII was, would follow the Motions and Advice of his Confessor in point of Conscience. And indeed the King shewed some extraordinary Disquiets and Troubles, after that Father Caussin had renewed his Scruples concerning the Removal of the Queen-Mother, and disposed him to re-call her, against his Prime-Minister's Inclination and Opinion. The Duke of Savoy informed the Cardinal of the secret Practices of those two Fathers (8); others affirm, that they were discovered by the Imprudence of Father Caussin, who, being solicited by the Duke of Angoulême about an Abbey of Nuns, which he desired, insinuated to him, that he should have Patience till the Cardinal was turned out of Employ, as he would infallibly be in few Days, and that he should then have a speedy and full Satisfaction. Which the Duke having acquainted His Eminence with, he was much pleased that he had discovered the Cause of the extraordinary Trouble the King had appeared to be in for some time, and laboured also immediately to find a Remedy for That pressing Evil. That Remedy was a Biller, which he sent to his Majesty against the Confessor. That Father did not find himself proof against so violent an Attack, nor in condition to resist This declared War. Wherefore, being without comparison much the weaker, he was forced to yield, and to receive the Law from the stronger, who had him expelled with some Infamy from the Court, and confined to Quimpercorentin in the Lower Brittany (9). Mr Aubert notes this under the Year 1639; but he himself supplies us wherewith to convince him of not having marked the Year right. The Cardinal, having thus brought one of those two Directors to his Duty, says he (10), had not his end so easily of the other, or at least had not so speedy Satisfaction of him, tho' he had it at last more amply and more exemplarily. Some Pages after (11), he informs us, that the Dukes of Savoy sent Word to the Cardinal of the Detention of Father Monod, the fourth of January 1639. Most Historians (I speak of those, who put the Year in the Margin) fall too often into such like Inconveniencies. See the end of the Remark [G].

(8) The Cardinal wrote this himself, as Mr Aubert assures. Ibid. pag. 48.

It results from this Narrative, how advantageously forever it be turned for the Cardinal, that Father Caussin's Aim was only to re-call Mary of Medicis. His Design might be lawful; for, in short, it does not seem, that a Prince's Conscience can be in a good Condition, when he treats his Mother ill. But it is true, that, in the late France was in, the Prince could hardly keep Mary de Medicis near him, without exposing his Kingdom to great Troubles; she was so much surrounded with Boute-feux; and, after all, it was very difficult to endeavour the recalling of That Princess, without aiming at the Cardinal's Ruin. An Author, whom I have quoted before, informs me, that the Jesuit Caussin undertook, with good Success, to reconcile Lewis XIII with the Queen his Wife, and by that means to take away the Barrenness of That Princess. This seems to me to be the most plausible sense that can be given to That Author's Words. Lewis XIII, says he (12), gave Father Caussin very great Access to his Person; and, having afterwards relished his Conversation, he admitted him very far into his Favour, even so far as to Familiarity, and treated him with so much Confidence, that it might well be judged he observed some excellent Parts in that Father, which had so easily and speedily gained his Heart. And it was no ways questioned but that it was That strong and generous Inclination, which he shewed in his Majesty's Service, and for his Honour, that made him extremely zealous for the public Good, and for the perfect good Understanding of the Royal Family, which his Designs only aimed at. And we have learned, by a faithful and unexceptionable Deposition, that France is partly indebted to his wife Counsels for the rich Present it has received from Heaven, which it enjoys now in the sacred Person of its august Monarch, a most worthy Son and lawful Heir of his Father's Virtues.

[I] It is probable, that he intrigued to cause Cardinal de Richelieu to be expelled from Court. If we may believe the Memoirs of the Abbot Sirey (13), that Jesuit had, in his Conversations with the King, concluded the removing of the Cardinal for four Reasons. I. Because of the Queen-Mother's Exile. II. Because his Eminence left Lewis XIII the Name of King only. III. Because he oppressed the People too much. IV. Because ever it be, his Employ was taken from him, and he was confined to a Town of Britany. He had leave to return to Paris after the Death of That Cardinal, and died there in the Jesuits House, the second of July, 1651 [D]. None of all his Works did him more Honour, than That, which he intituled The Holy Court [E]. He published many others, both in Latin and French [F]. It is a very singular thing, what is said of his Sympathy with the Sun (c). The Sieur Bullart is fallen into some Anachronisms [G].

of the great Services he did the Protestants, to the Prejudice of the Catholic Religion. He even engaged himself to maintain those four Points against the Cardinal in his Majesty's Presence; and he proposed to the Duke of Angouleme to take the Cardinal's Place. That Duke, having advertised the chief Minister of This Plot, was the Cause of Father Caussin's Disgrace, as the Abbot Siri says.

[D] He died the second of July, 1651. Mr Moreri, who was mistaken in the time that Caussin became a Jesuit (14), is moreover mistaken as to the time of his Death; he has placed it in the Year One thousand six hundred fifty-five. Bullart and Witte have noted the time of his Death as they ought, but not the Duration of his Life. One of them will have it, that Caussin died the second of July 1651, in the Sixty ninth Year of his Age (15), the other, that he died the second of July 1651, in the Eighty first Year of his Life, and in the Fifty seventh of his Profession of a Jesuit (16). This neither agrees with Father Alegambe, nor with Father Soutwell. According to Father Alegambe, the Entrance of Caussin among the Jesuits was in the Year 1606, and Caussin was then Twenty six Years of Age. He must therefore have died at the Age of Seventy one Years, and in the Forty fifth of Year of his Religious Life. Father Soutwell pretends, that Caussin became a Jesuit at the Age of Twenty six Years, and in the Year 1596. He died therefore at the Age of Eighty one Years, and must have been but Fifty five Years a Jesuit. I believe we must keep to Father Alegambe.

[E] Of all his Works none did him more Honour, than That, which he intituled The Holy Court. It has been printed I know not how many times (17), and translated into Latin, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, High-Dutch, and English (18). The first Edition of the first Volume is of the Year 1625, in 8vo. The other Volumes followed soon after. I shall criticize Mr Bullart hereafter (19), who said, that Caussin retired from the Court, to compose the Holy Court: he ought to have said that he revised and enlarged it, during his Disgrace.

[F] He published several other Books, both in Latin and French. The first Essays of his Pen were the sacred Symbols; some Pieces of Poetry, which are to be found in the Royal Pomp, and the Parallels of Eloquence (20). His Elogy says, that he made those three Books, when he was yet pretty young. Nevertheless, it is observed, in the Bibliothèque of the Jesuits, that the Eleazarum Symbolorum & parabolarum historiarum synagoga, seu

(21) This Book of Mr Drelin-court is the second Part of the Church's Triumph under the Cross. The Author informs us, in the Preface, that Caussin, in the second Edition of his Book, had sought all ways imaginable to maintain, that the taking of Rochel was a Proof, that That City was Heretical. Mr Drelin-court confutes him invincibly in his Preface.

de symbolica Aegyptiorum sapientia & polyhistoris symbolici lib. 12, was printed at Paris in the Year 1618; and that the Eloquentia sacra & humana parallela was printed at le Fleche in the Year 1619. So that the Author was near forty Years of Age, according to Father Alegambe's Account, and near fifty according to Father Soutwell's Account, when he published those two Books. Is that to be yet pretty young? Among his other Works, I observe chiefly his Apology for the Society of the Jesuits, printed in the Year 1644; the Answer to the Objections concerning Moral Divinity; the Triumph of Piety, which he published on Occasion of the taking of Rochel in the Year 1629; the Answer, which he published three Years after to Mr Drelin-court (21), against That Triumph of Piety; the Angelus Patris, printed in the Year 1650; the Regnum Dei seu dissertationes in libros Regum cum aliis tractatibus printed also in the Year 1650 (22).

[G] The Sieur Bullart is fallen into some Anachronisms. I have already noted his Mistake concerning Father Caussin's Age (23). Let us say no more of it, but see what remains. Father Caussin had not long dedicated himself to God under the Habit and Rule of St Ignatius, before he present the first Fruits of his Study to the Public. It was That rare Book of the Sacred Symbols, which, penetrating into the Hieroglyphics of the Egyptians, clears the Enigma's, that an ancient Author hides from us under mysterious Characters (24). We have already seen, that this Book was printed in the Year 1618; that is to say, according to Father Alegambe, twelve Years after Caussin was entered among the Jesuits. According to Father Soutwell, Caussin had been Twenty two Years enrolled in the Order of St Ignatius. Not having it in my Power to compare the Editions, I desire those, who may have the Convenience of doing it, to see if the Approbation of the Provincial of the Jesuits is well dated in the Edition of Cologne. I speak of the Book de symbolica Aegyptiorum sapientia. That Approbation is dated from la Fleche, the nineteenth of November 1627, in my Edition, which is of Cologne, in 8vo, in the Year 1631. I do not question, but that the Printers have put 1627 for 1617. Therefore I shall not make use of That Date, to prove, that the first Book, which the Jesuit Caussin published, is not the Hieroglyphics of the Egyptians. The Preface of That Work might serve me for a Proof of this; for the Author says there, that, being about his Rhetoric, he thought of this Book. Cum libros de triplici eloquentia & apparatus quendam ex florentissima exemplorum copia ad oratoriam facultatem instruerem, adjecti quoque animi ad symbolica veterum sapientiam.

Bring employed in writing the Book of the three kinds of Eloquence, and an Apparatus to Rhetoric, from a great variety of Examples, I applied my Thoughts likewise to the Symbolical Wisdom of the Ancients. Note, that he had published a Collection of Greek Poems (25) in the Year 1612, and a Latin Translation of one of Richome's Works (26) in the Year 1613. So that it could not be said, in Strictness, that the Explication of the Hieroglyphics was the first Essay of his Pen. Those five Works (these are Mr Bullart's Words (27), and he speaks, I. Of the Sacred Symbols. II. Of the Royal Pomp. III. Of the Parallels of Sacred and Profane Eloquence) having made his Name known among the Learned at Court, his Superiors desired also that the Prince should know his Person. Father Gonteri, one of the most famous Preachers of their Society, brought him to the Louvre, and presented him to Henry IV.

who received him with many Careless, and, seeing the Splendor that shined on his Face, he said, That he would prove, one Day, one of the most distinguished Persons of his Society. This is to confound Chronology; for those Three Works of Father Caussin did not appear till after the Death of Henry IV. The Symbols, which, according to Mr Bullart, were his first Essay, did not come out till 1618. The Narrative, which is in Father Caussin's Elogy, is as much confounded, as the Order of Time. Here are the Words of the Author of That Elogy (28): 'Father Caussin had a very particular Sympathy with the Heavens, especially with the Sun; which he called his Planet, and of which he felt very notable Operations, as well on his Body, as on his Mind, according to it's Approach, or Withdrawing, and proportionably as it was clear or clouded. And This Affinity was not only observed accidentally, but appeared constantly in the Fire of his Eyes, and in the lively Colour of his Face, which carried something celestial, and which formerly touched Henry the Great with an extraordinary Emotion. That Prince, so judicious in the Knowledge of Men, looking one Day in his Face, when he was yet but young, accompanied with Father Gonteri, one of the most famous Preachers of his Time, having never seen or known him before, went towards him thro' the Crowd, took him by the Hand, and caressed him so much, that he was put to the Blush, and those, who were about him,

I have just read a Letter (d), in which it is asserted, that the Queen-Mother caused him to leave Paris, and banished him into Britany, to oblige Cardinal Mazarine, whom he had offended; and that the Reason of this Disgrace proceeded from the Book De Regno & Domo Dei, which he had published in the Year 1650, and in which he had said some good things concerning the Qualities of Princes.

were astonished at it, adding, That he had discovered him among all That great Company, and that he must be serviceable to him: and, turning to Father Conteri, he said to him aloud, by a remarkable Prognostication: You have a Companion there (Father) who, I think, will prove in time one of the greatest Ornaments of your Society. Compare this with Mr Bullart's Narrative, and what difference will you not find between the Original and the Copy? for it must not be questioned, but that Mr Bullart copied That Elogy, turning what he borrowed from it after his manner. He succeeded no better in what follows. Father Caussin accepted, indeed, That difficult Office (29), and exercised it, for some time, with great Prudence and Piety; but, seeing the Royal Family in Discord, he left it with the same Indifference, and returned to his Convent; where, disengaged from the Troubles of a prophane Court, he employed all his Thoughts in the composing of That great and marvellous Work of The Holy Court. That

Work was already translated into Latin, before This Father left the Court (30); besides, his leaving it was no ways voluntary: He was forced to yield to Persecutions, and to the imperious Desires of the chief Minister; and he did not return to his Convent; for he was confined to the Lower Britany.

I am sure, that most of the Elogies of Illustrious Men are full of such like Anachronisms, and that they are often committed in them, than the Sophism à non causa pro causa in the Scholastic Books. To avoid this, the form of Annals ought to be given to the History of Great Men: but the Annalsists themselves are not always exempt from Anachronisms; for it often happens that they say nothing of an Affair, till the Year in which that Affair ends. Then they go back to the beginning, and give the Origin and Progress of it, and crowd together five or six Years, without setting down any Date; so that their Readers are put out of the way of an exact Chronology.

(30) See in Allegambe, pag. 175, that Henry Lamormaini translated most of the Books of the Holy Court, in 1635, 1637, and 1638. If I am not deceived, Father Caussin was sent from Court in December, 1637.

CERASI (TIBERIUS) flourished towards the end of the XVIth Century. He was an Advocate, and practised for twenty Years at the Bar of Rome, and afterwards became a Consistorial Advocate, in 1589. He was Advocate of the Public Revenues, and of the Apostolic Chamber, and afterwards Clerk of the same Chamber, and, at last, the Pope's Treasurer. Although he wrote many Things, the Public has seen only his Answers, among the Counsels of Farinacius. He died at Rome the seventh of May, 1601, as it is said, of Grief and Vexation, for having been severely reprimanded by Pope Clement VIII (a). He was in his Fifty seventh Year. He left all his Estate to the Hospital of the Consolation, and was buried in the Church of our Lady del Popolo (b).

CERATINUS (JAMES), a learned Man of the XVIth Century, and a good Grecian, gave himself this Name, according to the Custom of the Time, because he was of Hoorn in Holland [A]: We shall explain this [B]. He has been adorned with great Elogies by Erasmus [C], not only on the account of his good Life, but also on the account of his Learning. Erasmus, having been desired by George, Elector of Saxony, to make choice of a Person to fill the Place, which the Death of Mosellan had left vacant in the University of Leipsic, sent him Ceratinus (a), who had also an offer of the Professorship of the Greek Tongue in the College of the three Languages at Louvain. Ceratinus was not very well received at Leipsic; and it appears, by some Letters of Erasmus (b), that he drew that cold Reception upon himself, by not shewing Aversion enough for Lutheranism. This happened in 1525. Before that Time, he had taught the Greek Language privately at Louvain (c); whither he retired, when the War, and the Plague, made him leave the Place, which he had in the College of Tournay. He died at Louvain, the twentieth of April, 1530, in the Flower of his Age (d). He was a Priest; and

[A] He gave himself this Name — because he was of Hoorn in Holland. Mr Moreri ought not to have been in Suspence about it: He does not know whether Ceratinus was born at Hoorn in Holland, or at Horne in the Country of Guelderland. Properly speaking, Horne, which he speaks of, is not in Guelderland.

[B] We shall explain This. Hoorn, in Dutch, is as much as to say a Horn. In Greek, a Horn is called κέρας: Thus James Ceratinus is the same thing, as James the Horned, a Title, which he preferred before That of Hornamus, under which This Author is sometimes denoted, and before that of Teyng, which was the Name of his Family: I say, he preferred it before all others, as well because it was Greek, and that under that Language he discovered but to few People the Infamy, which attended the Word Horn, as because his Celibacy sheltered him from ill-natured Allusions, to which his Name might have exposed him, if he had had a Wife.

[C] He has been adorned with great Elogies by Erasmus. Erasmus thought him learned enough to be Professor in the midst of Italy, and much more learned than Mosellan had been. Jacobus Ceratinus (says he) homo tam Græcicæ literaturæ callens ut possit vel in media Italia profiteri, nec se ipso inferior in literis Latinis (1). In another Letter (2), he expresses it yet more strongly: Græcicæ literaturæ tam exacte callens, ut vix unum aut alterum habeat Italia quicum dubitem hunc committere, nec in Latinis sui dissimilis est. — So perfect a Master of the Greek Tongue, that Italy cannot shew one or two, with whom I should scruple to compare him; nor is he unlike himself in the Latin. See here how he speaks in another Place (3). Succedit Petro Mosellano, sed decem Mosellanis eruditior, etiam Mosellani doctriam & ingenium baud vulgariter amabam. — He succeeded Peter Mosellan, but more learned than ten Mosellans, though I had an uncommon value for the Learning and Abilities of Mosellan. As to his Morals, he says, That he was the best Man in the World, one thing happened at the Time of his Ordination, which deserves to be known [D]. He was mistaken, when he wrote to Erasmus, that he had seen him at Deventer [E]. There is a Treatise of his De sono Græcarum Literarum, a Translation of St Chrysostom's first and second Dialogue on the Excellency of the Priesthood, and a Greek and Latin Lexicon [F], which was printed with a Preface of Erasmus, in the Year 1524.

(5). — He is a most sincere, and most friendly Man; inasmuch that he seems no less born for the Graces, than the Muses. Habet unum hoc vicium Ceratinus noster, immodice modestus est, sic verecundus ut pene pudulus sit (6). — Our Ceratinus has this one Fault; he is modest to excess, and so bashful as even to give disgust. Valerius Andreas relates a good part of these Passages; and besides he cites Junius, who praised Ceratinus much in his Proverbs, (I shall speak of it hereafter), and in his Batavia; In qua à singulari modestia ac virginali quodam pudore commendat. — In which he commends him for his singular Modesty, and girlish Bashfulness. But Valerius Andreas has taken no notice, that the Elogy of Excellissimi viri judicii, which he believes Erasmus gave to Ceratinus, is designed for Henry Stromer, to whom he was recommended. See the Twenty ninth Letter of the twentieth Book (7).

[D] A Thing happened at the time of his Ordination, which deserves to be known. Adrian Junius, Country-man of Ceratinus, after having heaped a great many Praises upon him, adds (8), That he has it from good Hands, that Ceratinus, unwilling to disobey his Father's severe Orders, went to Utrecht to be ordained Priest. He was examined according to Custom, and upon his ingenuous Confession, that he did not know one Rule of the Grammar by heart, which they asked him, he was rejected as an ignorant Man, and commanded to go and study his Grammar with more Application. He went away without saying any thing, and was contented to tell the Cause of his Exclusion to a learned Clergy-man, who, going immediately into the Assembly of the Examinators, represented to them the Mistake they had just committed: that there was not a more learned Person in Louvain, than he, whom they had turned away to learn his Accidence, and that he had given public Proofs of his Knowledge, by a most pure Latin Translation of St Chrysostom's Books concerning the Priestly Dignity. They considered the Matter; Ceratinus was called in again; Excuses were made him from the Necessity of conforming themselves to the usual Practice, and he was ordained Priest. If those Gentlemen had asked Ceratinus, Per quam regulam? as they do Scholars, who are examined in their Declpateur (or Grammar), and who are obliged to decline their Name by Rule; I say, if they had treated him at that rate, because they had been advertised, that he was a proud Man, they could not have been blamed. There goes a Story, that a young conceited Fellow, ready to be received into Orders, had the Mortification of being first examined in this manner, Musa quæ pars orationis? and that having answered, Aquila non capit muscas, they replied to him Neque Ecclesia superbo; and that he was sent back without Ordination.

[E] He wrote to Erasmus, that he had seen him at Deventer. A Letter, which Erasmus wrote to him in the Month of April 1519 (9), wherein he calls him Hornensis, informs us, I. That Ceratinus had desired Erasmus's Friendship, and that, among other things, he had told him, that he had seen him at Deventer. II. That he had mentioned to him some Circumstances, which he thought would make him remember it. Erasmus answered him, That it was an Illusion, and to prove it, he made use of those very Circumstances; he observed to him, That, when he departed from Deventer, the Bridge was not yet made, and that he did not set out so soon for England (10). If I am asked, Why I take notice of these Trifles? I answer, That it is to give an illustrious Example of an Illusion, which is very common; and for which one might excuse one's self better than is commonly done, by considering, that some very learned Men fall into it. When an Author becomes very famous, those, who have studied in the same Universities with him, take I know not what Delight, to say, in Companies, where That Author is spoken of, That they knew him a long time before, that they saw him a Scholar, &c. They fancy, that they do thereby participate, in some measure, of That Great Man's Glory: and, on that account, they relate more Facts than are believed, and more are believed than are true (11). I am sure, that many Persons will know themselves by this. However, we see here, by the Example of Ceratinus, that one ought not to trust too much to one's Memory; for it must not be questioned, that he meant it honestly.

[F] We have of his — a Greek and Latin Lexicon. Boxhornius (12) is mistaken, in pretending that it is the first Greek Lexicon that was made. Valerius Andreas (13) is not much less mistaken when he says, That Ceratinus is the first, after Aldus Manucius, who enlarged and published such a Lexicon. The Preface (14), which Erasmus prefixed to This Work of Ceratinus, is sufficient to shew, that it had already been enlarged by several Persons, and re-printed several times. Nay, Somebody had inserted some proper Names in it, which Erasmus did not approve. It seems at first, that Gesner believed, that This was meant of Ceratinus (15); which is visibly false, if the Preface be never so little examined; but, if Gesner's Expression be narrowly considered, he will be cleared. The same Boxhornius does not distinguish the manner how Ceratinus taught Greek in Louvain. He says, Græcæ (linguæ) Professore egit Lovanii. These Words are deceitful; they lead all Readers to imagine, that Ceratinus was a Professor of the Greek Language in the University of Louvain; which is not true. Swertius (16), from whom Boxhornius took the Epitaph of Ceratinus, with the Fault of Impression Minoritas, that is to say, the Franciscans, should have informed him, that Ceratinus taught Greek only in private, privatim. Valerius Andreas makes use of the same Word.

CERINTHUS, an Arch-Heretic, cotemporary with the Apostles, attributed the Creation of the World not to GOD, but to Angels (a). He taught, That JESUS CHRIST was the Son of Joseph, and that the use of Circumcision ought to be retained under the Gospel. He is looked upon as the Chief of the converted Jews, who raised the Tumult in the Church of Antioch (b), related by St Luke in the fifteenth Chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. They raised that Disturbance, by declaring to the Faithful, That, without Circumcision, they could not fail to be damned. It is said also, that he was one of those, who, some Years before (c), had censured St Peter for having preached the Gospel to the Gentiles (d). Epiphanius, who says all this (e), pretends, nevertheless, that Cerintus came after Carpocrates, which is to pervert Chronology [A]. Cerintus passes for one of the chief Heads of

of the Millenarians; he is accused of having taught, That, after the Resurrection, the Church should continue a thousand Years upon Earth, and that it would be a terrestrial Reign of JESUS CHRIST, a Time of Temporal Prosperity, and Voluptuousness [B]. Upon which some believed, that he was the true Author of the Revelations [C], and that he fathered it upon St John. Every one knows what is said of that Apostle, concerning his Aversion for Cerintus; I say, every one knows, it is reported, that he would not go into the same Bath where that Arch-heretic was. The Ancients have varied on this Subject, and the Moderns have added some Circumstances to it, which might pass for a pious Fraud [D]. Some have applied to Cerintus, what Theodoret said concerning certain Defenders of the Mo-saical

Carprocatians (1). He says, that Tertullian and Epiphanius assert it, that St Augustin affirms it, being deceived by Epiphanius; and that Isidorus (2) has copied this Error from St Augustin. He shews, by Two Reasons, that Cerintus lived in the Apostles Time; one is taken from what shall be said hereafter, when we shall say, that St John did not go into the Bath; the other is taken from hence, viz. that That Apostle seems to have refuted some Errors of Cerintus (3). He maintains, on the other side, that Carprocatians lived in the Time of Antoninus Pius (4), and he observes, that Theodoret places him in the Reign of Hadrian, and that Eusebius makes him live at the Time when Saturninus dogmatized (5). It ought to have been said, That Eusebius advances this, quoting St Irenæus for it. This would have given some weight to the Proof. Damascus does not forget to ob- serve, that Epiphanius has confuted himself, having acknowledged, that Cerintus opposed the Apostles more than once (6). Let us conclude, that Mr Moreri erred, when he said, that Cerintus was a Disciple of Carprocatians.

[B] He is accused of having taught the Millennium, a Time of temporal Prosperity and Voluptuousness. See here in what manner Caius relates this Opinion (7). In some Relations, which Cerintus has written, as if he had been some great Apostle, he tells us some monstrous Opinions, which he feigns, the Angels have revealed to him: He affirms, that the Reign of JESUS CHRIST shall be established on Earth after the Resurrection, and that Men shall live in Jerusalem, being again subject to Concupiscence and Voluptuousness, and that it shall be a Marriage Feast, which shall last a thousand Years. Thus Caius represents this Fact. Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, in the Time of Eusebius, represents the thing more grossly. Cerintus, says he (8), believed, that the Reign of JESUS CHRIST should be ter- restrial; and, as he was much addicted to bodily Pleasures, he feigned, that the Voluptuousness, which he desired, should make up the essential Part of That Reign: he makes it to consist in satisfying the Belly, and the Parts below, that is to say, in eat- ing, drinking, marrying, celebrating of Feasts, and offering of Sacrifices; for under these last Terms, which are more modest, he covered those Voluptu- ousnesses. I shall set down the Greek Words, with the Latin Translation of Valesius, that it may be seen whether my Conjecture has any ground (9). *Ἐπίγειον ἔσθαι τὴν τῷ Χριστῷ βασιλείαν, καὶ ὡς αὐτὸς ἔρχεται, φιλοσωματικῶς ὡς καὶ πᾶν σαρκικὸν, ἐν ταῖς οὐνεξπολεῖν ἔσθαι, γαστρὸς καὶ τῶν ὑπὸ γαστρίᾳ κληρονομῶν: τῆς σιτίου καὶ ποτίου καὶ γάμου, καὶ δι' ὧν ἐφημέτερον ταῦτα οὐδὲν ποιεῖσθαι, ἐορδαῖς καὶ θυσιῶν καὶ ἱερῶν σφαγῶν. Regnum Christi terrenum futurum. Et quarum re- rum cupiditate ipse flagrabat, utpote voluptatibus cor- poris obnoxius carnique addictus, in iis Regnum Dei situm fore somniavit, in ventris, & earum, quæ in- fra ventrem sunt, partium explenda libidine: hoc est in cibo & potu, ac nuptiis, atque, ut honestior voca- buli ejusmodi voluptates velaret, in festis (10) & sacri- ficiis & hostiarum maculationibus. My Conjecture is, that Cerintus did not expressly teach, that the Hap- piness and Glory of the Reign of JESUS CHRIST should consist in indulging Gluttony and Luxury, but that he made use of another turn of Expression; that he had recourse to the Rejoicings, which are proper for Days of Feasting, particular Days de- signed for Sacrifices, and for feasting on them. The Greek Words, which I have cited, insinuate plainly, that he covered his meaning under modest Phrases. But it was thought lawful to withdraw the* Curtain, and to paraphrase them in such a manner, that all the Deformities of his Opinions might easily be discovered. If my Conjecture was certain, there would be some little Trick in the Proceedings of Cerintus's Enemies; for, in short, what Right has any body to impute Particulars to an Author, which he does not mention? Why may he not enjoy the Benefit he ought to expect from the Generality of his Expressions? For the rest, Valesius does not approve, that, instead of ἐφημέτερον we should read ἐνθυμέ- τερον (11); and he alleges for it the Translation of Rufinus: 'Nec aliter legisse Rufinum ex versione ejus apparet. Sic enim verit: Et ut aliquid sacratus dicere videretur, legales diebat festivitates rursus celebrandas. Festorum scilicet & sacrificiorum no- mine libidines suas velabat Cerintus, ut honesta- tem quandam in speciem præferret (12). — That Rufinus read it no otherwise, is plain from his Tran- slation. For he thus renders it: And that he might seem to imply somewhat more sacred, he said that legal Festivals would be celebrated. That is, Ce- rintus veiled his wanton Gratifications under the Name of Feasts and Sacrifices, that he might keep up an Appearance of Decency.'

[C] Some have believed, that he was the true Au- thor of the Revelations. The same Dionysius, whom I have quoted in the foregoing Remark, informs us, that there had been some Persons, who wholly re- jected the Revelations, as a Work, which was not of St John, nor of any Apostle, nor of any other Ecclesiastical Person, and which did not deserve to be called a Revelation, since it was covered with such a thick Veil, that nothing could be understood in it; that Cerintus had composed it, and put St John's Name to it, to credit his Visions under the Authority of such a venerable Apostle; Κλεινὸν δὲ τὸν καὶ τὴν ἀπ' ἐκείνου κληθεῖσαν κλεινὴν ἐνομέ- μενον αἰρεσιν, ἀξιώσαντες ἐπισημῶς αὐτὸν ἀναλίσ- τειν ἐκείνου πλάσματι ὀνόματι. Cerintum enim qui nominis sui sectam conflavit, cum magnæ auctori- tatis nomen ad faciendam fidem commentis suis vel- let præfigere, Joannis titulum operi suo indidisse (13).

[D] The Ancients have varied on this Subject, and the Moderns have added to it — a pious Fraud. The Variation of the Ancients consists in this, that some pretend, that this Fact concerns Cerintus, and others, that it concerns Ebion. You will find in Eusebius, that St John, being entred into the Bath, and understanding, that Cerintus was there, went away immediately, and bid his Companions do so too; let us fly from hence, said he to them, for fear that a Bath, wherein the Enemy of Truth is, should fall upon us. Φύγε- μεν μὴ καὶ τὸ βαλανεῖον συμπίσῃ, ἐνδὸν οἷοι Κηρίθου τῷ τῆς ἀληθείας ἐχθρῷ. Eusebius inquit, ne Balneum corruat, in quo Cerintus est, inimicus Veritatis (14). Eusebius quotes St Irenæus, who says, that St Polycarp had been heard to say so (15), and that the thing was done in Ephesus. If you consult Epiphanius, you will find that St John, who never went into the Bath, was prompted, one Day, by the HOLY GHOST, to go thither. But, hearing that the Arch-heretic Ebion was there, he apprehended the Cause of the Inspiration he had received: he knew, that the HOLY GHOST had not inclined him to go thither, but to give him an Occasion to shew how much Truth is to be esteemed, and with what Dis- tinction the Friends of GOD, and the Instruments of the Devil, ought to be treated. He groaned then, and spoke these Words loud enough to be heard by all those, who were present, Haste away, my Brethren, let us go from hence, for fear the Baths should fall, and crush us to pieces, with Ebion, be- cause cause of his Impiety (16). Baronius, to reconcile Irenæus and Epiphanius, says, that it might happen that Cerinthus and Ebion were together in the Bath (17): but Mr de Tillemont observes, That it is not necessary to have recourse to this Conjecture, it being no rare thing for St Epiphanius to be mistaken in History (18). He adds to this, says he (19), several Particulars; less certain, and of less Importance. Note here the Progress of Stories: St Irenæus probably was the first, who published the Action of St John; he was contented to relate what he had heard of it: but those, who succeeded him, finding his Narrative too naked, did flourish upon it. They did not think it a glorious thing for That Apostle's Memory, that it should be thought, that he bathed himself in a public Place; for which reason they affirmed that he never did it, and, if he designed it one Day, it was by order from above. Afterwards a Cause of the Inspiration must be sought for; It was found in this, that it was requisite to make the Faithful know, that they ought to abhor the Enemies of Truth, and believe, that the Divine Justice is always ready to shew great Examples of Severity against Herefiarchs. But, because they thought it was not proper, that the Readers should think, that St John was afraid without Necessity, or that the implicate Threatning contained in his Words proved vain, they supposed, that the Herefiarch, with whom he would not bathe, was crushed under the Ruins of the House. This is what the following Ages have added to St Epiphanius's Flourishing.

I confess ingenuously, that I had never read This Addition, before I read it in a Letter of the learned Reinesius; but I have found it since in several Authors, whom he does not alledge. He speaks of it, after he had observed, that the contemporary Writers do not say, that Frederic Barbarossa was trod under Foot by the Pope, but that their Silence has not hindered their Successors from inventing That Circumstance, and affirming it boldly.

Similis, adds he (20), huic historiae interpolatio temerarie commissa est ab illis, qui five Ebionem five Cerinthum (variant enim) Ephesi ruinâ balnearum, in quibus disputaret unâ cum auditoribus suis, oppressum esse narrarunt. Cum enim legissem apud Iren. l. 3. c. 3. Epiphani. hæ. 30. Euseb. l. 3. Hist. Eccl. c. 23. & l. 4. c. 14. è relatu B. Polycarpi, S. Johannem Evang. & Apostolum, cum in balneis quas loturus intraverat Cerinthum cum suis esse audivisset, Festinate, dixisse, fratres; Egrediamur, ne domus corrumpatur & pereamus cum Cerintho, qui intus est, inimico Veritatis: quod timere ne fieret dixerat Apostolus, id factum sic esse interpretati sunt. In hac culpa est ille qui notas marginales Epiphanius Latino, excuso Basil. an. 1560. intulit; fingit enim miraculum à Joanne editum: & Victor. Strigel. qui Schol. ad Proverb. Salom. c. 22. tanquam Irenæi præv. adfert hæc: Egresso Joanne domus statim collapsa Cerinthum & turbam reliquam oppressit: quod veterum & proximorum Apostoli & Cerinthi temporibus nemo dixerat. Plura ejusmodi Oratores, tam Ecclesiasticos quam Politicos, peccasse circa historias sine dubio notasti, (sane observantur quotide) deque iis moneri Juventutem veræ historiae & elegantiorum literarum interest. — The same kind of Interpolation or Violation is committed by those, who related, that Ebion or Cerinthus, (for they differ as to the Person) while he was disputing, was crushed, together with his Auditor, by the Fall of a Bath. For, having read, in Irenæus, lib. 3. c. 3. Epiphani. hæ. 30. Euseb. l. 3. Hist. Eccl. c. 23. & l. 4. c. 14. from the Relation of St Polycarp, that St John the Evangelist and Apostle, going into a Bath, and hearing, that Cerinthus and his Followers were there, cried out, Haste, my Brethren, let us retire, lest the House fall, and we perish with Cerinthus, who is within, That Enemy of Truth; have interpreted as False what the Apostle had said he feared would happen. In this mistake is He, who added marginal Notes to the Latin Epiphanius, printed at Basil, ann. 1560: for he pretends, that St John wrought a Miracle; and Victor Strigelius, who, Schol. ad Proverb. Salom. c. 22. produces these as the Words of Irenæus: St John being gone out, the House immediately fell, and crushed Cerinthus, and the rest of the Company; which no one of the Ancients, and near the Times of the Apostle and Cerinthus, ever said. You must have observed many Faults of this kind as well in Ecclesiastical as Political Orators, in regard to History, which it is for the Interest of true History and polite Literature, that Youth should be put in mind of. If I had shortened this Passage, I had robbed many of my Readers of a Piece of Knowledge, which will please them, which is, that the like Falsifications are to be found both in Ecclesiastical and Lay Orators, of which it concerns Youth to be informed. A Fault an hundred times more common than it should be! If an Author says, that certain Things were feared; another will say, that they actually happened. A bad and shameful Imitation of the Novelists (21)! Perhaps Reinesius remembered only the two Authors, whom he quotes; one is He, who put Notes in the Margins of St Epiphanius; the other is Victorinus Strigelius: but here are several others. Brother Bernard of Luxemburg affirms, that the Venerable Bede says, that St Polycarp relates (22) what St John said and did, and that, as soon as the Apostle was gone out, the Fall of the Bath crushed Cerinthus to death. De isto Cherinto dicit Beda super Epistolam Joan. narrat enim de illo scilicet Joanne auditor ejus sanctissimus vir & martyr fortissimus Polycarpus Smyrnearum antistes, quod tempore quodam cum apud Ephesum balnea lavandi gratia fuisset ingressus, & vidisset ibi Cerinthum exire, continuo discessit non lotus, dicens; Fugiamus hinc ne balnea ipsa nos corrumperent, in quibus est Cerinthus inimicus veritatis. Quo egresso balneum cecidit, & hæreticum cum suis oppressit (23). — Beda, on the Epistle of St John, says it of That Cerinthus; for Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, a most holy Man, and valiant Martyr, relates of him, viz. St John, that, going one Day into a Bath at Ephesus, and seeing Cerinthus come out, he immediately departed without washing, saying, Let us fly hence, lest the very Bath, in which is Cerinthus, The Enemy of Truth, corrupt us. After he was gone, the Bath fell, and crushed the Heretic, and his Followers. Præteolus asserts, that St Irenæus says, in the third Chapter of the third Book against Heresies, that St John found Cerinthus sitting in the Bath with his Followers, and vehemently disputing, and impudently and blasphemously denying that JESUS CHRIST was GOD: St John rose up, and warned his Friends to retire with him from thence, because GOD was going to punish such impudent Blasphemies. As soon as he was gone out, the House fell, and destroyed Cerinthus and all his Company. You may easily believe, that Præteolus does not leave such a Place, without moralizing against the Authors of Sects. Read all that he says. Quod vero contemporaneus sancto Joanni Evangelistæ fuerit, testatur divus Irenæus lib. 3. adversus hæreses cap. 3. cum de beato Polycarpo loquens, ait venisse aliquando in balneum Joannem, & illic reperisse Cerinthum hæreticum una cum consortio suorum sedentem, inter quos Cerinthus acerrime disputabat, impudenteque blasphemus negabat Christum Deum esse. Atque furgens Johannes monuit amicos suos qui ei assidebant, ut una secum abirent: nam non velle Deum amplius ferre blasphemias tam impudentes. Illico vero cum egressus esset, collapsa domus Cerinthum cum sua cohorte extinxit. Ex quo licet videre horrendum exemplum divinæ ultionis & vindictæ in eos, qui manifesta impietate nomen Dei & ejus sanam doctrinam blasphemant, non verentes sectas perditionis introducere: & quam ira

(21) There is a place in this Dictionary [end of the Remark [4], of the Article VIRGILIUS, Bishop of Salzburg] where I have said, that the Novelists, having seen some Letters, which say, the Army of their Party is preparing to lay Siege before a Town, affirm that the Siege is quite formed.

with things, which they had not seen; and it is affirmed, that Cerintbus, having had some Correspondence with the Jews, Pagans, and Magicians in Alexandria, invented an Hypothesis, composed of Judaism, Paganism, and Magic, and spread it chiefly in Pbrygia and Pisidia, and even that he performed Prodigies by the Invocation of Angels (g). He rejected the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of St Paul, and admitted only the Gospel of St Matthew (b). Neither did he admit of that altogether, if we may believe Epiphanius (i).

divina illos non patiatur tandem inultos (24). — That he was cotemporary with St John the Evangelist, St Irenæus testifies, in his third Book against Heresies, Chap. 3. when, speaking of St Polycarp, he says, that St John once came to a Bath, and there found Cerintbus, the Heretic, sitting with his Companions, among whom Cerintbus was warmly disputing, and impudently blasphemous denied that CHRIST was GOD. And St John rising up exhorted his Friends, who sat near him, to depart with him: for that GOD would no longer bear such impudent Blasphemies. But when he was retired, the House fell, and destroyed Cerintbus and his Company. Where we may see an horrible Example of Divine Vengeance on those, who with manifest Impiety blaspheme the Name of GOD, and his sound Doctrine, not fearing to introduce Sets of Perdition; and how GOD's Anger suffers them not at length to go unpunished. Add to this these Words of Mr de Tillemont (25): 'Peuardentius quotes out of St Jerom, against the Luciferians, that the Bath fell in effect, and crushed Cerintbus to death. I have read this whole Treatise on purpose, without finding any such thing in it. I have a Catalogue of Heretics, composed in the Form of a Catechism, by a German Minister (26): and here is the Answer which I find in it to this Question: 'Quomodo perit (Cerinthus)? Ruina balnei oppressus: Cum enim Johannes Evangelista, cum discipulis suis, Ephesi, lavandi causa, in balneum venisset, ac vidisset intus esse Cerinthum, resiliit inde statim, ac dixit: Discedamus cito, ne ruina balnei opprimamur, cum intus sit Cerintbus, hostis veritatis. Id quod etiam, discedente eo, factum est. Ut exprimitur in versibus Strigelii:

Impia Cerintbus sancto convitia Christo
Dum facit, & stulta garrulitate furit:
Concidit & rapido blasphemum contudit ictu.
Collapse subito facta ruina domus.

— How did Cerintbus perish? He was crushed by the Fall of a Bath. For St John the Evangelist, coming into a Bath, at Ephesus, with his Disciples, and seeing Cerintbus within, immediately started back, and said, Let us depart quickly, lest we be crushed by the Fall of the Bath, since Cerintbus, That Enemy of the Truth, is within. Which happened after his Departure, as is expressed in the Verses of Strigelius,

Whilst uttering Scoffs against the Son of GOD,
Cerintbus died by Heaven's avenging Rod.
With sudden Ruin on his impious Head,
The falling Bath crush'd the Blasphemer dead.

Micraëlius was not more exact in consulting Originals, though he cites them; See the Margin (27). Mr Ittigius seems to believe, that Prateolus is the first, who added what concerns the Fall of the House, where Cerintbus was bathing, to the Narrative of Irenæus (28). It is certain, that This Flourish is more ancient, than Prateolus.

CERISANTES, a Gentleman of much Wit and Courage, in the XVIIth Century. You will find his Article in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary; but suffer not yourself to be seduced by the Falsities, which may have crept into it, and mind the Observations which I set down. They are taken from a Manuscript Apology, which Mr de Ste. Helene (a) sent me from London, two or three Months before his Death. He composed it for his Brother, Mr de Cerisantes, some time after the Duke of Guise's Memoirs were published. Mr de Cerisantes is much abused in those Memoirs; but the Author of the Apology maintains, that they are Slanders destitute of Truth. He does not believe, that the Duke of Guise is the Author of That Work, and suspects Mr de Saincton (b) to have forged it, or to have set it off with what is fabulous in it, either through an extream Zeal for his Master, or — to make the Piece more pleasing (c), and more deserving to be well paid for by the Bookseller. First he confutes some Expressions of Contempt, which are used in it, and the Reproach of meanness of Birth [A]. He owns the Quarrel

(a) He left France in the time of the last Persecutions, and fled into England. He died in London, the 20th of January, 1697.

(c) Manuscript Apology, pag. 3.

[A] He is very much abused in the Memoirs of the Duke of Guise. His Brother, who composed an Apology — refutes certain Expressions of Contempt (1), and the Reproach of Meanness of Birth. He says, those Expressions will appear most ridiculous, when it shall be known that Cardinal de Richelieu had such a good Opinion of Cerisantes, as to send him to Constantinople, in the Year 1641, to treat about some important Business there, and that, in 1644, the Chancellor Oxenfern, and the other Regents of Sweden, during the Minority of Queen Christina, judged him worthy to be admitted into the Number of the Counsellors of State of that Kingdom, and to be afterwards sent Resident to the Court of France. — This appears by the Instructions of the Sieur de Cerisantes, by a Letter which the said Chancellor wrote to him at Paris, and by another which the Sieur Chanut, at that time Resident of France in Sweden, wrote to the Sieur Guesnier at Rome, which Pieces are in the Hands of the Sieur de Sainte Helene, as also the rest which shall be spoken of hereafter (2). Note, that the Queen of Sweden had first given Cerisantes a Regiment in the Army of Germany, but, being already gone two Days Journey from Stockholm, to take Possession of it, a Courier, who was sent after him, obliged him to return back again; the Regents of the Crown of Sweden having thought it more proper to send him Resident to France (3). Note also, that he had been Lieutenant of the first Company of the Regiment of Navarre — and he performed such fine Actions in the several Posts he had in that Regiment, and shewed so much Vigour, Capacity, and Courage, in several Battles, that the Prince, then Duke of Enguien, and the Marshals de Chatillon, de la Meilleraye, and de Gassion, praised him so much publicly, and in the Presence of all the Officers, that it might have inspired Vanity into the most modest Persons (4). The Author of the Memoirs of the Duke of Guise is told, that, in allowing Mr de Cerisantes but little Merit and Experience, he is fallen into a Contradiction, acknowledging in the same One hundred and seventy seventh Page, that he had Wit and Eloquence; in the following Page, that he was a Man of Courage, and that but few Persons in this Age equalled him in Latin Poetry; in the One hundred and ninety fifth Page, that he made a Lodgment within ten Paces of a Post, where the Enemy had Five hundred Men, wherein he behaved himself as bravely as he had done in the Attack; and rel of Cerisantes with the Duke of Candale; but he maintains, that the Circumstances and Consequences of it are falsely related [B]. He does not deny, but that his Brother was a little too haughty, and that perhaps he carried his Ambition somewhat too far (d); but, adds he, if such a Fault may be excused in any body, it might be tolerated in him — who was a handsome Man, witty, learned, extremely brave, of great Capacity for War, and who, in short, possessed, in a Degree much above the common, the Talents, which may recommend a Man in the World, either in Peace or War. It is denied, that he was dismissed by the Queen of Sweden, and his leaving the Court and that he put it into so good a posture of Defence, that it was always preserved afterwards. In the Two hundred and fifty fourth Page, that the Duke of Guise, having engaged in a Battle only to draw Ja-como Rousse out of a great Danger, and seeing him safe, aimed only at his Retreat, the care whereof he gave to the Sieur de Cerisantes, who came to him (says the Author of the Memoirs) very fortunately; which he performed, and re-joined the Duke of Guise, after a light Skirmish, without the Loss of any of his Men. To all this it is added, that the Command of a Body of Four thousand Calabrians, which the Duke gave him, was yet an uncontrollable Proof of the good Opinion he had of his Experience in Feats of Arms. The Three hundred seventy fifth Page testifies this, as also the Count de Modene's Memoirs, Tom. iii. pag. 51, and the Commission which the Duke of Guise gave the Sieur de Cerisantes for that Employ. The Conclusion is, that the Reasons, alleged by the Author of the Memoirs, for the Refusal, which he says the Duke of Guise gave the Sieur de Cerisantes, of the Office of Colonel-General, are weak, since he granted him another afterwards, much more considerable as to the Functions, though not as to the Dignity (5).

As to the Meanness of his Birth, it is observed, that the Author of the Memoirs says falsely, that Mr de Cerisantes's Father was a Minister (6); and the Consequence, which he draws from it, is confuted. It is maintained against him, that this would not prove, that Cerisantes was an ignoble Person; and then the Apologist goes on thus: 'His Father, whose Name was Mark Duncan, was a famous and celebrated Doctor of Physic, a Scotchman by Nation, and a Gentleman by Birth. Being gone to travel into France in his Youth, he settled at Saumur in Anjou, where he married a Gentlewoman of a good Family. He had not lived there long, before he acquired so great a Reputation in his Art, that King James I., of Great Britain, desired him to serve near his Person, in the Quality of his Physician in Ordinary; and, for that purpose, he sent him a Patent for it, that he might be sure of the Place, which was proposed to him, before he crossed the Sea: but, his Wife being very unwilling to leave her Country, Relations, and Acquaintance, he suffered himself to be conquered by the Tears of a Woman, whom he loved passionately; he would not accept an Employ so honourable, and so profitable to his Family, and continued all the Remainder of his Life in the City of Saumur, where he died in the Year 1640, lamented by every body, as well Catholics as Protestants, of what Quality soever they were. He was admirably well versed in Philosophy, Divinity, and the Mathematics, besides Physic, which he exercised with much Honour. What is more to be esteemed is, that he was a Man of great Probity, and of an exemplary Life (7).' Add to this what I shall say in the last Remark.

[B] He acknowledges the Quarrel — — — with the Duke of Candale, but he maintains, that the Consequences of it are falsely reported.] See here the Words of the Apology; they clear up a Matter which many Readers will think curious. The Sieur de Cerisantes had a Quarrel with the Duke of Candale, and challenged him; but the Duke of Guise, if he was the Author of the Memoirs, would have less reason, than any body whatever, to reproach him with it, since it was to maintain the Interests of the fair Mademoiselle de Pons, his Mistress, who was then one of the Queen-Regent's Maids of Honour, whom the Duke of Candale had affronted in a full Ring, as she fate at the Boot of a Coach with the Sieur de Cerisantes. Moreover, I confess ingenuously, that, being at that time Resident of the Crown of Sweden, the strictest Rules of Prudence did not permit him to carry his Resentment so far: but where are those generous Men, who can follow such an austere Virtue, when they are attacked in their Honour? Without doubt, the ill Usage, which That fair Lady had publicly received, reflected in such a manner on the Person, who had then her Conversation, that he could hardly dispense with himself from undertaking the Reparation of it. His Brother, the Sieur de Ste Helene, having freely told him some Months after, on that Subject, that, in his Opinion, he had offended against his Character by such a Proceeding, and in some manner renounced the Privileges, which the Law of Nations gave him, as a public Person: You are in the right, Brother, said he to him; but you must know, that the Ladies of the Court have ever been the Dispensers of Reputation. Had I suffered a Lady to have received an Affront in my Company, I had lost my Honour for ever with the Fair Sex, before whom I had no more dared to appear. But I absolutely deny, that That Quarrel preceded his Residence, and obliged him to leave Paris. Many Persons of the Court, at that time, may remember very well, that, when he sent a Challenge to the Duke of Candale, he had already exercised his Ministry above a Year, and that he continued in it nine or ten Months after, notwithstanding the Solicitations, which his Royal Highness, the late Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Espernon, and Mr de Mets, at that time Abbot of St Germain des Prez, and at present Duke of Vernueil, employed with her Swedish Majesty, to have him re-called. For that purpose, they set all Engines at work, and attacked him on account of his Birth (either out of meer Malice, or by the same Argument, which the Author of the Memoirs makes use of, that, being the Son of a Man of Letters, it was probable he was no Gentleman); but it was in vain; for the Sieur de Cerisantes, having had notice from Mr de Lyonne of all that was contriving against him, sent with all speed a Copy of the Proofs of his Nobility into Sweden, which were collated by a Secretary of State, wherewith the Queen his Mistress seemed to be wholly satisfied, insomuch that she made a Jest of all the Letters, which were sent to her, to the Prejudice of her Resident, whom she not only continued in his Function at the Court of France, as I have said already, but whose Proceedings with the Duke of Candale she likewise approved (8).

[C] It is denied that he was dismissed by the Queen of Sweden.] It is another Falshity, to say, that the Queen of Sweden dismissed the Sieur de Cerisantes; since it may be made appear, by a Letter, which he wrote from Stockholm to his Brother, the Sieur de Ste Helene, dated the Twenty eighth of April 1646, and which he has by him, that he dismissed himself, and that he left the Court of France without the Knowledge of the Queen his Mistress. I do not pretend to defend, or excuse, his departing without Order, being most certain, that he might justly have been tried for it. The Sieur de Cerisantes was not ignorant of the dangerous Consequence of it; but, being very well informed, that some powerful Friends of the Sieur Grotius designed to undermine his Fortune, out of hatred, because the Sieur de Cerisantes, as they thought, had supplanted him, he ventured all, and undertook his Journey,

Court of France is disapproved. It is insinuated (e) that he left the Service of Sweden, to execute his Resolution of changing his Religion: he accordingly forsook the Protestant Religion, and turned a Roman Catholic. He was sent to Naples to be the King's Agent there, and to observe the Proceedings of the Duke of Guise, who was suspected at the Court of France (f). It is denied, that he assumed the Quality of Ambassador there [D], and that the Reasons and the Circumstances of his Detention have been faithfully related [E]. Complaints are made of some Misrepresentations of the Truth concerning his Death [F]; and That which concerns his last Will is rejected

as

Journey, to encourage his Party by his Presence, and to defend a Post, which his Enemies attacked with so much Fury, or to bury himself in the Ruins of it. It is also very evident by the Discharge, which the Sieur de Cerisantes obtained of the said Queen his Mistress, that she was very well satisfied with his Care and Negotiations, and that she desired to retain him in her Service; for it is said, in express terms, in the Discharge, that he desired it himself, to try his Fortune another way; and that all the while he had had the Management of the Interests of her Crown, he had acquitted himself of it with all Diligence, Faithfulness, and Industry. The Sieur Chanus's Letter, already twice mentioned, proves the same thing, saying, that the Queen had assured him with her own Mouth, that, to keep the said Sieur de Cerisantes in her Service, she had offered him a Regiment, or a good Pension, which he pleaded (9).

(9) Ibid. pag. 15, &c.

[D] It is denied, that he took the Quality of Ambassador at Naples. All the Frenchmen, who were at that time at Naples, can testify, that he only made himself known in Quality of the King's Agent; which the very Memoirs in question grant him in the One hundred and sixteenth Page, as also those of the Count de Madene, in the second Tome, pag. 237. As such, then, he had a Right to cause the Council to be assembled, and to make such Proposals, as he should think proper, having particular Orders for it, and general Orders to observe the Duke of Guise's Actions, and to give Advice of his Departments, seeing, even when he was at Rome, his Intentions began to be much suspected by the Ministers of France (10). The Author of the Memoirs says, That Cerisantes would place himself on the Duke of Guise's Left-hand at Mass, and at public Ceremonies, and that the Duke would not suffer it, and abused him. The Apologist answers (11), that he never heard any thing about That Dispute, and that Cerisantes was so brave, and so nice on the Point of Honour, that, since he did not shew his Resentment by some desperate Action, or by leaving Naples, it ought to be believed, that the Duke of Guise did not give him That abusive Language, which is spoken of in the Memoirs. The whole Two hundred and fifth Page, adds he (12), is full of injurious and outrageous Words, which deserve no Answer, because one may easily know, that Passion only dictated them, and that the Sieur de Cerisantes's original Sin is, his having been altogether in the Interests of the Marquis de Fontenai Mareuil, at that time Ambassador of France at Rome, and too clear-sighted to suffer himself to be surprised by the Duke's Artifices. Nevertheless, I shall not forbear to say, that the Calumnies of a very passionate Prince cannot be put in the Scale with the Approbation of the Cardinals Richelieu, Mazarin, and St. Cecil, and of Chancellor Oxenstern, and the other Regents of Sweden, and the Bishop of Angers, the Marquis de Fontenai, the Sieurs de Lyonne and Chanus, and of many other Persons of Quality and Merit, who honoured the Sieur de Cerisantes with their Esteem, so far were they from taking him for a whimsical and extravagant Fool.

(13) The Author of the Apology says, pag. 19, that he made a Journey to Paris, on purpose to be informed by the Valet de Chambre of the deceased, newly returned from Naples, of all that happened to the Sieur de Cerisantes his Master, since his Departure from Sweden, as well as at the Courts of the King of Poland, of the Great Duke of Moscow, and of the Emperor, as particularly at Rome and at Naples. He adds, pag. 26, that the same Valet de Chambre was a very good Man, and known to be so brave by the Duke of Guise himself, that he made him a Cornet, after the Death of Cerisantes.

[E] --- and that the Reason and the Circumstances of his Detention are faithfully related. Here is the History, as I have it from his Valet de Chambre (13). The Duke, suspecting that the Sieur de Cerisantes did him some ill Offices at the Court of France, and with the Marquis de Fontenai at Rome, went one day, very well accompanied, to his Lodgings, and being come into his Chamber, would oblige him, partly by fair Words, and partly by Threatnings, to give him his Cyphers, to clear his Suspicions of some Letters that he had intercepted; which the Sieur de Cerisantes plainly refused him, saying, that he was not to give him an Account of his Actions, and protesting that he would never part with them but by force. Upon this they came to high Words on both sides; and the Duke, heating himself beyond Measure, caused his Guards to arrest him, with Orders to watch and observe him in such a manner, that he should have no Communication with any body. A few Days after, the Duke's Passion being over, he withdrew his Guards; and, after having made his Excuses to the Sieur de Cerisantes for his rigorous Proceedings, and having imputed the Cause of it to some malicious and ill-minded Persons, who had imbibed him against him, he flattered him in such a manner (being a great Master of the Art of gaining the Good-will of People, and of captivating them, when he designed it) that they lived afterwards in good understanding, or at least seemed to do so (14).

[F] Complaint is made of some Misrepresentations --- of the Death of Cerisantes. The Duke conceals the Truth very much here (15), as well as in divers other places of the Memoirs; for I have it from good Hands, that the Sieur de Cerisantes, having already caused his Baggage to be packed up, in order to repass to Rome, whither he was called to be Chamberlain to Pope Innocent X (16), the Duke earnestly desired him to defer his Departure till after the general Attack, which he designed to make on all the Enemies Posts at the same time; which the Sieur de Cerisantes willingly granted, being glad to meet with such a favourable Occasion to acquire Honour. In effect, he signalized his Valour extremely in the Attack on the side of the Gate of Cbiaie, by the Report of divers Persons, who were Eye-witnesses of it; which may also be confirmed by a Paris Gazette of the Twenty second of April 1648, the Extract whereof is contained in a Letter, which the Sieur Rauffin, Secretary of the Sieur de Cerisantes, wrote, to Saumur, to the Sieur de Ste Helene, the eighteenth of May 1648, from Paris, where the said Sieur de Cerisantes had left him on some Affairs, which was afterwards confirmed to him by the Valet de Chambre of whom I have spoken before. --- Although Historians are answerable for the Truth of what they write, and though their Mistakes admit of no Excuses, I do not pretend to take much Advantage of the Falstity, which is to be found in the Memoirs, concerning the time of the Sieur de Cerisantes's Death, because it bears no great Strefs, and may pass for a very innocent Error. I shall only say, that the Posts were attacked the twelfth of February 1648, as the Memoirs say; and, that he died three days after; which is evidently false, since his Will is of the Twenty seventh of the same Month; and he died the next day, or the day after, that is to say, the Twenty eighth or the Twenty ninth, with which the Gazette, which I have mentioned, does also agree. Those, who have heard of the Funeral Honours, which were done to the Body of the deceased, of the great Number of People who accompanied it, and of the Grief of all the Officers and Soldiers of the Calabrian Troops, of the French Gentlemen, and of the People, will draw an infallible Consequence from it of This Gentleman's Merit (17). This last Fact seems to be alleged as a Reproach of a Sin of Omifion: it is true, that the Complaints are not made precisely as in the Words of the Thirty first Page viz. The Memoirs of the Duke of Guise do not as fabulous [G]. Of all the Slanders, which have been published against him, this is, perhaps, the most proper to expose him to the Laughter of all Readers; but at the same time, there is none which can be better refuted: for all those, who relate this Story, may be convicted of Falstity by an Act of a Notary, that is by producing Cerisantes's Will. The Apologist does not fail to give us notice (g), that this is sufficient to discredit all the other Slanders; for, whosoever ventures to publish Falstities, disproved by the Acts of a Notary, deserves no Credit. Nevertheless, the Narrations concerning Cerisantes, in the Memoirs of the Duke of Guise, have made great Impression on the Readers. They have passed into other Books. Du Maurier has adopted them: The Continuator of Moreri has copied du Maurier, and it appears by the Book intituled Menagiana, that they served the Wits, who met at Mr Menage's House, for Conversation [H]. Thus we see how Fortune exercises her capricious Tyranny on the Memory and Reputation of Men: and how dangerous is it to fall into the Hands of an Historian who has a Mind to divert his Reader, and who knows how to please him? I shall communicate to the Public the Particulars, which a Friend of the Apologist of Cerisantes was pleased to impart to me [I].

‘ say, that the Sieur de Cerisantes was so much beloved by the People of Naples, that they gave him a fine Country House some Miles from the City, where his Servants lived some time after his Death.’

[G] What concerns his last Will is rejected as fabulous. The Author of the Memoirs, to crown the Work, finishes his Calumnies with the most egregious Falstity, that ever any Man uttered, saying, that the Sieur de Cerisantes, to carry his Vanity as far as he could, made choice of the Duke for the Executor of his Will; to which he adds, that he left above five and twenty thousand Crowns in Foundations, Donations, or pious Legacies, though he was not worth twenty Sous (they are the express Words of the Memoirs). This may easily be proved to be false by a Copy of the Will itself, delivered by the Notary, who drew it up, which is in the Possession of the Sieur de Ste. Helene. That Will shews, that Signior Carlo Carola is named Executor of it, and that the Legacies, Donations, and Foundations, amount only to the Sum of five hundred and fifty Ducats. He ordered besides, that the Price of eighty Pipes of Wine, which belonged to the said Deceased, should be employed by the said Executor in adorning St Anne's Chapel in the Church of the Carmelites of Naples, where he would have his Body buried, and in having an Epitaph made for him; which falls very short of twenty five thousand Crowns (18).

[H] It appears by the Book, intituled Menagiana, that the preceding Narrations served the Wits at Mr Menage's House for Conversation. The Apologist informs us (19), that he would not have taken his Manuscript from the bottom of the Chest, where he had confined it, if no One, but the Writer of the Memoirs of the Duke of Guise, had slandered Cerisantes. His first Design was to publish the Apology; but he altered it, upon his Friends representing to him, I. That Those Memoirs, being looked upon as a Romance though very well written, and very diverting, yet were much discredited as to most of the Adventures, which are contained in them. II. That his Brother's Reputation was too well established to need any Defence. But, when he found that other Authors adopted the Facts, mentioned in those Memoirs, and added other things to them, he thought he ought to be no longer silent. Here is another piece of his Manuscript. ‘ In the Book intituled Menagiana, they make Menage say (20), that Mr de Cerisantes, being turned out of the Employ of Resident of Sweden in France, resolved to become a Turk, in hopes to be made Grand Vizier in less than two Years, and thereby to find means to revenge himself of the Swedes. All this is false and ridiculous. The Sieur de Cerisantes was sent to Constantinople, in 1641, by Cardinal Richelieu, and he was not Resident of Sweden till the Year 1644, as I have said before in the fifth Page of this Manuscript. He says afterwards, that the Sieur de Cerisantes died in the Service of the Duke of Guise: this is false again. He was the King of France's Agent, and not in the Duke's Service. He adds, that, by his Will, he left his Lands and his Jewels to his eldest Brother, and his Money and Moveables to another Relation, and two hundred thousand Livres in pious Legacies; and, that he had the Impudence to make the Duke of Guise the Executor of his Will. It appears by the Sieur de Cerisantes's Will, that he left but five hundred and fifty Ducats in pious Legacies, and that he ordered that the Value of eighty Pipes of Wine, which the City of Naples had presented him with, should be applied to the Ornaments of a Chapel in the Church of the Carmelites, where he would be buried, and to provide an Epitaph for him. When the Sieur de Cerisantes died, he had but one younger Brother, whose Name was Sainte Helene. The Duke was not the Executor of his Will, but one whose Name was Carlo Carola (21).

[I] I shall communicate the Particulars, which a Friend of the Apologist of Cerisantes was pleased to impart to me. Here is an Extract of his Letter: ‘ Duncan settled at Saumur, where he practised Physic with great Reputation. He was at first Professor in Philosophy, and published an Abridgement of Logic (22). He left that Employ, and was made Principal of the College. He had three Sons, Cerisantes, Sainte Helene, and Montfort, and three Daughters. He wrote a Book concerning the pretended Possession of the Nuns of Loudun (23); for which Laubardemont would have brought him into great Trouble, had it not been for the Credit of the Marshall de Brezé's Lady, whose Physician he was, and who had a great Affection for him. He had a Servant, whose Son, aged twelve or thirteen Years, spit his Tongue out in coughing, and carried it to his Father saying, Here is my Tongue, that I have just now spit out. The Boy spoke as well after that Accident (which proceeded, without doubt, from the Small-Pox, which had eat the Root of his Tongue) as he did before, except that he could not well pronounce the Letter r. He was carried up and down all over Europe, and lived a long time. A Surgeon of Saumur having composed a Treatise upon it, whereof Mr Duncan gave him the Title, viz. Aglossomatographia, another Physician of Saumur (24), who did not love Mr Duncan, caused a Dissertation to be printed, to prove that it ought to be said Aglossomatographia, and prefixed to it these Verses:

Lecteur tu t'esmerveilleras
Qu'un garçon qui n'a point de langue
Prononce bien une harangue;
Mais bien plus tu t'estonneras
Qu'un barbier qui ne sçait pas lire
Le Grec, se melle d'en écrire.
Que si ce plaisant épigramme,
Doux fruit d'un penser de mon ame,
Te semble n'aller pas tant mal,
C'est que je l'ai fait à cheval.

No doubt, Reader, but you will wonder,
That a young Boy, without a Tongue,
Can so well pronounce a Harangue;
But you will be yet more surprized,

Some malicious Persons altered the last Verse in all the Copies they could find, and put it C'est que je l'ai fait en cheval: — 'Tis because I made it like a Horse. There is yet another thing, which I think somewhat singular, namely, that Mr Duncan, his three Sons, and Mr de Sainte Helene's only Son, the five Persons, who made the whole Male Line of That Branch, are all dead, and buried in five different Kingdoms; Mr Duncan in France, Cerisantes at Naples, Montford at Stockholm, Sainte Helene in London, and his Son in Ireland.

I am very glad to find an Occasion here to speak of Mr Duncan, who practises Physic at Bern with much Glory, and for whom I have always had a great Love and Esteem, since we studied Philosophy together in the Year 1668. He is descended from a famous Professor of Philosophy (25), who was of the same Family with the Physician of Saumur. He was born at Montauban, where he practised Physic with great Reputation, when the desire of living according to the Dictates of his Conscience obliged him to retire to Berne, sometime after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Books, which he has published, are excellent, and have done him great Honour. He is Author of the New and Mechanical Explication of animal Actions, printed at Paris in the Year 1678: The Natural Chymistry, or a Chymical and Mechanical Explication of the Nourishment of an Animal, in three Parts, printed at Paris, the first in the Year 1681, and the other two in the Year 1687: The History of the Animal, or the Knowledge of the animated Body by Mechanics and Chymistry, printed at Paris in 1687. The Journalists have spoken of them with praise (26) [* §].

CESALPINUS, or CÆSALPINUS (ANDREW), was a very learned Man both in Philosophy and Physic. He was of Arezzo, and a Professor a long time at Pisa; after which he became chief Physician to Pope Clement VIII. He died at Rome the Twenty third of February 1603 (a), at the Age of Eighty four Years (b). He departed from the common Road of the Peripatetics in several things [A]; and, to speak right, he was a very bad Christian with respect to Opinions. It is said, he believed, that the first Men were formed in the same manner, as several Philosophers imagine, that Frogs are engendered [B]. We shall examine

[A] He left the common Road of the Peripatetics in several things. Do not imagine, that he invented different Principles from those of Aristotle; for, on the contrary, he ought to pass for an Innovator, only because he addicted himself to Aristotle's true Opinions. He penetrated into the bottom of the Peripatetic System, and maintained it according to the true sense of the Founder, and not as the Schoolmen did, who, under the profession of Aristotle's Disciple, taught nothing less than his Tenets. The work is, that Cæsalpinus applied himself chiefly to clear the Obscurity of That System in the Articles most opposite to Religion. After the manner, in which he unfolds his Master's Doctrine concerning the first Mover, he not only overthrows Providence, but also the true Distinction between the Creator and the Creature: and yet his Book (1) has not been censured by the Inquisition. He had the Address to declare, at the end of his Preface, that, if Aristotle does not agree with the Scripture in some things, he leaves him, and acknowledges, that there are some Paralogisms in his Arguments, but that he leaves it to be examined by those, who profess a higher Theology (2). The Maxim of the Civilians, Protestatio facto contraria non valet, might be alledged against him. Dr Samuel Parker has very well unfolded Cæsalpinus's Opinions and Artifices; he says, that he is the first, and almost the last, of the Moderns, who comprehended Aristotle's Opinion, Quem quid velit recentiorum hic primus & pene postremus copiose videt (3). What we shall say in the Remark [B] will confirm what I have mentioned elsewhere (4) concerning Spinoza's Conformity with Aristotle.

derite, who thought that Men were originally produced from Water and Mud; not very different, in this, from the Opinion of Epicurus, who believed, that Mud growing warm, certain Wombs grew from the Roots of the Earth, and afforded, by the Ministration of Nature, the pure Moisture of Milk to the Infants produced from them: and that these Infants, thus brought up, and becoming Men, begat the rest of Mankind. Anaxagoras and Archelaus (6), two other great Philosophers, might have been joined with Democritus and Epicurus: It would have served to make a few of greater Reading, but not have discovered greater Exactness. Good Saldenus had not well consulted the Originals; and, in all appearance, he saw what concerns Cæsalpinus at a great distance from the Original. I have searched in That Philosopher's Writings, for what might have given occasion to impute this Opinion to him; and I have discovered a great Mistake: I have found, that, by reasoning on Aristotle's Principles, he lays down, that whatever is made out of Seed, may be produced without Seed, quæcumque ex semine fiunt, eadem fieri posse sine semine. It is the Title of the first Question of the fifth Book. But, at first, he declares, that he does not believe, that the Soul of Man, nor That of Beasts, can have corrupt Matter for their Principle. A little after, he makes a Distinction between the first Production of Animals, and of other Beings, and their Succession. He supposes, that the first Production proceeded from the first Cause, at the Beginning, and that, afterwards, the several Kinds preserved themselves by successive Generations, and that the Production of the Individuals, whether it comes from Seed or from corrupt Matter, belongs to That successive Preservation of the Species, and not to their first Formation; so that, if he has sometimes said, that perfect Animals were engendered by a Worm at the Beginning, it must not be understood, of a first Production, properly so called; it is but the renewing of the Individuals, it being possible, in the course of an infinite time, that all the Individuals of one Species may die; in which case no new ones can proceed from an univocal Generation, and therefore a new Beginning must be sought for in some corrupted Matter. This seems to me to be the true sense of the Latin Words, which I am going to set down. Præterea cum alia sit prima omnium animalium & cæterorum entium creatio, quæ à primo ente in principio effluit: alia eorumdem successio: dignus ortum ex putredine similem esse ei, qui fit ex semine, ad successionem scilicet institutum, non ad primam specierum dependentiam atque productionem:

examine whether That Opinion ought to have been imputed to him. His Principles differed but little from those of Spinoza [C]. Below, you may see the Titles of his Works [D]. A modern Author reckons him among the greatest Genius's that ever were seen (c).

We should deprive Cesalpinus of a very valuable Honour, if we did not say, That he knew the Circulation of the Blood [E]: The Proofs of it are so plain, that they cannot be eluded by any Cavils.

nem: Nisi enim hæc præcessisset, nequicquam neque ex femine neque ex putredine ortum esset.
Quod si aliquando meminerim primam perfectiorum animalium generationem ex verme fieri, sic intelligimus primam, quia in tempore infinito, quod supponitur à Peripateticis, deficientibus in ali-quo tempore omnibus singularibus alicujus speciei, primum aliquod ex putredine oriri potest, ex cujus femine propagetur species, ut quibusdam contingit ex putredine tantum propagari (7). Observe, that Cesalpinus, not supposing, that ever all Mankind perished, cannot be charged with pretending, that the first Men were engendered out of corrupt Matter.
He will have it, that, according to Aristotle's Hypothesis, all Species are eternal (8), and that their Eternity is a sufficient Cause to restore the Individuals, if there happen an Interruption in the common Generations;
I say if This Interruption should happen by the Death of all the Individuals. 'Non est timendum
'ne aliqua species unquam deficiat, quamvis omnia
'singularia contingat aliquando corrupta esse: reman-
'ent enim in agente æternæ virtus æternæ omnium
'specierum (9). — It is not to be feared, that any 'Species will ever fail, though it should happen, that 'all the Individuals should some time or other be de'stroyed; for the Eternal Virtue of all Species re'mains in the Eternal Agent. I own, he gives us to understand, that this Interruption might be possible in human kind (10); but it is not what Saldenus imputes to him. I shall observe, that it was the current Opinion of Antiquity, that all the Species of Animals might be renewed without the Assistance of Male and Female. Ovid, who only mentions the common Tradition of the Greeks, supposes, that, after the Deluge, Stones were the Matter, out of which new Men were formed, and that the Heat and Moisture of the Earth produced the other Animals, and even formed new Species unknown to the first World (11).

Cætera diversis tellus animalia formis
Sponte sua peperit; postquam vetus humor ab igne
Percoluit solis, cœnumque udaeque paludes
Intumueræ æstu, fecundæque semina rerum
Vivaci nutrita solo, ceu matris in alvo,
Creverunt, faciemque aliquam cepere morando (12).

Ergo ubi diluvio tellus lutulenta recenti
Solibus æthereis altoque recanduit æstu;
Edidit innumeras species, partimque figuras Reddidit antiquas, partim nova monstra crea-vit (13).

The rest of Animals, from teeming Earth
Produced, in various Forms receiv'd their Birth.
The Native Moisture, in it's close Retreat,
Digested by the Sun's ætherial Heat,
As in a kindly Womb, began to breed;
Then swell'd, and quicken'd by the vital Seed.
And some in left, and some in longer Space,
Were ripen'd into Form, and took a several Face.

From hence the Surface of the Ground, with Mud
And Slime besear'd (the Faces of the Flood) Receiv'd the Rays of Heav'n, and sucking in
The Seeds of Heat, new Creatures did begin:
Some were of several Sorts produc'd before,
But of new Monsters Earth created more.

DRYDEN.

A Commentator says, upon this, that Avicenna believed, that human Seeds, re-animated by the Sun in the Carcasses of those, who perished in the time of the Flood, produced new Men. 'Sed quis fe-

'rat Avicennam? qui, lib. de Diluviis, asserit ex reli-
'quo cadaverum humanorum feminio, à sole anima-
'to, homines post immensas terrarum inundationes
'natos (14).'

I must observe another thing, for the better understanding of the Doctrine of Cesalpinus, grounded on Aristotle's Principles, as he pretends. He will have it, that this Maxim Man and the Sun engender Man (15), doth not signify, that the Concurrence of the Sun is necessary for the Production of Man;
but that the Sun, without the Assistance of Man; is a sufficient Cause of the Production of Man. He pretends, that the Matter of all sublunary Beings, is but a passive Power, which acquires all it's Actuality by the Motion of the Heavens (16). He ascribes the first Formation of Beings to the intelligent Motive Faculty of the Heavens, as to the Principal Cause, and to the Heavens as to the Instrumental Cause (17). All this would easily agree with the Doctrine, which the Sect of the Literati has embraced in China, that 'there is no other first 'Principle but the material Heaven, or it's most
'subtile Parts, which are it's efficient Virtue.
See what Father Aleoneffa (18) represented to the Pope.

[C] His Principles differed but little from Those of Spinoza.] He admitted, with Aristotle, some Intelligent Motive Beings in the celestial Spheres;
but he reduced them all to one Substance: he admitted also Angels, or Demons; but he said, they were only Particles of God, united to a very subtile Matter: nay, he pretended, that the Souls of Men, and of Beasts, were part of the Substance of God:
So that, if he acknowledged many Demons, and many Souls, it was only in relation to Matter; for, exclusive of Matter, he did not admit the Plural Number. So that, according to his Principles, there is but one Soul, but one human Intelligence, which multiplies proportionably as Men multiply (19). The Unity, which the Scotists acknowledge in the Genus's and in the Species, is, in the main, the same Chimera with That of Cesalpinus (20), and there wanted but a little Method to form Spinoza's System out of it. For the rest, if Cesalpinus had been a downright Spinozist, and had nevertheless admitted of such Demons, as are commonly admitted, I should not wonder at it. It seems to me, that there is no System, built only on the Light of Reason, which can less dispense itself from acknowledging what is said of good and bad Angels, among the People, than the System of Spinoza. I shall, perhaps, write a Dissertation, some time or other, upon it, wherein I shall shew, that, by arguing consequentially, the Spinozists ought to be more inclined to acknowledge Punishments and Rewards after this Life, than to deny them.

ejusdem ventriculorum optime respondent ea quæ ex dissectione apparent. Nam duo sunt vasa in dextrum ventriculum definentia, duo etiam in sinistrum: Duorum autem unum intronit tantum, alterum educit, membranis eo ingenio constitutis (23). — The Lungs therefore drawing the warm Blood from the right Ventricle of the Heart, thro' a Vein, like an Artery, and returning it, by Anastomosis, to the venal Artery, which tends towards the left Ventricle of the Heart, cool Air being in the mean time transmitted through the Channels of the Alveolar Arteries, which are extended near the venal Artery, yet not communicating with the Arteries, as Galen thought, tempers with a touch only. With this Circulation of the Blood, from the right Ventricle of the Heart through the Lungs into the left Ventricle of the same, exactly agrees what appears from Dissection. For there are two Receptacles ending in the right Ventricle, and two in the left. But of the two one only intronits, the other lets out; the Membranes being constituted accordingly. What he says elsewhere (24), and which I content myself to point at, is not less exprest.

CESAR, or CÆSAR, (CAIUS JULIUS) the first Emperor of Rome, had all the Qualities necessary for a great Conqueror; and it would be wrong to believe, that there was more good Luck, than Conduct, in his Fortune. He did not gain Battles, only to employ the Couriers, who carried the News of them; but he knew how to improve his Victories; which distinguishes him from so many warlike Princes, who know how to conquer, but not to make use of their Victory [A]. I believe he found some Dispositions in Rome, which facilitated the Execution of his

[A] His Conduct — distinguished him from Princes, who know how to conquer, but not how to make use of their Victory.] They may comfort themselves for This Defect, since one of the greatest Captains in the World (1) was subject to it, and much to his Cost. They may find also Matter of Consolation in their great Number: for few Victories, as to the Consequences, are like That, which Gustavus obtained near Leipzig. We meet with some of them, from time to time, and at distant Intervals, in reading the History of all Ages, and Nations. We must also except the Wars of the first Successors of Mahomet, Those of a Tamerlane, a Gengis-Can, and such other Founders of great Empires, who appear three or four times in the Space of a thousand Years, more or less. Except Those, All Battles are almost incapable, by their Consequences, of deciding the Disputes of Gazetteers. Each Party attributes, either the whole Victory, or the Reality of it, to itself. When they cannot deny the Loss of the Field of Battle, they maintain, that they lost but few Men, and that the Number of the Enemies killed and wounded cannot be exprest. The Party, which put the Enemy to Flight, are not satisfied with the Advantage they are allowed to boast of: They sing Te Deum; they make a great Noise of their Victory; they make Bonfires; but, notwithstanding, the Enemy pretends, that there is nothing in it but a vain Shew, and that the so much cryed up Victory has no real and solid Advantage; they are positive, that the Victorious have more reason to sing De Profundis than Te Deum, and that, if they should obtain such another Victory, at the same Price, they would be undone. This does not please those, who remain Masters of the Field of Battle; they pretend, that they have the Advantage in all respects. The right way to end these Disputes of the News-Writers, would be to act like Conquerors, after the Battle. If those, who, disclaiming the Name, attribute the thing to themselves, did speedily carry Fire and Sword into the Enemy's Country, the Cause would soon be decided in their Favour: but it would be decided to their Shame, if those, who pretend to the Name and the Thing, should overflow the Enemy's Country like a Torrent, and take strong Places therein. In a Word: One must say, on this Occasion, what an Apostle (2) said on another Subject, Faith without Works is dead. You think you have obtained the Victory; but to what purpose is This Faith without Works? Shew your Faith by your Works. It is remarkable, that neither Party can say to the other, You have Faith, and I have Works: Shew me your Faith without your Works, and I will shew you my Faith by my Works. It must not be said, in Vindication of a General, who has all the Honours of the Day, the Field of Battle, the Artillery, a great number of Prisoners and Colours, without drawing any other considerable Advantage from it, that he acts with a wonderful Disinterestedness; that he is satisfied with the Honour, and does not care for the Profit; that he does not make War, like a Merchant, to get an Estate, but like an Hero, to acquire Glory, præter laudem nullius avari (3). I say, this would be a pitiful Apology; for, in these sort of Things, the Useful Part is not separated from the Glorious. Nothing contributes more to the Glory of a great Commander, than the Activity, Diligence, and Ability, he shews, in improving to his own Advantage the Enemy's Defeat, and following the Business close, while they are yet confounded by their first Misfortune. At Rome, where they were good Judges of the Merit of Warriors, They made a great Difference between Those, who only gained Battles, and those who finished a War (4). They were much more praised, who made triumphant Entries, with the Effigies of several Provinces, or of many conquered Towns, than Those who could only boast of having killed many Men. This was good Policy in the Romans, though it was attended likewise with some Inconveniencies. They did not commonly continue the Generals of their Armies two or three Years, successively, in their Offices; for, almost every Year, the new Consul went to relieve the Consul of the foregoing Year: for which reason every one did his Endeavour to finish the War, and not to leave the Honour of crowning the Work to another (5). Every one aspired to the Glory of the Debellare. But, when a General is sure of the Command till the end of the War, he is not always in an Humour to make too much haste; he is glad to delay the Peace; and, if he follows, in his Victories, the Maxim, That a Golden Bridge must be made for the vanquished Enemy, it is not because he is disinterested, and does not seek for Profit, but, on the contrary, it is his particular Interest, which inclines him to give the flying Enemy leave to recover again, and to prolong the War (6). A King, who commands his Troops in Person, and does not make use of his Advantages, has not the same Motive: He does, without doubt, (generally speaking) his utmost Endeavour to improve his Victories: but a Cæsar, an Alexander, a Prince, in a word, that can make the best use of his Victories, is a great Rarity. A General, who only gains Victories for the Profit of those, who deal in Mourning Cloaths, may be found every where.

The great Captain, of whom I spoke in the beginning of this Remark, is Hannibal. Read here what Adherbal said to him: 'Dubium deinde non erat quin ultimum illum diem habitura fuerit Roma, quintumque intra diem epulari Annibal in Capitolio potuerit, si (quod Pœnum illum dixisse Adherbalem Bomilcaris ferunt) Annibal quemadmodum sciret vincere, sic uti victoria scisset (7). — Rome must have been conquered, and Hannibal might have feasted in the Capitol within five Days, if (as the Carthaginian Adherbal, the Son of Bomilcar, is reported to have said) he had known as well how to improve, as to gain, a Victory.' In Livy it is Maherbal; who, seeing that, after the Battle of Cannæ, Hannibal rejected the Counsel he gave him, to go directly to Rome, tho' he assured him, that in five Days they should sup in the Capitol, said to him; 'Non omnia nimirum eisdem Diis dederunt: vincere scis Annibal, victoria uti nescis (8). — The Gods have not given every Qualification to the same Man; you, Hannibal, his ambitious Designs; but with the Qualities he was Master of, he was a Man fit to procure to himself favourable Opportunities [B]: I mean, to convert into these kind of Opportunities what would have been, of itself, very unfit to serve him, or to concur with the Enterprizes of another. Readiness, Vigilance, and a certain Ardour, which does not allow any Remissness, whilst something remains to be done, were fit Qualities in him to make him what he attained to. The Victory of Pharsalia, which was a decisive Blow, and, as one may say, a Decree pronounced from Heaven on the Civil-Wars of Rome, did not dazzle him so much, but that he remembered that Pompey, the Head of the opposite Party, was still living; and that therefore there would never be an end of it, if he should give him Time to know how to conquer, but not to improve a Victory. Antigonus found the same Fault in Pyrrius (9).

(12) These two Popes had the Surname of Great.

[B] He knew how to procure to himself favourable Opportunities. It is a great Illusion, to believe, that Alexander owed his Conquests to the Circumstances of the Times, and Places where he was, and that many others would have done no less than he in the like Situation (10). See what Pâquier's Thoughts are upon this. 'I believe, says he (11), that the Surname of Most Great belonged to Pope Nicolas I; not that he exceeded Leo, and Gregory I, in Sense (12); but he had as much both natural and acquired Abilities as they, in things he undertook. And besides, he found a proper and favourable time to put his Designs in Execution; which is what makes us seem greater among Men. For it must not be supposed, that Pyrrius and Hannibal had less Courage or Conduct, than Alexander of Macedonia, or Julius Cæsar: but, when the two first miscarried in their Designs against Rome, there were a great many Reasons for it, which did not hold in the Time of Julius Cæsar, and Alexander. Neither do I question, but that, if Leo or Gregory had lived in the Age of Nicolas, when the Affairs of our Church were in disorder, they would have done what Nicolas did, and he in their Times what they did, and no more.' If Pâquier had only kept to the general Thesis, he might have advanced an Opinion as certain as an Aphorism in Mechanics. Suppose, on one side, that two Men have the same Talents; and, on the other, that the same Opportunities, which concur with the one, concur also with the other, it is plain, that what shall be performed by the one, may be performed by the other. By the same Talents, and the same Opportunities, I do not mean the same things in number, but things, which (all Compensations being made) may be equivalent. On this Supposition, Pyrrius would as necessarily have subdued Rome, as Cæsar, as it is necessary, that two Weights should be in Equilibrium, when the one, three times less than the other, is three times more distant from the Point of Support. The general Thesis is therefore certain; but the Hypothesis, or the Application of This Position to Pyrrius and Cæsar, to Pope Leo and Pope Nicolas, has nothing of Certainty in it; because we do not exactly know the reciprocal Proportions of their personal Talents, and of the Opportunities they had. The Knowledge, which History gives us, is more proper to refute, than to justify Pâquier. Every one knows the Compliment, which was made to Hannibal, that the Gods, in granting him the Gift of obtaining Victories, had refused him That of making good use of them (13). It is well known, that, when he was told so, he had just before rejected the most favourable Opportunity, that could be offered, to take Rome. It is well known, that Pyrrius, in the Judgment of a great Captain, was like Those Gamesters, to whom Chance gives a fair Game, but who know not how to make use of it (14). So that here are two great Captains, who neither equal Alexander, nor Cæsar. The latter have wonderfully improved the Opportunities, which fell into their Hands. The Event speaks for them: And there are only Conjectures for the other; besides, those Conjectures are very much weakened by the Faults, which they committed. Let us not believe then, that Pâquier argued right.

I believe there are unknown Persons, who, in a chief Minister's Place, would perform greater Things than he does. And I believe, that a chief Minister, who does not succeed in a certain Time, might perform wonders in another Age (15); but I am also fully persuaded, that, if Pyrrius and Hannibal had dared to say, that Alexander could not have done in Italy what he did in Asia, they ought to have been answered, that they could not have done in Asia what he did. An Inhabitant of Scrippus said one Day to Themistocles: 'You are not become famous by yourself, but by the Glory of your Country. You say right, answered Themistocles, 'I had not been a famous Man, if I had been born at Scrippus; but you would not have been so, although you had been born at Athens (16). This is a Model of an Answer to those, who make no other difference between Cæsar or Alexander, and the other Princes, whom they pitch upon in History, but in that the Opportunities of conquering a great Empire fell into the Hands of That other Prince: It ought to be said to these Men; 'Without those Opportunities, they would not have conquered such a great Empire; but your Prince would not have conquered it with the same Opportunities.' See some of Cæsar's Warlike Qualities in the following Remark.

[C] Activity, Vigilance, and a certain Ardour, were in him Qualities — fit to make him what he attained to. These admirable Qualities gave occasion for the great Praises, which are in one of Cicero's Speeches. Though they are somewhat hyperbolical, they are not groundless. See here what That illustrious Orator said to This great Warrior: 'Soleo saepe ante oculos ponere, idque libenter crebris usurpare sermonibus, omnes nostrorum Imperatorum, omnes exterarum gentium, potentissimorumque populorum, omnes clarissimorum regum res gestas cum tuis nec contentiorum magnitudine, nec numero praeliorum, nec varietate regionum, nec celeritate conficiendi, nec dissimilitudine bellorum posse conferri: nec vero dissimulatas terras citius ejusquam passibus potuisse peragrari, quam tuis non dicam curibus sed victoriis illustratae sunt (17). — I am wont to set before

Mens Eyes, and with great Willingness frequently to declare in Speech, that all the Actions of our Generals, all those of foreign Nations, of the most powerful People, and most renowned Kings, are not to be compared with yours, for the Greatness of Contests, the Number of Battles, the Variety of Regions, the Expedition in performing, and the Diversity of the Wars engaged in: and that others would be longer in travelling through the most distant Countries, than you, I will not say in passing through, but, in conquering them.' No Man ever better apprehended how much it concerned a General of an Army to be diligent (18). How many times has his Victory been owing to his speedy Marches? He did not give the Enemy time to recover, and take care of themselves; he ran like Lightning, and prevented Fame; his Enemies did not know, that his Troops were marching, till he fell upon them. 'Acie triplici instructa, & celeriter octo millium itinere confecto, prius ad hostium castra pervenit, quam quid ageretur Germani sentire possent. Qui omnibus rebus subito perterriti, & celeritate adventus nostri, & discessu suorum, neque consilii habendi, neve arma capiendi spatio dato, perturbabantur, copiasne adversus hostem ducere, an castra defendere, an fuga salutem petere praestaret (19). — Drawing up his Army in three Columns, and marching eight Miles with great Expedition, he arrived at the Enemy's Camp, before the Germans knew any thing of the Matter; who, being on a sudden astonished at the Quickness of our Arrival, and the Desertion of their own Men, and wanting time either to call a Council of War, or to take Arms, were at a loss whether to face the Enemy, to gather the broken Remains of his Army. Wherefore his first Care was to pursue the flying Enemy; which was the Cause of Pompey's tragical End; for it is very likely, that they would not have put him to death, if they had not been assured, that Cæsar pursued him. When we consider, in general, the Wars, which he gloriously ended, we cannot but admire him; but when we reflect upon the prodigious

'my, or betake themselves to Flight.' Nothing could stop him; the Mountains, covered with Snow, deceived those, who looked upon them as a safe Rampart against his Marches. 'Et si mons Gebenna, qui Arvernos ab Helviis discludit, durissimo tempore anni, altissima nive iter impendebat: tamen discussa nive sex in altitudinem pedum, atque ita viis patefactis, fummo militum labore ad fines Arvernorum pervenit: quibus oppressis inopinantibus, quod se sic Gebenna ut muro munitos existimabant, ac ne singulari quidem unquam homini eo tempore anni semitæ patuerant, equitibus imperat, &c (20). — Though Mount Gebenna, which separates the Arverni from the Helvii, stopped his March by a very deep Snow, it being the most rigorous Season of the Year; yet, digging through the Snow to the Depth of six Feet, and thus, with great labour of his Soldiers, opening a Passage, he arrived at the Borders of the Arverni: whom falling upon unexpectedly, as thinking themselves secured by Mount Gebenna as by a Wall, and no single Person having ever passed it at that Season of the Year, he commands the Horse, &c.' Being arrived with This Speed on the Frontiers of Auvergne, he stopped there but two Days; he went with the same Diligence to another Place, to prevent the Designs of Vercingetorix. 'His continuis rebus, omnibus suis inopinantibus, quam maximis potest itineribus Viennam pervenit; ibi nactus recentem equitatum, quem multis ante diebus eo præmiserat, neque diurno neque nocturno itinere intermisso, per fines Heduarum in Lingones contendit, ubi dum legiones hyemabant, ut si quid etiam de sua salute ab Heduis iniretur consilii, celeritate præcurreret. Eo cum pervenisset, ad reliquas legiones mittit, priusque in unum locum omnes cogit quam de ejus adventu Arvernus nunciari posset (21). — Having settled these Things, he arrived, unexpectedly to every one, by long Marches, at Vienne; there taking with him the new Cavalry, which he had sent thither many Days before, and marching Night and Day, he arrived, through the Country of the Hedui, at the Lingones, where two Legions wintered, that he might prevent, by his Expedition, any designs of the Hedui against his Safety. At his Arrival, he sends to the rest of the Legions, and assembles them all together, before the Arverni had notice of his Arrival! Plutarch relates a very singular Thing of the Defeat of That General of the Gauls. The Inhabitants of Alexia, besieged by Julius Cæsar, impatiently expected Vercingetorix to come and raise the Siege with Three hundred thousand Men: They knew not, that Cæsar was marched to fight That great Army, nor did they know it, till they saw him, from the Top of their Walls, return victorious to the Siege. Their Cries and Complaints gave the Roman Soldiers, who kept the Lines of Countervallation, the first News of Cæsar's Victory (22). This is yet more singular, as Plutarch observes. He has reason to say, that Vercingetorix's great Army vanished like a Dream, and like an Apparition. Ὁντος ὁ ζωὴς ἡ τοσαύτη δύναμις ὡς περ εἰδωλόν ἢ ὄνειρον ἠφανίσθη καὶ διεπαρῆτο. Τὰν βρεῖν χρόνον ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀπείρου χρόνου. Τὰν βρεῖν χρόνον ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀπείρου χρόνου. Τὰν βρεῖν χρόνον ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀπείρου χρόνου. Tam brevi momento adeo immensa manus sicut spectrum vel somnium evanuit & dissipata est (23). Thus he describes admirably the Speed, where-with Julius Cæsar executed great Designs. He could march an hundred Miles a day, in case of necessity; he swam over Rivers, or was carried over them, upon swelled Hides; and so he arrived before the News of his March. Longissimas vias incredibili celeritate confectis expeditis, meritoria redita centena passuum millia in singulos dies: si flumina morarentur, nando trajiceris, vel innixus inflatis utribus, ut persæpe nuntios de se præveniret (24). If I have compared him to Lightning, it is after Florus: 'Hunc (Pharnacem) Cæsar aggressus, sibi (25), uno, & ut sic dixerim non toto prælio, obtrivit, MORE FULMINIS, quod

See here how Suetonius speaks concerning the Speed, wherewith Pharnaces was conquered. 'Pontico triumpho inter pompæ secula trium verborum prætulit titulum VENI, VIDI, VICI, non acta belli significantem sicut ceteri, sed celeriter confecti notam (26). — In his Pontic Triumph, among other Ornaments, he had carried before him an Inscription containing these three Words, I CAME, SAW, and CONQUERED, not signifying the Actions of the War, as other Generals did, but expressing the Expedition with which it was concluded.' Plutarch says, that Cæsar writ these three Words, Veni, vidi, vici, to a Friend, to signify the Shortness of this War (27). Cicero, even at the time that he spoke of Cæsar, as of an Enemy, looked upon him as a Prodigy of Speed and Vigilance; sed hoc regis horribili vigilantia, celeritate, diligentia est (28). Give me leave to insert here the fine Elogy, which he made upon him, in his Speech against Pisæ. He considered Cæsar's great Actions as a Thing, which rendered, for the future, the Ramparts, Nature had given Italy, useless and superfluous. I wish he had had the same Thought also concerning Cæsar's Valour and Diligence: 'Dicam ex animo, Patres Conscripti, quod sentio, & quod vobis audientibus sæpe jam dixi, si mihi nunquam amicus C. Cæsar fuisset, semper iratus, si aspernaretur amicitiam meam, seseque mihi implacabilem inexpiabilemque præberet, tamen ei, cum tantas res gessisset, gereretque quotidie, non amicus esse non possem: cujus ego imperio non Alpium vallum contra aditum, transgressionemque Gallorum, non Rheni fossam gurgitibus illis redundantem Germanorum immanissimis gentibus obijcio, & oppono: perfecti ille, ut si montes resedissent, amnes exaruisissent, non naturæ præsidio, sed victoria sua, rebusque gestis, Italiam munitam haberemus (29). — I will freely declare, Fathers Conscrip, what I think, and what I have said in your hearing; if Caius Cæsar had never been my Friend, if he had ever bore me a Grudge, if he had despised my Friendship, and had been inexorably bent against me, yet, when I consider the great Actions he has performed, and those he is daily performing, I cannot but be his Friend: under whose Conduct, I oppose not the Alps against the Ascent and Passage of the Gauls, nor the overflowing Rhine against the most barbarous Nations of the Germans: were the Hills to subside, and the Rivers to dry up, Italy, destitute of the Defence of Nature, would yet be guarded and secured by his Victory and Exploits.'

This Activity was not a Fire, that soon exhausted his Strength; it was attended with a constant Application. Cæsar looked upon what he had done as nothing, if any thing remained to be done: He was for finishing altogether the Wars, wherein he was engaged: He was not willing, that Fortune should have any Opportunity to undo all that he had not finished. This is very nobly expressed in these Latin Verses.

At nunquam patiens pacis, longæque quietis prodigious Number of Men, whose Death, Poverty, or Slavery, he occasioned, we can hardly forbear abhorring him [D]. The greatest Crime of all is, That, to revenge private Quarrels, which he had drawn upon himself by his too ambitious Conduct, he made use of the same Arms, for the Oppression of his Country, which

But Cæsar, never patient long in Peace,
Nor trusting in his Fortune's present Face,
Closely pursues his flying Son behind,
While yet his Fate continu'd to be kind.
Such Towns, such Fortresses, such hostile Force,
Swept in the Torrent of one rapid Course;
Such Trains of long Success attending still,
And Rome herself abandoned to his Will;
Rome, the contending Party's noblest Prize,
To ev'ry Wish, but Cæsar's, might suffice.
But He, with Empire fir'd, and vast Desires,
To All, and nothing less than All, aspires:
He reckons not the past, while ought remain'd
Great to be done, or Mighty to be gain'd.

He pressed the Enemy chiefly, during the precious Moments in which Fortune smiled upon him: Dum fortuna calet, dum conficit omnia terror (31). From hence it happened, that he never gained a Battle without making himself Master of his Enemy's Camp immediately: Nullum unquam hostem fudit quin castris quoque exueret: ita nullum spatium perterritis dabat (32). He did not act like Pompey, who, to spare Blood-shed, lost the Opportunity of putting an end to the War (33). But nothing stopped him; a Resistance half conquered animated him no less than a Resistance yet entire. We shall see his Picture and Character in these Verses of the Pharſalia.

Then past Renown, and antiquated Pow'r.
'Twas not the Fame of what he once had been,

But 'twas a Valour, restless, unconfin'd,
Which no Success could ſate, nor Limits bind;
'Twas Shame, a Soldier's Shame, untaught to yield,
That blas'd for nothing but an ill-fought Field:

[D] When we reflect upon the prodigious number of Men, whose Death he occasioned, we can scarce forbear abhorring him.] He fought, in Gaul, against Three Millions of Men, whereof only a third Part escaped; for he killed a Million, and took a Million Prisoners. This is Plutarch's Account (35). That of Appian is the same as to the Slain and Prisoners, but not as to the number of the Enemies; for he says, they were Four Millions (36): He adds, that Cæsar took above Eight hundred Towns in Gaul. Plutarch says it also.

But Cæsar, in the Speech, which Julian the Apostate ascribes to him (37), speaks but of Three hundred Towns taken, and of Two Millions of Men conquered. Velleius Paterculus, who intended rather to heighten, than to lessen, This Conqueror's Glory, says, the number of the Slain amounted only to Four hundred Thousand (38). It is true, he had said, in the foregoing Chapter, that the number of the Dead, and of the Prisoners, was innumerable. 'Cum deinde immanes res vix multis voluminibus explicandas C. Cæsar in Gallia ageret, nec contentus plurimis ac felicissimis victoriis, innumerabilibusque caesis & captis hostium millibus (39). When afterwards Cæsar performed wonderful Exploits, scarce to be described in many Volumes, nor contented with many the most successful Victories, and innumerable Thousands of Enemies slain and made Prisoners.' Pliny goes farther than all the rest; he makes the number of the dead amount to One Million One hundred and ninety two thousand; but he takes in all the Wars of Cæsar, except the Civil-War. Let us see his Words: we find in them, that Cæsar fought fifty Battles. 'Sig-

'nis collatis quingagies dimicavit: solus M. Marcellum transgressus qui undequadrages dimicaverat. Nam præter civiles victorias undecies centena & XCII. M. hominum occisa præliis ab eo non equidem in gloria posterum, tantam etiam coactam humani generis injuriam, quod ita esse confessus est ipse, bellorum civilium stragem non prodendo (40). He came to an Engagement with the Enemy fifty times: in this exceeding M. Marcellus only, who had fought Thirty nine Battles. For, besides his Victories gained in the Civil Wars, the Slaughter of One Million one hundred ninety two Thousand Men, occasioned by him, is not to his Honour, even though he could not have avoided it, as he himself confesses, by not declaring the Slaughter attending the Civil Wars.' Salmaſius pretends, that these Words are inexplicable, and that they must be corrected in this manner, tanta etiam coacta in humani generis injuria (41). The Thought he attributes to Pliny comes to this: I am so far from thinking it a Glory to Julius Cæsar, to have destroyed so great a multitude of Men, that I believe it had been very prejudicial to Mankind, if such a number of People had been gathered from divers Places. Father Hardouin would not so much as mention this Criticism; he only observes, that there is no difficulty in those Words. Pliny, says he, meant, That he did not look upon a Slaughter, so prejudicial to Human kind, as a glorious Thing, tho' it may seem, perhaps, that Cæsar was forced to make That great Slaughter, by reason of the Injury which he had received. 'Querit Salmaſius pag. 49, qui hæc verba sibi explanet. Non opus est vate in re planissima. Ait Plinius minime se in laude aliqua positurum occisa tot hominum milia ob tantam humani generis chdem: licet ad hanc inferendam coactus videri fortassis aliena injuria queat (42). It is plain, that the Explication of This Jesuit is incomparably better, than That of Salmaſius. Nevertheless I cannot believe, that Pliny would insinuate the Excuse, mentioned by Father Hardouin, in Favour of Julius Cæsar. Indeed Cæsar could only colour his War with Pompey, and the other Civil Wars, which proceeded from thence, with that Excuse. Now Pliny says expressly, that the One Million one hundred ninety two Thousand Men, whom Cæsar killed in his Battles, differ from those he killed in the Civil Wars; so that there is no likelihood, that Pliny's Aim was what Father Hardouin supposes. I had rather say, that the Sense of That Author is this. The Slaughter of a Million one hundred and ninety two Thousand Men is such a considerable detriment to Human kind, that I should not think it glorious, although it had been made by Con- strain, as in defensive Wars; and, since Cæsar suppressed the Slaughter of the Civil Wars, he must have acknowledged the Truth of my Prin-

his Sovereigns had put into his Hands to subdue their Enemies. It is a pity, that a Man, guilty of such an enormous Attempt, should have had so many noble Qualities. He was no less qualified for Intrigues, than Battles [E], and had no less Wit, than Courage [F]. He was learned, and so eloquent, that the Desire alone of possessing the chief Post of the Government hindered him from contending for the first Place with the most famous Orators (b). We have two of his Works [G], the ciple. This does an Honour to Pliny; and I could name some great Captains, who have extremely dreaded the Sovereign Judge of the World, on their Death-bed, remembering the Blood, which they had shed in religious Wars, which they thought most just, and which they had managed (43). The Necessity, to which a Man is reduced, of doing certain Things, would sometimes incline one to look upon a Prince rather as an unhappy Man, than as one covered with Glory.

[E] He was no less qualified for Intrigues, than for Battles. No Man could dissemble or flatter better than He, when there was occasion for it (44).

He managed his Intrigues so well, when he sued to be Great Pontif, that he carried That Office from two illustrious Competitors (45), who were much older, and much more deserving on account of the Services done to the Republic, than he was. His great Courage, and natural Pride, became so pliant, that he condescended to the meanest Flatteries towards those, who could be favourable to him (46); and, to obtain his Aim the better, he borrowed very great Sums of Money, to buy Votes. By this means he gained over the Poor and the Rich to his Interests; the first, because they thought themselves obliged to favour a Man, who had given them so much Money, and the last, because they feared they should never be re-paid, if Cæsar failed of his Designs (47). And, indeed, if he had not been elected Pontifex Maximus, he must have left the City, and become Bankrupt. For this reason he told his Mother, when he was going to the Place where the Election was to be made, This Day you will either see me Pontifex Maximus or a Fugitive (48). Could any one devise a more cunning way, than he made use of, to support his own Interest in his Absence? He chained, if one may so say, all those, who were promoted to any Offices; for he laboured, by his Intrigues, and his Credit, to exclude from them all such as would not promise to support him whilst he should be absent: so that the only way to attain to Offices, by his Recommendation, was to engage oneself in his Interests, and to promise him in a manner a blind Obedience. Neither was he always satisfied with verbal Promises, but exacted an Oath, and a Promise in Writing, from some. Was it difficult to foretel, that a Republic, where such Disorders reigned, would not continue long? 'Ad securitatem ergo posteritatis temporis in magno negotio habuit obligare semper annuos magistratus, & de petitoribus non alios adjuvare aut ad honorem pati pervenire, quam qui sibi receperint propugnatos absentiam suam, cujus pacti non dubitavit à quibusdam jururandum atque etiam syngrapham exigere (49).' Sylla had a good Foresight, when, yielding to the repeated Desires of divers Persons of Quality, he told them, They would repent one day for having hindered him from making away with That young Man, who had many Marius's in his Bosom. 'Satis constat Syllam cum deprecantibus amicissimis & ornatissimis viris aliquamdiu denegasset, atque illi pertinaciter contenderent, expugnatum tandem proclamasse (five divinitus, five aliqua conjectura) vincerent, ac sibi haberent; dummodo scirent, eum, quem incolumem tanto opere cuperent, quandoque optimatum partibus, quas secum simul defendissent, exitio futurum: nam Cæsari multos Marios inesse (50).'

[F] He had no less Wit than Courage. I shall make use of Pliny's Words, to represent the vast Extent and Activity of This Wit. 'Animi vigore præstantissimum arbitror genitum Cæsarem dictatorem. Nec virtutem constantiamque nunc commemoro, nec subtilitatem omnium capacem, quæ cælo continentur: sed proprium vigorem celeritatemque quodam igne volucrum. Scribere aut legere, simul dictare & audire solitum accepimus.

Epistolæ vero tantarum rerum quaternas pariter, librariis dictare: aut si nihil aliud ageret, septenas (51). --- No Man, I think, ever equalled Cæsar, the Dictator, in Strength of Mind. I say, nothing at present of his Courage and Constancy, or of That sublime Genius, which could grasp every thing contained in Heaven; but only of that peculiar Strength of Mind, and surprising Quickness of Thought. We are told, that he could write or read, and at the same time dictate, or attend to another's Discourse, and that he could dictate four Epistles, or, if he had nothing else to do, seven at once, to his Ammanenses. Cæsar could read, write, and dictate to several Persons, at one time. As for his Undauntedness and Courage, see Suetonius (52).

[G] We have two of his Works. Viz. Seven Books of the Wars of Gaul, and three Books of Civil Wars. They are properly Memoirs. There is a great neatness of Style in them, and all the careless Beauties, which such a happy Genius as That of Julius Cæsar could diffuse in a Work of That Nature, which he composed in haste (53), and without Art. What Hirtius said of them, might well be taken for a flattering Elogy, if there were not a like Elogy in a Work, wherein Cicero did not set up for a Panegyrist, as he did in some Orations (54). Hirtius's Words are these: 'Constat inter omnes nihil tam operose ab aliis esse perfectum quod non horum elegantia commentariorum superetur: qui sunt editi ne scientia tantarum rerum gestarum scriptoribus defuit, adeoque probantur omnium judicio, ut præcepta non præbita facultas scriptoribus videatur (55). --- It is agreed on all Hands, that the most laborious Works of others are surpassed by the Elegance of these Commentaries; which are published, that Writers might not be unacquainted with such great Actions; and which are so universally approved, as to surpass, rather than afford Materials, to other Writers.' And these are Cicero's Words: 'Commentarios quosdam scripsit rerum suarum, valde probandos: nudi enim sunt, recti, & venusti, omni ornatu orationis tanquam veste detracta: sed dum voluit alios habere parata unde fumerent qui vellent scribere historiam, ineptis gratum fortasse fecit qui volunt illa calamistris inungere, sanos quidem homines à scribendo deteruit: nihil enim est in historia pura & illustri brevitate dulcius (56). --- He wrote Commentaries of his own Actions, highly worthy of Commendation: for they are unadorned, just, and beautiful, all Ornament of Language, as a Garment, being thrown off; but, whilst he intended to prepare Materials for those, who would write History, perhaps he obliged those, who love to garnish such things with Words, but discouraged Men of Sense from writing: for nothing is more pleasing in History than neat and perspicuous Brevity. Every one did not judge of them as Cicero and Hirtius; for we read, in Suetonius, that Asinius Pollio found too much Negligence, and many Lies, in These Commentaries: whether it be, that Cæsar believed some false Reports, or that, as to the Things performed by him, Self-love, or want of Memory, made him write several Falsities. 'Pollio Asinius parum diligenter parumque integra veritate compositos putat, cum Cæsar pleraque & quæ per alios erant gesta temere crediderit, & quæ per se vel consulto, vel etiam memoria lapsus perperam ediderit, existimatque rescripturum, & correcturum fuisse (57).'

A modern Critic (58) has greatly censured this Judgment of Pollio; but the Author of News from the Republic of Letters declared against That Critic. 'It would be difficult, said he (59), to convict Asinius Pollio of Having falsely accused Cæsar's Commentaries of Falseness: for why should we not believe, that a cotemporary Author, who was in all respects of the same Trade with Cæsar, a Captain, an Historian, and an Orator as well as he, informed himself of a thousand Things, which shewed, that Cæsar had published many Fables? For the rest, it is most certain, that the Memoirs of That Conqueror are written too carelessly; and, if the Prince of Condé does ever think of writing the Relation of his Campaigns in such a manner, he may be sure, that his Book will not be admired by good Judges; but, without doubt, they would prove quite another thing. I am sure, there are few Partizans of Antiquity so prepossessed, as to maintain, That the Memoirs of the Duke de la Rochefoucault are not better than Those of Cæsar. Consult Vossius (60), who shews two Things with the utmost Clearness. I. That Cæsar is the true Author of the Commentaries, which go under his Name. II. That he has often disguised the Truth (61). See below the Remark [S].

[H] It would be wrong to take him for a speculative Epicurean, with respect to Providence. Three Things may be objected to me on this Point. The first is this Passage of Salust: 'De pœna, possum equidem dicere id quod res habet, in luctu atque miseris mortem ærumnarum requiem non cruciatum esse, eam cuncta mortalium mala dissolvere, ultra neque curæ neque gaudium locum esse (62). — As for the Punishment, I for my part can speak the Truth; that, under Affliction and Calamities, Death is a Repose from Misery, not a Torment, that it puts an end to all the Ills of Mortals, and that beyond it there is no room either for Anxiety or Joy.' Cæsar speaks thus in the Senate, in giving his Vote concerning the Punishment, which was to be inflicted on the Accomplishers of Catiline. He decides plainly, and without the least Exception, that Death puts an end to all our Happiness and Misery: This is flatly to deny the Immortality of the Soul. One may very well wonder, that a Senator durst speak in this manner before the whole Senate. Cato did not let this Doctrine pass without notice taken of it; but he censured it only indirectly, and with Moderation. 'Bene & composite Caius Cæsar paulo ante in hoc ordine de vita & morte disseruit, credo falsa existimans ea quæ de Inferis memorantur, diverso itinere malos a bonis loca tetra, inculta, fœda, atque formidolosa habere (63). — Caius Cæsar discoursed but a little while ago, in this very Assembly, in an apt manner, on Life and Death, not believing, I suppose, what is said of another World, that the wicked are separated from the Good, and allotted to dismal and horrible Mansions.' The second Objection is taken from Lucan. That Poet says, that Cæsar, having besieged Marcellis, ordered a Wood to be cut down, which was consecrated to a Deity, so much the more respected by the Inhabitants, because they did not know that Deity (64). The Soldiers durst not obey; they feared their Axes would turn against themselves. Cæsar was obliged to set his hand to the Work first of all, and to encourage them, not only by the success of the Blows with a Hatchet, which he gave to one of those consecrated Trees, but also by declaring, that he charged himself with all the Fault and Impiety they might commit. He was obeyed, not so much because they were no more afraid, but because, all things well considered, they chose rather to expose themselves to the Wrath of Heaven, than to his.

Sed fortis tremere manus, motique verenda
Majestatis loci, si robora sacra ferirent,
In sua credebant reditura membra securæ.
Implicitas magno Cæsar terrore cohortes
Ut vidit, primus raptam librare bipennem
Ausus, & æriam ferro proscindere quercum,
Effatur merfo violata in robora ferro:
Jam ne quis vestrum dubitet subvertere silvam,
Credite me fecisse nefas. Tunc paruit omnis

Imperii non sublato securo pavore

Turba, sed expensa Superorum, & Cæsar's ira (65). (65) Id. ibid. ver. 429.

But lo! The bolder Hands, that soon'd have struck,
With some unusual Horror trembling shook;
With silent Dread and Reverence, they survey'd
The Gloom majestic of the sacred Shade:
None dares with impious Steel the Bark to rend,
Left on himself the destin'd Stroke descend.
Cæsar perceiv'd the spreading Fear to grow,
Then eager caught an Ax, and aim'd a Blow.
Deep sunk within a violated Oak
The wounding Edge, and thus the Warrior spoke;
Now let no doubting Hand the Task decline:
Cut you the Wood, and let the Guilt be mine.
The trembling Bands unwillingly obey'd;
Two various Ills were in the Balance laid,
And Cæsar's Wrath against the Gods was weigh'd.

Rowe.

If all that I want of Lucan's Narrative did not end here, I would add, that he remarks, that the Inhabitants of Marcellis were so far from being grieved for the loss of their sacred Wood, that they rejoiced extremely at it, thinking so great an Impiety would not remain unpunished; but, says Lucan, they experimented, that the Gods are only angry with the Unfortunate (66). This is to speak too profanely: It is to impute That Fault to Providence, of which the Judges of the Earth are accused, when it is said, that Gibbets are only made for the Unfortunate. The third Objection is furnished by Suetonius, who says, that Religion, that is to say, the ill Prefages of Victims, or such other divine Warnings, could never deter Cæsar from beginning or pursuing his Undertakings. 'Ne religione quidem ulla a quoquam incepto absteritus unquam vel retardatus est. Cum immolanti aufugisset hostia professionem adversus Scipionem & Jubam non distulit (67). He gave a remarkable Example of it, the Day of his Death; since he went to the Senate, although the Victims, which he caused to be offered, prefaged no good to him (68). These are three Arguments, which I am going to answer.

I say against the first, That it proves too much; for, if the Passage of Salust be a Proof, that Cæsar did not believe the Providence of the Gods, it must be said, that Cicero did not believe it neither; for, in a full Audience, he affirmed, as plainly as Cæsar, that Death puts an end to all our Miseries and called all that was said concerning the Torments of Hell, Fables and Dreams. 'Huic mortem maturabat inimicus, quod illi unum in malis periculum erat calamitatis? qui si quid animi, ac virtutis habuisset (ut multi sæpe fortes viri in ejusmodi dolore mortem sibi ipse conscisseret: huic quamobrem id vellet inimicus offerre, quod ipse sibi optare deberet? Nam nunc quidem quid tandem illi mali mors attulit? Nisi fortè ineptis, ac fabulis ducimur, ut existimemus, illum apud inferos impiorum supplicia perferre, ac plures illic offendisse inimicos, quam hic reliquisse: a socris, ab uxorum, a fratris, a liberum pœnis actum esse præcipitem in scelera torum sedem, atque regionem. Quæ si falsa sunt, id quod omnes intelligunt, quid ei tandem aliud mors eripuit, præter sensum doloris (69)? — Did an Enemy hasten his Death, which to him was the only Refuge from Calamity? who, if he had been a Man of any Resolution and Courage (like many brave Men under the same Misfortune) would have died by his own hand: wherefore would an Enemy offer him That, which he himself ought to have wished for? For what Evil did Death bring him? unless we are led by silly Stories to believe, that he suffers below the Punishments of the wicked, and that he has met with more Enemies there, than he has left behind him: and that the Punishments of his Father-in-law, his Wives, his Brother, and his Children,

Lucan. He was not the first, who leaped out of his Ship on the Britannic Shore. He was made to say so in a Speech (c); but he said quite the contrary in his Writings. In all likelihood, he might have enjoyed the Usurpation of the Empire longer, if he had not been fond of the Name and Grandeur of a Sovereign. His Friends, who should have supported him in such a slippery Station, ruined him, by too hastily endeavouring to procure him the Regal Ornaments. He and his Friends should have considered, that free Nations easily accustom themselves to Servitude, provided it be not called so; and that having lost the reality of their Privileges, without appearing to be concerned for it, they make a great Clamour, and vehemently oppose a Title, and an Ornament for the Head. If any thing made the Conspirators resolve to hasten the Execution of their Design, it was the

'Children, have plunged him headlong into the Seat and Region of the wicked. If these things are false, as all understand them to be, what more has Death deprived him of, than a sense of Pain?' It would be very wrong to conclude from this Passage, that Cicero neither believed another Life, nor the Providence of the Gods; his Writings testify the contrary too plainly. Moreover, every One does not agree, that there is a necessary Connexion between the Immortality of the Soul, and the Providence of God. The Sadducees denied the first of these two Doctrines, and admitted the last. I make use of a like Answer to the second Objection. Sylla, of all Men in the World, was farthest from Atheism. He would have the greatest regard be paid to the Orders, which God gives by way of Dreams; he ascribed his Victories to the favour of Fortune, much more than to his own Prudence (70); he believed

Εἰ δὲ ὁρᾷ τις αὐτοῖς καθεζομένοις, νῦν μὲν ἀπαλλὰτ' εἶναι, παρῆναι δὲ αὖθις ὅταν ἐν ὕπνῳ βελήσιν ὀνείρεσι Καλπυρῖα, τίνες ἔσονται λόγος παρὰ τῶν φρονούντων; Quibus si quis confidentibus dicat, in praesentia ut descedant, redeantque ubi nata fuerit Calpurnia letiora somnia; quales futuri sint apud invidios sermones (76)? He therefore believed Presages: We know moreover, that he composed divers Books concerning the Auspices (77) and that he was encouraged by a Prodigy to pass the Rubicon: Eatur, said he (78), qua Deorum offensa et inimicorum iniquitas vocat: jacta alea est. — Let us go where the Omens of the Gods, and the Iniquity of our Enemies, call: The Die is cast. We know, that he prayed to the Gods, when he was about to fight a decisive Battle with Pompey. Παρηχρῆς γυνόμενος καὶ ἐνέδμενος τοῖς θεοῖς παρέτατ' ἐ τὴν φάλαγγα. Ibi laetis et Deos precatus aciem ornata (79). We know, that he had an extraordinary Confidence in his Fortune, as it appeared, when he encouraged his Pilot; Quid times? Caesarem visis (80). — Fear not, thou carriest Caesar. His Words are more expressive in Plutarch (81). We know that he acknowledged Fortune concerned herself with every thing, but that she prebids more visibly in War, than in any other thing. 'Multum cum in omnibus rebus, tum in re militari fortuna potest' (82). Fortuna quæ plurimum potest tum in reliquis rebus, tum præcipue in bello, parvis momentis magnas rerum commutationes efficit, ut tum accidit (83). I need not observe, that nothing is more opposite to the System of Epicurus, than the Hypothesis of Presages and Fortune. Thou speak never so ill of Fortune, though you make her blind, unjust, fickle, capricious, &c. you necessarily admit a Principle distinct from Atoms, endowed with Direction and Will, and which concerns itself with our Affairs (84).

Fear that Cæsar would openly assume the Name of King. This Fear was not ill-grounded [I]. Observe, that, tho' he was naturally bold, and tho' Fortune was very favourable to him, yet he became at last very circumspect; as if he had apprehended, that she would take him for an insatiable, importunate, Man, who deserved to be a little mortified (f). The last Victory, he obtained (g), was That, which cost him most [K]. He had like to have lost it, and was already thinking of killing himself, that he might not fall into the Enemies hands. He gained it during the Bacchanalia (h). That Circumstance puts me in mind of four Verses, which will be seen in the Remark [K].

Perhaps no one has better succeeded, than Salust, in representing Cæsar's Character, which he compared with that of Cato of Utica. He says, among other things, that Cæsar fought great Dignities, noble Enterprizes, and the Command of Armies, to shew the Brightness of his Merit; but that Cato was contented to signalize himself by his Modesty and eminent Virtue, desiring rather to be an honest Man, than seem so [L], and attaining to Glory more surely by the Indifference and this he did to procure himself a good Journey; nor did he begin to make use of this Devotion, till his Coach had like to have been over-set. 'Cæsar rem Dictatorem, post unum ancipitem vehiculi casum, ferunt semper, ut primum confedisset, id quod plerisque nunc facere scimus, carmine ter petito securitatem itinerum aucupari solitum' (89). I infer from all this, that, at most, he could but be a practical Epicurean (90).

[I] The Fear that he would openly assume the name of King --- was not ill grounded. Cæsar's Favourites were proportionably more covetous and insatiable than himself: they designed to procure him the Title of King, only because they hoped to enjoy a greater Power under That new Form of Government. The first thing they did, was to set the Machine of Religion to Work: to feel the Pulse of the People, they spread among them, that the Verses of the Sibyl declared expressly, that, if the Romans sent an Army against the Parthians, commanded by a King, they should subdue them, but that otherwise they would find them always invincible. Afterwards the Favourites tried whether the Romans were sufficiently prepared; for, one Day, when Cæsar returned into the City, they gave him the Name of King. The People murmured at it; then Cæsar, like a wise Man, rejected This Title (91); but he retired, much vexed to see that the People had not contradicted him, when he rejected the Salutation of his Flatterers. The latter were not discouraged; for, during the Lupercalia, Marc Antony, who was Consul, came near Cæsar, and would have put the Diadem upon his Head. Some few suborned Persons gave a Shout, but the People were silent. Cæsar thrust Marc Antony away; then the Applauses of the People made the Place resound. This Attempt of Marc Antony was repeated a little while after, with no better Success. What could not be done on the Original, was done on the Copies. Diadems were put on the Heads of Cæsar's Statues: Two Tribunes of the People caused these Diadems to be taken off, informed against those, who had first given Cæsar the Title of King, and carried them to Prison: The People blessed them for it, and followed them with great Applauses: But Cæsar deposed them from their Offices (92): Therefore all those, who had any drop of Roman Blood in their Veins (93), thought, that no time was to be lost, and desired Brutus to remember, that he bore the Name of him, who expelled Tarquin. See, in Suetonius, to what Cæsar had reduced the Liberty of the Common-Wealth (94). It is certain, as we are told Cæsar himself said, that it was a meer Name: It was a dead Body, or a Skeleton. 'Nec minoris impotentia voces propalam edebat, ut T. Amplus scribit, nihil esse Rempublicam, appellationem modo sine corpore ac specie. Syllam necesse literas, qui Dictaturam deposuerit: debere homines confiderat jam loqui secum ac pro legibus habere quæ dicat' (95). --- Nor with less impotency of Words did he publicly declare, as T. Amplus informs us, that the Common-Wealth was nothing, a Name without a reality: that it was extreme weakness in Sylla to lay down the Dictatorship; and that Men ought to speak now with more caution before him, and receive his Words as Laws.

[K] The last Victory --- was That which cost him most. Fortune shewed herself irresolute in her Conduct: One would have thought, that she examined, whether she should except Cæsar from the general Rule, she is wont to follow; which is, to forsake her Friends, when she has railed them, and to make them pay in one Day for all the Good she did them in many Years. Let us hear Florus: 'Omnium postrema certaminum Munda. Hic non pro cetera felicitate, sed anceps, & diu triste prælium: ut plane videretur nescio quid deliberare fortuna. Sane & ipse ante aciem moerit non ex more Cæsar, five respectu fragilitatis humane, five nimiam prosperorum suspensam habens continuationem: vel eadem timens, postquam idem esse cœperat, quod Pompeius (96). --- Munda was the last of all his Battles. Here, contrary to his former Success, The Fight was long doubtful: inasmuch that Fortune seemed to be in suspense how she should act. And indeed Cæsar himself, at the Head of his Troops, seemed unusually melancholy: whether he considered the uncertainty of human Events, or suspected the continuance of his good Fortune; or that, beginning to be, what Pompey had been, he feared the same Catastrophe. He relates afterwards how Cæsar's Troops began to give way. Novissime illud insitutum *Cæsar*is oculis (nefas) post quatuordecim annos, probata veteranorum manus gradum retro dedit. Quod etsi nondum fugerat, apparebat tamen, pudore magis, quam virtute, resistere. Itaque ablegato equo, similis furenti, primam in aciem procurrit. Ibi prensare fugientes, confirmare; per totum denique agmen oculis, manibus, clamore, volitare. Dicitur in illa perturbatione & de extremis agitalle secum, & ita manifeste vultu fuisse, quasi occupare manu mortem vellet (97). --- At last, the approved Band of Veterans began to give Ground; a fight, which Cæsar's Eyes had been unacquainted with for fourteen Years; and though they did not fly, it was plain they resisted more through shame, than Courage. Quitting his Horse therefore, he ran like a Madman into the foremost ranks; laid hold of, and encouraged, the flying; and flew through the whole Body with his Eyes, Hands, and Voice. He is said, in the midst of That Confusion to have discovered in his Looks a settled Resolution of killing himself. The four Verses, which I am to cite here, were made by Mr Pellissier. I take them out of his Dialogue with Pegasus.

Mais ce fameux Cæsar, qui presque sans combattre
Venoit, voioit, vainquoit, ne le suivois tu pas?
Jamais il n'eut quitté la belle Cleopatre,
Pour aller prendre Dole un jour de Mardi gras.

Did not you follow the famed Cæsar, who, almost without fighting, came, saw and conquered? He would never have left the beautiful Cleopatra, to go and take Dole on a Shrove Tuesday.

Why would he not have left her on such a Day, to take a Town, since, on such a Day, he gave a Battle, which was an hundred times more dangerous than the Siege of a Town would be?

[L] Salust compared the Character of Cæsar with That of Cato --- who desired rather to be an honest Man, than seem so. I am going to copy That Historian's Words. 'His (Cæsari & Caton) genus, ætas, eloquentia prope equalia fuere: magnitudo animi in an Epistle Dedicatory (102), which is otherwise stuffed with nonsense.

[M] He took extraordinary Care to accumulate Riches, and to raise Money under any pretence whatsoever.] Sometimes he exacted several Sums of Money, under pretence, that they had been promised to Pompey. He took the Treasure out of the Temple of Hercules at Tyre, under pretence, that the Tyrians had received Pompey's Wife and Sons in their City. He made Kings and Princes present him with Crowns of Gold, as a Conqueror (103). In a word, when one Reason failed, he knew how to invent another. This Conduct, and These Exactions, did not proceed from a bad Disposition, if Dio thought this was a good Excuse, he argued more like a Warriour and a good Politician, than like a good Citizen. These are his Words: Τῷ τε σύμ- παν εἰπεῖν, χρηματοποιεῖν ἀνὴρ ἐργάζεσθαι, δύνα- τε εἶναι λέγειν καὶ τὰς δυνάμεις παρασκευ- αζοῦν καὶ φυλάσσειν καὶ πεινάζειν, σε- λήναι καὶ χρηματίζειν καὶ ταῦτα ἑὶ ἀλλή- λων συνεκτείνειν. Uique summam ditam, pecuniarum coactio- erat Cæsar, duas esse res dicens quibus et pararentur, et conservarentur et augeretur imperia, nempe milites et pecunia. Eorum alteram per alteram confidere, nam et annona contineri exercitus et eam armis parari, atque alterutro deficiente, reli- quum simul considerare (105). This Historian ob- serves, that Cæsar, being returned into Italy, after the Defeat of Pharnaces, continued his Exactions, sometimes under the Name of a Gift, and some- times under That of a Loan. He borrowed of private Men and Cities, but without any Design to repay, and compelled them to give him Money, as if he had exacted the Payment of a Debt (106)

the fifteenth Day of March 710 [O]. I have observed elsewhere (m), that, tho' it

Some think, he was kept from rising up by Cornelius Balbus; others, that he made no attempt to rise, and even frowned on Caius Trebatius, who put him in mind of getting up. Dion Cassius relates the Matter with all it's Circumstances. One Day, says he (108), as they were deliberating in the Senate about great Honours, which they designed to decree to Julius Caesar, all the Senators Voices, except That of Cassius, and some others, concurred to That Decree; after which, the Company rose up, to carry the News of it to That Emperor, who was sitting in the Porch of the Temple of Venus. He stayed there, that no one should say, his Presence had deprived the Senators of the Liberty of giving their Votes. He did not arise, upon seeing the Senate come to him, but heard what they had to say to him sitting. This made, not only the Senators, but the other Romans, so angry, that it was one of the chief Pretences of those, who formed the Conspiracy against his Person. The Historian does not know whether this Incivility was a fatal stroke of Providence, or the Effect of Caesar's great Joy: Καθήμενος ὁ σπᾶς εἴτ' ἐν θεοβλαβείᾳ τινι εἴτε καὶ περιχαρίᾳ περσσομένης Sedens Senatum excepit, sine fatali quodam errore, sine nimio gaudio correptus (109); but he observes, that no Credit was given to those, who endeavoured to justify it, by saying, that Caesar had then a Looseness upon him, which made him fear to disturb the retentive Faculty by rising up. This Excuse was not admitted; for it was known, that, a little while after, he walked home on foot. So that the Posture, which he had kept, was attributed to his Pride. The Honours, that had been conferred upon him, had made him proud; and, when he was become proud, he was hated. I shall set down the Passage of Dio in Latin only. 'Quod enim nonnulli purgandi Caesaris causa postea attulerunt, profluvio cum ventris laborasse, veritumque, ne inter assurgendum alvum dejiceret, confedisse; id propterea creditum non est, quod paulo post pedibus ipse domum rediit: sed saltu elatum hoc fecisse suspicabantur, eumque superbia nomine odio prosequerantur, quem immo-dicos honores deferendo ipsi superbum reddiderant (110).' The Historian discovers, in these last words, the same desire of criticizing the Senate, that he had already shewn. He had said, that, among the things, which exposed Caesar to the mortal Hatred and Envy that ruined him, the Fault of the Senators was greater, than That of Caesar himself (111). They decreed new exorbitant Honours for him, and then censured him for accepting of them, and growing more proud upon that account. Doubtless he was to blame in not refusing part of them, and in believing, that they were really persuaded, he deserved them (112); but the Senate was yet more to blame: they, who, by conferring those Honours upon him, opened a Precipice for him; for, if he had refused them, he would have passed for a disdainful Man, and he exposed himself to Vanity by accepting of them; since the modestest Persons suffer themselves to be corrupted by That Poison, and fancy they are what they are said to be (113). Τὸ γὰρ ὑπερβαλλόν των τε τιμῶν καὶ των ἐπαίνων χαυνώσκει πῶς καὶ τὸς πάντων σώζοντας, ὥς καὶ των ἐπαίνων ἀλμυρῶς γίνεσθαι δοκᾷσι, ποιεῖ. Nam immoderati honores laudeque levitatem animi etiam modestissimo cuique afferunt, ut se jam talis esse, quales prædicantur, existiment (114).

Let us examine the reason, why they would not believe, that Caesar kept sitting, for fear his Looseness should play him an ill Trick. It seems to me to be groundless; for, though he returned home a little while after on foot, it does not follow, but that he might feel some violent Gripings, at the very moment the Senate came to him. A Looseness is not always equally troublesome. But if this Excuse were well grounded, we should have great reason to admire the oddness of human Events: we might say, that the most considerable, and the most fatal, depend upon Trifles, and are put in motion by the vilest Springs. Caesar would have hastened his

Ruin, because he could not put himself in a civil Posture, by reason of a little Disorder in his Bowels, which, on another occasion, would have been of no consequence, but at that time was of great Importance. The Accident he feared, if he had risen, would have been attended with bad Consequences: he would have been a laughing-stock to all the People of Rome; and the ill-affected would have put a strange Construction upon it. What a Contempt of Religion, and of the Senate! What! in the very Temple of Venus, and in the Presence of the most august Body in the World! The thing might have been rendered so odious in several respects, that it might have caused even a Man, who had well considered all the Consequences of his sitting still, to resolve not to stir out of his Place. Did not Constantine Copronymus draw a most odious and despicable Epithet upon himself, which stains his Memory to this very Day? Did he not become the Object of a hundred Invektives, and injurious Reflections, for having fouled the Baptismal Font without knowing what he did. Impio patri scelestissima successit proles Constantinus cognomento Copronymi, quod infans baptizmi lavacro admotus, mediis sacris alimentis excremento aquam polluerat (115). It would have been much worse, if such a thing had happened to him in a Church, whilst he made War against the Protectors of Images. Such a thing has been at all times looked upon as a great piece of Contempt, or a Subject of Raillery (116). However it be, Caesar's Apologisms might have been better confuted, than by the Reason mentioned by Dion Cassius. They might have been told, that, if that bodily Infirmary had been the Reason, why Caesar did not rise, he should have alleged That Excuse to the Senators. The not having done it, is a sign that he cared but little whether they should think he was wanting in civility towards That august Body, or not; which makes him fall again into the first Inconveniency. We may imagine, that the Senators would have been satisfied with That Reason. Laban, though he was very angry, was satisfied with almost such a like Excuse, when his Daughter received him without rising (117). See here another way of excusing one's self (118). 'One time Cardinal du Perron found himself much perplexed, speaking for the Clergy to the late Queen-Mother; for, being in a Chair, where the Gout forced him to remain before a Princess so full of Majesty, he had a mind to pass a Compliment on her about it, which he had not prepared. Madam, said he to her, I am upon my Knees in my Heart, though you see me sit. — At that Word, perceiving that it was not respectful to name the Part on which he sat, he for a good while sought for some more honourable Expression, and finding none added on my Legs (119).

I have just now read a thing, which may make us doubt of Dio's Discernment: The thing is this. Plutarch observes, that Caesar was very much concerned for the Incivility he had shewed the Senate, and which displeased the People so much (120). 'Nevertheless it is said, adds Plutarch, that, to excuse that Fault, he alleged his Distemper, because the Senses of those, who are subject to the Falling-sickness, when they speak standing before a Company, do not always remain sound, but are easily troubled, and suddenly taken with a dazzling: but this was false (121).' We must believe, for Dio's Honour, that he had read Plutarch. How comes it then to pass, that he says nothing of this Excuse, and alleges another much more unlikely, and somewhat ridiculous?

[O] He was murdered in the Senate, the fifteenth Day of March, 710. Authors do not agree, concerning this Point of Chronology, as to the Year: Some, as Sigonius, Calvisius, &c. say, that Caesar was killed in the Year 709. I have followed their Hypothesis in the Article of Brutus (122), and perhaps also in some other places; but I find Petavius's Opinion more reasonable, that Caesar was killed in 710. It is now the current Opinion. He was Fifty six Years of Age, more or less. They gave him twenty three Blows (123); each of the Conspirators strove to wound him, and in that haste some of them wounded each other (124). They

it should be granted, that there was some Justice in this Act, it cannot be denied but that it was performed at a very improper Time. Seneca, who, because he saw the two greatest Ornaments of the Sect of the Stoics (n) among Cæsar's Enemies, must have been very much inclined to condemn This Usurper, yet blames those, who killed him, and condemns the Blindness, which hindered them from seeing, that, in the state wherein things were (o), they could not hope for the Restoration of Liberty. Ambition and Luxury had so long made Rome a Stage of Disorders and violent Confusions (p), that a Monarchical Government was become a necessary Evil. The wisest Men had foreseen, that such a Corruption of Laws and Manners would end in a Crisis, which would be a Revolution of State. The same Seneca observes, that Cæsar had united and incorporated himself in such a manner with the Republic, that no Separation could be made, without spoiling and ruining all [P]. It is very certain, that he alone could repair the Evils which the Roman People had suffered; and, if it be pretended, that Cicero did not consider what he said, when he affirmed it; it must also be acknowledged, that he ought to have considered of what he said on this Occasion [Q]. Something must be said thought their Action would have been approved by the People; but they had reason to question it the very next Day; for the People kept a very profound Silence, when they heard what had been done. The Senate removed their Fears, since, by conferring on the one hand divine Honours upon Cæsar, they granted on the other many Advantages to the Conspirators: but Cæsar's Funeral Pomp spoiled all. Marc Antony made a Speech, which exasperated those, who were present, to such a degree, that they went to burn the Conspirators Houses, and fought after them all over the Town, to cut them in pieces. That, which affected them most was, that he shewed them Cæsar's Tunick full of Holes, and bloody (125). Plutarch, and his Copier Appian, affirm it: but other Historians do not mention That Circumstance. Cicero, reproaching Marc Antony for That Day's Proceedings, says nothing of That Particular. 'Etsi tum cum optimum te putabant, me quidem dissentiente, funeri tyranni illius sceleratissime præfuiti. Tua illa pulchra laudatio, tua miseratio, tua cohortatio, tu illas faces incendisti, & eas quibus semivultus ille est, & eas quibus incensa L. Bellieni domus deflagavit. Tu illos impetus perditorum hominum, & ex maxima parte servorum, quos nos vi manique repulimus, in nostras domos immisisti (126). — Though even then, when I had the best Opinion of you, you had the Balaenae, against my Consent, to appear at the Head of the Tyrant's Funeral. It was you, who spoke his Funeral Oration, who pitted his Fate, who excited the Populace to revenge his Death, who blew up That Fire, by which he was half consumed, and which destroyed the House of L. Bellienus. It was you, who spirited up the Mob, consisting of the most profligate Persons, and chiefly of Slaves, whom we forcibly repelled, to pull down our Houses.' And note, that Suetonius is so far from mentioning it, that he gives us to understand, that Marc Antony made no Funeral Oration. 'Laudationis loco consul Antonius per præconem pronuntiavit S. C. quo omnia ei divina simul atque humana decreverat: item iurjurandum, quo secundi pro salute unius adstrinxerant: quibus perpaucæ a se verba addidit (127). — Instead of a Funeral Oration, the Consul Antony pronounced, by a public Crier, the Edict of the Senate, decreeing him all human and divine Honours: as also the Oath, by which they had all bound themselves, for the safety of one: to which he added a very few words of himself.' Is it not strange, that he could doubt of a thing, which Cicero had affirmed in full Senate, whilst the thing was yet fresh? Many Observations might be made on the Differences, which are found among Historians. I am much surprised, that Cassiodorus (128) pretends to confirm Suetonius's Narrative by the Testimony of Appian; for it is plain, Appian says, that Marc Antony made a very long Speech (129).

[P] Seneca remarks, that Cæsar had so united and incorporated himself with the Republic, that he could not be separated from it, without — ruining all. These are his Words: Olim ita se induit Reip. Cæsar ut seduci alterum non possit, sine utriusque perniciæ, nam ut illi viribus opus, ita & huic capite (130). This is the Conclusion of several fine Maxims, which he had just before laid down about the Obedience of Subjects. They were mentioned in a Book, which a French Royalist published against the Leaguers in the Year 1593. 'Nec solum propter iram, id est metu pœnæ, illis obediendum est, sed propter conscientiam, quia nimirum omnes scire oportet, id ex divina voluntate & constitutione fieri debere. Quod etiam Ethnici agnoverunt, inter quos illo sæculo quo D. Paulus scripsit, hæc sapiens Philosophus dicebat. Principes Regesque & quocunque alio nomine sunt, tutores status publici, amandos etiam ultra privatas necessitudines. Et olim, inquit, ita se induit Reip. Cæsar, &c. (131). — Ille enim est vinculum per quod Reipubl. coheret: ille spiritus vitalis, quem hæc tot millia trahunt, nihil ipsa per se futura, nisi unus & præda, si mens illa imperii subtrahatur. — Nor are we to obey for Wrath only, that is through fear of Punishment, but for Conscience sake: since every one ought to know, that the Will and Institution of God has made it our Duty. This the very Heathens acknowledged, among whom a learned Philosopher, at the time when St Paul wrote, said, that Princes and Kings, and Governors of all Denominations, as being Guardians of the Public Weal, are intitled to our Affection, even beyond the private Ties of Friendship. And formerly, said he, Cæsar so incorporated himself with the Republic, &c. — For this it what connects and keeps together the several Parts of a Common-Wealth: This is the vital Spirit, which so many thousands breathe, who would of themselves be nothing but a burden and a Prey to each other, were this Soul of Government withdrawn.' These Words are found in the Seventy fifth Page of a Book, intitled, Vindiciæ secundum libertatem Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ, & Regii status Gallofrancorum, sub Henrico IV. Rege Francorum & Navarra. L. S. A. R. It is thought, that these four Letters signify, Ludovicus Servinus Advocatus Regius.

[Q] He alone could repair the Misfortunes of the Roman People. — Cicero, who affirms this, ought to have considered what he said on this Occasion. I shall set down some Passages of his Oration for Marcellus. 'Quis est omnium tam ignarus rerum, tam rudis in republica, tam nihil unquam nec de sua nec de communi salute cogitans, qui non intelligat tua salute contineri suam, & ex unius tua vitam pendere omnium? — si ad humanos casus incertoque eventus valetudinis, sceleris etiam accedat insidiarumque consensus: quem deum, etiam si cupiat, optulari posse reip. credamus? Omnia sunt excitanda tibi, C. Cæsar, uni, quæ jacerent sentis, belli ipsius impetu, quod necesse fuit, perculsa, atque prostrata: constituenda judicia, revocanda fides, comprimendæ libidines, propaganda soboles: omnia, quæ dilapsa jam defluerunt, feveris legibus vincienda sunt. Non fuit reculandum in tanto civili bello, tantoque animorum ardore, & armorum, quin quassata resp. quicunque belli eventus fuisset, multa perderet & ornamenta dignitatis, & præsidia stabilitatis suæ, multaque uterque dux faceret armatus, quæ idem togatus fieri prohibuisset. DERI NEMO POTES. — For who is so totally ignorant, so little versed in public Affairs, and so regardless of his own, and the common Safety, as not to be sensible, that his own Security is contained in yours, and that the Lives of all depend on yours alone? — Should Villany and Treachery conspire with the Uncertainty of human Events, and of Health, what God can we think powerful enough, though he should be willing, to save the State? You alone, C. Cæsar, must raise us from the fallen Condition, to which the Violence of War has necessarily reduced us, must settle our Courts of Justice, restore public Credit, suppress Vice, increase the number of our People, and restrain the dissoluteness of our Manners by wholesome Laws. In so great a Civil-War, and during such violent Commotions, the shattered Commonwealth must necessarily, be the Event what it will, lose many Ornaments of her Dignity, and Support of her Security; and both Generals must necessarily do, when in Arms, what they would both prohibit when in Peace. All which Wounds of War are now to be healed by you; for YOU ALONE CAN HEAL THEM.

In all likelihood, if Cæsar had lived ten Years longer, he would have done the finest Things in the World for the Glory and Prosperity of the Roman People. He was killed in the midst of the greatest Projects, that a sublime Genius, and an heroic Courage could undertake (112).

[R] Something must be said of Cæsar's Family, and against those who are not well acquainted with the Reason why he bore That Name (113).] He was of the Family Julia, which pretended to be descended from Venus, by Æneas the Son of Anchises and of That Goddess. We shall see, elsewhere (114), the Care that was taken to keep up the Tradition of This Original of Julius Cæsar. The Posterity of Æneas, the Son of Æneas and Creusa, and surnamed Julus, subsisted in Alba, till that Town was ruined by Tullius Hostilius, King of Rome. That Prince transported it to Rome, where it prospered. It does not appear, that it formed above two chief Branches there; the first bore the Surname of Tullius, the other That of Cæsar. The Persons of the first Branch, who begin to appear in History, are Caius Julius Tullus, and Vapiscus Julius Tullus. The first was Consul in the Year of Rome 265, and Decemvir in the Year 300. The last was Consul in the Year 271. The most ancient Cæsars, that are to be found, had some Dignities in the eleventh Year of the first Punic War, that is to say, in the Year of Rome 546. From that time Cæsars appear very frequently in the Offices of the Republic, till Caius Julius Cæsar, the Emperor's Father. He was the Son of another Caius Julius Cæsar, whose History is unknown; it appears only, that he was married to Martia, who descended from the Family of King Ancus Martius (115). He had three Children, two Sons and one Daughter, who was the Wife of Marius: The two Sons, Caius Julius Cæsar, and Lucius Julius Cæsar did not rise above the Pretorship, dying in the Flower of their Age, and in a singular manner: for both of them died as they were putting on their Stockings in the Morning, Caius at Pisa, and Lucius at Rome, where he exercised the Dignity of Pretor. 'Nullis evidentibus causis obiere, dum calciantur matutino, duo Cæsares, Prætor, & prætura perfunctus Dictatoris Cæsaris pater, hic Pisis exanimatus, ille Romæ (116). Caius married Aurelia, and had one Son and some Daughters by her. The Son is He, who makes the Subject of this Article. He was born at Rome, the twelfth of the Month Quintilis (117) 653, and lost his Father in the Year 669. I have taken this from a Book, which contains a large Account of the Family Julia (118). You will not find the Passage of Suetonius there, which shews from what Nobility this Family pretended to be descended, and with what Eloquence Cæsar knew how to express it. Here is the Passage: 'Questor Juliam amitam, uxoremque Corneliæ, defunctas laudavit è more pro Rostris: sed in amitæ quidem laudatione, de ejus ac patris sui utraque origine sic refert: Amittæ meæ Julia maternum genus ab regibus ortum, paternum cum diis immortalibus conjunctum est. Nam ab Anco Marcio sunt Marcii Reges, quo nomine fuit mater: à Venere Julii, cujus gentis familia est nostra. Est ergo in genere & sanctitas regum, qui plurimum inter homines pollent: & ceremonia deorum, quorum ipsi in potestate sunt reges (119). — During his Questorship, according to custom, he pronounced the Funeral Orations of his Aunt Julia, and his Wife Cornelia: but, in the Elogy of his Aunt, he gives this Account of his own and his Father's Origin on both sides. The maternal Race of my Aunt sprung from Kings, the paternal from the Immortal Gods. For the Marcii, being Kings, descended from Ancus Marcius, which Name my Mother bore; The Julii from Venus, of whose Race is our Family. There are therefore in our Race both the Sanctity of Kings, who have the greatest Power among Men, and the Ceremonies of the Gods, to whose Power Kings themselves are subject. Suetonius speaks here of the Death of Cornelia, Cæsar's Wife. On this Occasion, let us say something of This Emperor's Marriages. He had been betrothed to a very rich Maid, whose Name was Cossutia, while he yet wore the Toga Virilis; but he soon repudiated her. Afterwards he married Cornelia, the Daughter of Lucius Cornelius Cinna, and would never put her away, tho' it was dangerous for him not to yield to the pressing Solicitations of Sylla, who desired it (120). He had a Daughter by her, who was Pompey's Wife. His third Wife's Name was Pompeia (121): and she placed him in the same Category, where in he had put so many other Husbands. She was beloved by Clodius, and loved him reciprocally; but Cæsar, and his Mother Aurelia, a Lady of great Virtue, watched her Conduct so narrowly, that Clodius was obliged to seek an Opportunity to come to her, whilst the Mysteries of the Bona Dea were celebrating in Cæsar's House: He disguised himself in Women's Cloaths, and got in with the Crowd; but he was discovered. This Business made a great Noise: Cæsar divorced his Wife, under Pretence, as he said (122), that he would not have his House so much as suspected; but, at the bottom, he did not question, but that his Wife had plaid the Trick (123). Οὐτὸς ἡρα Πομπηίας τῆς Καίσαρος γυναῖκος, ἐδὲ αὐτῆς ἀκούσης. Ἀλλὰ φυλάκας τῆς γυναικωνίτιδος ἀκριβῆς ἦσαν, ἢ τε μήτηρ τῆς Καίσαρος, Ἀυρηλία, γυνὴ σώφρων, περικύσασα τὴν νύμφην αὐτῇ, χαλεπὴν καὶ παρασκευασμένην ἀνδρὶ τοιοῦτον τὴν ἐκσωθῆναι. Hic (Clodius) uxorem Cæsaris Pompeiam amabat neque invitam. Verum mulierem Cæsar acriter sequebatur: custodia, ejusque mater Aurelia, famina honesta, perpetuo lateri adherens Pompeia, arduum & periculosum ejus congressum efficiebat (124). After this he married Calpurnia, the Daughter of Piso, and died before her.

He thought the Surname of Cæsar was given to our Caius Julius, the Dictator, either because he was taken out of his Mother's Womb, by a surgical Operation, or because his Grand-father had killed an Elephant. 'Vel quod avus ejus in Africa manu propria occidit Elephantem, qui Cæsar dicitur.' Penorum lingua (127). — Or because his Grand-father, being in Africa, with his own hand had killed an Elephant, which, in the Punic Language, is called Cæsar. Neither of these Reasons are of any force, since there were some Cæsars in Rome among the Ancestors of our Cæsar, from the time of the first Punic War. I have observed the Cause of This Mistake (153).

[S] A Supplement concerning his Commentaries. I was contented to observe, in the first Edition (154), that Vossius has shewed, that Julius Cæsar is the true Author of the Commentaries, which are attributed to him; but, at present, I intend to enlarge on this Subject. Francis Floridus Sabinus maintained, that the three Books of the Civil-War were not written by Julius Cæsar (155). Another maintained the same thing, concerning the seven Books of the War against the Gauls (156). Vossius observes, that Lewis Caduceus (157) ascribed them to Suetonius. But these are groundless Opinions, which we can solidly refute by the Authority of ancient Authors, without insisting on the Answer that might be given, viz. that Those Books of Cæsar are lost since the ancient Writers have cited them. They, who think, that besides the Commentaries, that are still extant, Cæsar had composed Ephemerides, which are lost, are much more in the right: It was a Journal of his Life. Servius has extracted from it a very singular Event. 'Caius Cæsar, says he (158), cum dimisit caret in Gallia, & ab hoste raptus equo ejus portaretur armatus, occurrit quidam ex hostibus, qui eum nosset, & insultans ait, Cecos Cæsar: quod Gallorum lingua, Dimitte, significat: & ita factum est, ut dimitteretur. Hoc autem ipse Cæsar in Ephemeride sua dicit, ubi propriam commemorat felicitatem. — Cæsar, during the War in Gaul, being taken by the Enemy, as they were carrying him away, armed, on Horseback, one of the Enemy, who knew him, came up, and, insulting, said, Cecos Cæsar; which, in the Language of the Gauls, signifies Let go; and by this means he was let go. Cæsar himself mentions this in his Ephemerides wherein he gives an Account of his good Fortune.' It is very likely, that, when Plutarch quoted Cæsar's Ephemeris (159), he did not mean the Commentaries, but the same Work, to which Servius refers us. I know what he alludes in that Place, is to be found in the fourth Book of Cæsar's Commentaries; but it was impossible for That Warrior not to mention very often the same Things both in his Journal, and, in his Commentaries. We may therefore affirm, that Plutarch had at that time the Ephemeris in View, and that, if he intended to have alleged the Commentaries, he would have made use of the Word ὑπομνήματα, as Strabo had done (160). We may likewise affirm, that Appian cited the same Ephemeris in these Words: Καίσαρ ἐν ταῖς ἰδίαις ἀναγεγραμμέναις τῶν ἐπὶ μέσων ἐργῶν ἐν τοῖς (161). It is besides very likely, that Polyænus had perused them; for he mentions divers Stratagems of Cæsar, which are not contained in the Commentaries. The same may be said of Frontinus. See the Remarks of Dionysius Vossius (162), printed in 1697, with Cæsar's Commentaries, and with a Book, entitled, Julius Cæsar de vita & rebus gestis C. Julii Cæsaris (a), and which was printed in the Year 1473. It was so scarce, that the Author of the Notes on Cæsar's Commentaries in usum Delphini, could find no Copy of it in Paris. Mr Grævius thinks that the Author of that Book lived in the XIIIth or XIIIth Century (163). Note, that some believe that Orosius ascribes Cæsar's Commentaries to Suetonius, in these Words: 'Hanc historiam de Cæsaris bello Gallico Suetonius Tranquillus plenissime explicuit, cujus nos competentes portunculas decerpimus (164). — This History (of Cæsar's War in Gaul) has been fully explained by Suetonius Tranquillus, from which I have borrowed large Passages.' It is Savaro's Opinion, as appears by his manner of commenting on the Quis opera Suetonii of Sidonius Apollinaris, 'Id est, says he (165), vitam Julii Cæsaris, & libros de bello Gallico quos Suetonius asserit Orosius lib. 6. cap. 7. & ex eo Hist. Miscell. lib. 6. ita visum est Lodoico Caduceo mihi propter eruditionem & humanitatem amicissimo, in cujus commilitio multum me profecisse libere fateor. — The Life of Julius Cæsar, and the Books de Bello Gallico, which Orosius ascribes to Suetonius; as also does Lewis Caduceus, whom I greatly esteem for his Learning and Humanity, and in whose Company I freely profess to have greatly improved.' Perhaps it were better to say, that Suetonius had written a particular Book concerning the War against the Gauls, and that it is from thence that Orosius took what he had collected. The Abbot de Marolles has not reported right what he had read in Vossius, from whom, nevertheless, he very faithfully copies the Fault, which I have observed (166). Lewis Caduceus — bolds, that the seven Books, of the Wars of Gaul, are the Work of Suetonius, which he proves by these Words, in the seventh Chapter of his sixth Book. Suetonius, says he, has fully explained This in his History of the Wars of Cæsar in Gaul. This is what the Abbot de Marolles says (167). Do not his Words signify, that his pretended Lewis Caduceus published a Work which contains at least six Books? Is it not to put the Bibliographers upon a fruitless Enquiry? I know but three French Translations of Cæsar's Commentaries; That of Stephen de l'Aigue, That of Blaise de Vigenere, and That of Mr d'Abblancourt. The first was printed in the Year 1531 (168). The second appeared in 1576, and was accompanied with a pretty learned Commentary. It was re-printed in the Year 1609, with some marginal Notes of Antony de Baudouin, who also added his Parallel of Cæsar and Henry IV to it. Mr d'Abblancourt's Translation was printed the first time about the Year 1651, if I am not mistaken.

CETHEGUS, a Roman Family, and a Branch of the Family Cornelia, produced several Persons, whose Memory has been preserved. I shall speak of some of them. Cornelius CETHEGUS, created Consul with Quintus Flaminius, distributed mixed Wine to the People after his Election was over (a). These two Consuls were obliged to lay down their Offices, because there was some Irregularity in their Creation. This happened in the Year of Rome 421 (b). Marcus Cornelius CETHEGUS was raised to the Office of Censor in the Year 544, before he was Consul: which was against the common Practice [A]. He obtained the

[A] M. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS was — Censor — before he had been Consul: which was against the common Practice. This may be inferred from these Words of Pliny: 'Censores hic annus (1) habuit L. Veturium Philonem, & P. Licinium Crassum, pontificem maximum. Crassus Licinius nec Consul, nec Prætor ante fuerat quam Censor esset factus: ex ædilitate gradum ad censuram fecit (2). — This Year, L. Veturius Philo, and P. Licinius Crassus, Pontifex Maximus, were Censors. Licinius Crassus had neither been Consul, nor Pretor, when he was elected Censor; he rose from the Edileship to the Censorship.' It seems to me, that Livy would not have made this Observation, if it had not been an extraordinary thing for a Man to obtain the Censorship, before he had been Consul. The following Year, they were obliged to proceed to the Creation of other Censors; for, one of these being dead, his Colleague laid down his Office (3). They, who were chosen, the Consulship five Years after. He was a great Orator [B]. Caius Cornelius CETHEGUS, who, before he was Ædile, was Pro-Consul in Spain, obtained a signal Victory there (c). Soon after, he was made Ædile, during his Absence, in the Year 555 (d). Sigonius confounds him with Cneius Cornelius CETHEGUS (e), who was Consul in 556, and triumphed over the Insuæres (f). He supposes falsely, that Cicero and Livy give That Consul the Prænomen of Caius; for they give him That of Cneius. I come now to Publius Cornelius CETHEGUS, who zealously followed Marius's Party against Sylla (g), and who was declared Enemy of the Roman People upon That Account (h), when That Party was destroyed. He fled into Africa to Marius (i), and afterwards implored Sylla's Mercy, and offered to serve him in every thing (k). He was received into Favour; and perhaps he is not to be distinguished from That CETHEGUS, who had so great a Credit in Rome, that nothing could be obtained without him: Now, as he had a Mistress, to whom he could refuse nothing, it happened that an unchaste Woman had the whole Town at her Disposal. Lucullus was obliged to make his Court to this Woman [C], to obtain the Commission of making War against Mitridates; for, without had not yet been Consuls; Livy says so in express Words. 'Creati censores ambo qui nondum consules fuerant, M. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Sempronius Tuditanus (4). — M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, were chosen Censors, neither of whom had been Consul.' [B] He was a great Orator.] Considering the Time he lived in; for, if he had been compared with the Orators of the following Ages, he would have appeared an unpollite and barbarous Orator. See here what Cicero said of him: 'Quem vero extet & de quo fit memorie proditum eloquentem fuisse & ita esse habitum, primus est M. Cornelius Cethegus; cujus eloquentie est auctor, & idoneus quidem mea sententia, Q. Ennius, præsertim cum & ipse eum audiverit, & scribat de mortuo: ex quo nulla suspicio est, amicitie causa esse mentium: Est igitur sic apud illum in nono, ut opinor, annali (5). — M. Cornelius Cethegus is the first, whom we certainly know to have been an Orator; of whose Eloquence Q. Ennius is a proper Evidence, having been his Hearer, and writing concerning him when dead: whence we cannot suspect him to have falsified through Friendship. Thus therefore he writes, in the ninth Annal, if I remember right.' The Verses of Ennius, quoted by Cicero, and which I dif-tingle from what he inserts between them, are these:

Additur orator Cornelius suaviloquenti
Ore Cethegus Marci Tuditano Collega,
Marci filius, is dictus popularibus ollis
Qui tum vivebant homines, atque ævum agitabant, Flos delibatus populi, suadæque medulla.

— Add to these the Orator M. Cornelius Cethegus, Son of Marcus, and Colleague of Tuditanus, called, by the Men of those Times, The Flower of the People, and Marrow of Persuasion.

He observes in another Place, that This Orator, when grown old, continued to employ his Talent with an extraordinary Application (6).

[C] One of the Cethegi — had a Mistress, to whom he could refuse nothing — Lucullus was obliged to make his Court to That Woman.] To know the Character of This Cethegus, we need only read these Words of Plutarch (7); 'Lucullus — thought, that, if Cæsar (8) returned to Rome — he could easily do, and obtain, what he would; especially considering, that Cethegus, who had at that Time all the Credit and Vogue in the Management of Affairs in Rome, because he humoured the Common People in every thing, had a Peek against him, who hated his Behaviour, and way of living, as being a Man abandoned to all manner of Vice and Dissoluteness (9): for which reason he was a professed Enemy to This Cethegus.' Plutarch adds, that the Government of Cilicia being vacant, divers Persons made Interest for it, and courted Cethegus as the Man, who could, better than any One else, procure it to whom he pleased. Lucullus, hoping that, if he obtained it, he should also have the Commission of making War against Mitridates, resolved to use all his Power, and to try every thing, to prevent any other from obtaining it besides himself: and, after having tried all other Expedients, he was at last forced, against his Nature, to have recourse to a Method, which was neither fair nor honest, but indeed the most proper, he could have found, to attain the end he desired. At that Time, there was a Woman in Rome, whose Name was Præcia, very famous, as well for her Beauty, as for her genteel and pleasant way of Talking, but otherwise as little chaste, as those, who made a public Trade of their Body: but, so far as the made use of the Credit and Favour of those, who kept her Company, and discoursed with her, to promote the Affairs, and the Party of those, whom she loved, she was commonly reported (besides the other Charms and commendable Qualities she had) to be a courtly Woman, and fit, by her secret Practices, to bring a Design to a happy Conclusion; which gave her a great Reputation. But, when she had gained Cethegus, who had at that time all the Vogue, and managed all the Affairs of the Public at his Pleasure, and who grew so much in love with This Woman, that he could not live without her; then all the Power and Authority of the City of Rome was in her Hands; because nothing was done by the People but what Cethegus desired, and Cethegus desired nothing, but what Præcia commanded him. Wherefore Lucullus resolved to gain her, and to insinuate himself into her Favour by Presents, and all sorts of Caresses he could devise; besides that it was already a great Advantage to an ambitious and haughty Woman, as she was, to see herself courted by such a Person as Lucullus, who by that means came to have Cethegus immediately at his Command; for he made it his Business afterwards to praise him in all the Assemblies of the People, and to procure him the Government of Cilicia, which being once granted him, he stood no more in need of Præcia's Assistance, nor of That of Cethegus; for all the People, of their own accord, unanimously conferred upon him the Office of making War against Mitridates, as one, who could discharge it better than any other Captain.

Is it not a melancholy consideration, that so Illustrious a Man, and so worthy to command the Roman Army against Mitridates, and who acquitted himself of it with so much Glory, could not obtain That Employment, without stooping to court a Lady of Pleasure! If there had been a Juvenal at that Time, would he not have found it a sufficient Reason to exercise his satirical Wit? Would he not have said;

Difficile est Satiram non scribere, nam quis inique
Tam patiens urbis, tam ferreus, ut teneat se (10)? (10) Juven. Sat. 1, ver. 30.

'Tis difficult from Satire to refrain,
When such vile Practices Rome's Glory stain.

The worst of all is, that such Disorders have been revived a thousand times in all Parts of the World. This way to Preferment has always been practised: It has raised to a great Fortune those, who were unworthy of it, and even those, who deserved it.

Many

out it, he could not have obtained That noble Employ. Several other great Men did a thousand mean Things, to get Preferments by the Recommendation of this Cethegus; for doubtless it is He, whom Cicero speaks of in one of his Paradoxes [D]. He mentions one Cethegus an Orator, who, probably, does not differ from This Woman's Gallant [E]. CAIUS CORNELIUS CETHEGUS was convicted of

Many have carried an unjust Cause by this means; and some, who had a just Cause, would have lost it without such a Support. People sometimes wonder to see some Men rise fast to eminent Dignities: They do not ascend by Degrees, but fly from the lowest to the middle, and from that to the highest. For what reason? will People say; What has he done? Though he be a deserving Man, he neither equals, nor excels, such and such, who remain a long time in the same Stations? The Solution of all this is, that some powerful Woman protects him, by the Credit she has gained, and which she preserves at the Expence of her Virtue. The same Complaints will be made a thousand Years hence, if the World continues so long; and, as a private Man is not able to reform this Confusion, it will be found (11), that Prudence may permit him to make use of it, as Lucullus did; and, if an Ambassador scruples to take Advantage of it, he will be blamed. Mr Leti, speaking of the Caprices, which may hinder an Ambassador from serving his Prince well, relates two Examples of it. A Spanish Ambassador, at the Court of Rome, under Urban VIII, having received Orders to discover the Intrigues of Cardinal Antonio, learned from a Roman Abbot, that there was but one way to lead him to it. He would not take it, because he must have flattered a Mistress of That Cardinal; and he gained but little light into the Secret. I shall set down Mr Leti's own Words. 'Ad ogni modo stimava difficile di penetrar quelle del Cardinal Antonio, e perche era ben servito da' suoi Domestici, e perche non mancava di precautioni; ma come questo Cardinale era idolatra delle Femine, che credeva potesse assai servire il mezzo della Cadora gran Favorita allora del Cardinale, & accio meglio facilitasse l'Abbate all' Ambasciatore il cammino, gli mostrò i mezzi per ottenere da questa Cortegiana quanto si voleva. Turbosi non poco di questa proposta l'Ambasciatore, rispondendo che questa non era proposizione a farsi da un' Abbate Romano, ad un' Ambasciatore Spagnolo; che vi andava della sua coscienza, e della grandezza della Monarchia, Pincenjar le Puttane, e ch'era per abbracciare ogni altro mezzo fuori che questo, e così il Cardinale fece il fatto suo con la Francia, nè mai all' Ambasciatore venne in cognizione che la scorta de' trattati (12). — Particularly, he conceived it difficult to penetrate the Intrigues of Cardinal Antonio, both because he was faithfully served by his Domestics, and used Precaution: but, as this Cardinal idolized Women, the Abbot thought, that by the help of Cadora, at that time in great Favour with the Cardinal, he might facilitate the Ambassador's Affair, and he put him in a way of obtaining what he pleased from that Mistress. The Ambassador was not a little shocked at this Proposal; answering, that this was not a Proposition to be made from a Roman Abbot to a Spanish Ambassador; that it was inconsistent with his Conscience, and the Grandeur of the Monarchy, thus servilely to court the favour of an Harlot; and thus the Cardinal did his business with France, without the Ambassador's being able to come at the Secret.' The other Example is of a fresher Date; it is That of a Spanish Ambassador in England in the Reign of Charles II. You will find, in the following Words, what Advice was given him, and his Answer to it. 'Parlando questo con un Milord suo grande Amico, e d'antico tempo divoto à quella Corona, sopra i mezzi che fossero più propri à tirare il Rè d'Inghilterra ad abbracciare all' aperta con pronti soccorsi la protection della Fiandra, il Milord si lasciò dire, che tutti i rimedi eran buoni, ma che stimava quello della Porcbemouth Favorita del Rè il migliore: l'Ambasciatore con certe Radomontate Spagnole che tal volta gli saltano addosso quasi sdegnato gli rispose: Milord amarei meglio che il mio Rè perdesse la metà del corpo della sua Monarchia, che di conservarne un membro col favore d'una Cortegiana. Il medesimo Milord me lo riferì à me, anzi mi disse, che gli aggiunse, e per me dà risoluta più tosto di non far niente, che molto con questo mezzo. E veramente niente egli ha fatto: ma però il Barillon Ambasciatore Francese non ha lasciato di far tutto, e con qual mezzo non voglio saperlo, so bene ch'egli è saggio, e prudente (13). — This Person, talking with an English Lord, his great Friend, who had formerly been devoted to That Crown, about the most proper means of drawing the King of England openly to espouse the Protection of Flanders, by an immediate Assistance; the Lord answered, that all Methods were good, but that he looked upon that of the Duchess of Portsmouth, the King's Mistress, to be the best. The Ambassador, with a sort of Spanish Rhodomontade, answered in disdain; My Lord, I had rather my King should loose half his Dominions, than preserve any part of them by the favour of a Courtezian. And indeed he did nothing. However Barillon the French Ambassador succeeded in every thing. What means he employed, I do not concern myself about: I know him to be a wise and prudent Man.'

We shall see hereafter (14) in a fine Passage of Cicero, how the Unhappiness of those Times is to be lamented, wherein Justice is obliged to be supported by the Credit of a Courtezian.

[D] Cicero speaks of him in one of his Paradoxes. It is in that, wherein he shews that none but wise Men live free from Servitude (15). He observes, that the ambitious did many Things, which were true Slavery. They made Presents to Cethegus; they went to him by Night, and made Supplications to him. 'Illa cupiditas quæ videtur esse liberalior honoris, imperii, provinciarum, quam dura est domina! quam imperiosa! quam vehementis! Cethego homini non probatissimo servire coegit eos, qui sibi esse amplissimi videbantur; munera mittere, noctu venire domum ad eum, precari, denique supplicare; quæ servitus est, si hæc libertas exstimari potest (16)? — That Thirst (which seems the more generous) of Honour, and Power, how hard, how imperious, how vehement a Mistress is it! It compelled those, who thought themselves of the noblest, to cinge to Cethegus, to send him Presents, to wait on him by Night, to petition, and even supplicate him: if this can be thought Liberty, what is Servitude? This whole Passage is so fine, that it could not be abridged without Prejudice to the Reader.

[E] — and of one Cethegus an Orator, who, probably, does not differ from This Woman's Gallant. See here how Cicero speaks of him. 'Ejus (17) æqualis P. Cethegus, cui de republica satis suppetabat Oratio: totam enim tenebat eam, penitusque cognorat; itaque in senatu consularium auctoritatem assequatur, sed in causis publicis nihil, privatis satis, veterator videbatur (18). — At the same time with him, (the Orator Julius Cæsar) lived P. Cethegus, who spoke well on Public Affairs; for he thoroughly understood them: in the Senate therefore he had the Influence of Consular Persons; but, in public Causes, he was thought no crafty Advocate; in private Causes, enough so. If I am not mistaken, it is the same Cethegus, whom he mentions, in his Plea for Cluentius (19), as having endeavoured to remove one Stalenus from Public Affairs, or who for other Reasons had given him ill Advice. Africanus Peditanus confirms what Cicero observes concerning This Man's Credit; for he pretends, that Marc Antony, (he, who obtained so general an Authority over all the Sea-Coasts) was promoted by the Consul Cotta, and by the Faction of Cethegus. 'Hic est M. Antonius, says he (20), qui gratia Cottæ Consulis & Cethegi factione in senatu curationem infinitam nactus totius oræ maritimæ, &c. I do not think that this whole Passage is true; for, according to Paterculus (21), That Commission was conferred, two Years before Pompey obtained one like it, Now Pompey obtained it in the Year of Rome 686, and no Cotta is to be found in the Consulship, of having conspired against his Country, with Catiline; and, as such, he was strangled in the Prison (l). He represents the Cethegi here as stout and laborious Men, who had retained the ancient Manner of their Fathers in their Cloaths, who, slighting the Tunic, as too troublesome, wore only a kind of an Apron, which served them for Drawers from the Girdle downward; and wore their Toga over it; so that the Lappet, which they threw over the left Shoulder, and which reached behind the Back, served them for a Girdle, and left the right Arm quite naked; and this is what was properly called Cinctus Gabinus, which was common to the Consuls and the Pretors, when they performed their Functions (30). We learn from Silius Italicus, that it was a thing peculiar to That Family.

CHABOT

CHABOT (PETER GUALTHERUS) a learned Humanist, born at Sainloup in Poitou, in 1516 [A], was the Son of an Oil-man. He studied Latin at Sainloup; and, at Twenty four Years of Age, he went to Poitiers to study Greek there. He was soon re-called to instruct the Youth in his Country. He taught six Years there; after which he went to Paris (a), to perform his Course of Philosophy in the College of Préle under Omer Talom. Having spent three Years and a half in that Study, he took his Degree of Master of Arts, and began to teach. He had many young Men of good Families for his Scholars, and acquired such a Reputation of a good Tutor, that the Chancellor de l'Hospital resolved to have him at his Country-House, to entrust him with the Education of his Grandsons (b). The Thing was proposed to him by Peter Ramus, and John Mercerus, Royal Professors. Chabot accepted That Place, and held it Twelve Years; Five Years in That Chancellor's Life-time, and Seven after his Death (c). His chief Employment was the Explication of Horace [B]. He bestowed all the Fruits of his Studies on That Poet. He was a good moral Man, and bore patiently the plundering of his Goods three times during the Civil Wars. He always dearly loved a very solitary Life [C], and lived above eighty Years (d). He died about the Year 1597. I have read in a good Author (e), that he had been Professor in the University of Paris; but Boissard's Silence makes me question it.

(a) He went thither in the Month of October, 1546.

(b) They were six: their Father, called M^r de Be-lebat, was of the Family of Hu-rant, and had married that Chancellor's Daughter.

(c) He died in the Year 1573.

(e) In the Preface to the Greek Method of Dom Lancelot, p. 22.

[A] He was born in 1516. Boissard, who held a very intimate Correspondence with him, could not, however, inform us of the Day or Month, wherein he was born. He enquired for exactly about it, that he had a mind to know the very Hour, to insert it in his Elogys, as the Germans use to do (1). But he could only discover, that Chabot's Relations and Neighbours had been heard to say, that he was born in the Year 1516. Fando tantum à propinquis multisque vicinis est receptum, ipse ortum sub 1516 cecidisse (2). Note that some call him Gualtherus, as if it was his true Name, and not Chabotius (3). But he is more known by the last Name, which was that of his Mother, than by the other, which was That of his Father.

[B] His chief Employment was the Explication of Horace. The Method of his Commentary is not very common. It contains the Analysis of the Text, as well according to the Rules of Grammar, as according to Those of Rhetoric and Logic. I shall repeat here, what I have said in my Proleg, on occasion of a Passage, which may be seen above (4), and is somewhat confused. The like Confusion is often to be found in This Commentary of Petrus Gualtherus Chabotius on Horace, of the Edition of 1615, in Folio. They must not be imputed to the Author, who was a very learned Man, and who not only wrote on That Poet, with a long and a strong Application, but also in a very singular and useful Method. The Mischief proceeds from this: Having lived nine or ten Years after he had published his Commentary at Basil in 1587, he was continually collecting Notes for a second Edition, without being able to effect his Design. After his Death, James Grassus, having those Collections, inserted them in their Place, as well as he could, in the Edition of the Year 1615. But, not having always distinguished, as the Author himself would have done, the Citations from the Remarks, which Chabot added to them, he has often given us Chabot's Thought, as the Citation of an ancient Author. In other places the Reader easily perceives, that the Author's Reflections are only first Thoughts, which Men write down in their Collections, that they may not escape their Memory, and which they intend to digest before they be published. But when another Man lights on such things, he does not always perceive what is wanting in them: therefore it is no wonder, if the posthumous Works of an Author, enlarged by means of his undigested Memoirs, are faulty. The Errors of the Preis are too frequent in This Commentary, and the French Expressions, which the Author has inserted in it, to make his Countrymen understand those of Horace the better, are generally disfigured. I wonder, that Draudius knew nothing, either of the Analytic Exposition of Horace, published by Chabot, at Paris, in 1582, in 8vo, as an Extract of his great Commentary, or of the two Editions of That Commentary. He has only mentioned a Letter, which Chabot wrote concerning his present Circumstances, and the Life he had led (5). It is also somewhat strange, that the Theatrum of Paul Freberus, wherein we find an Abridgment of Chabot's Life, mentions only the small Analysis of Horace. It is a great Absurdity, to say, that Chabot copied almost the whole Commentary of Torrentius on Horace (6); for Chabot was dead, when That Commentary was printed, in 1607 (7).

[C] He always dearly loved a very solitary Life. He was so sober, that it is literally true, that he eat only to preserve Life; which was the Reason, that, even when he was young, he would never be at any great Feasts. 'Tale porro temperantiae studium exitit illi: causa, cur semper vel juvenis interesse sodalitatibus epulisque amplissimis pertinaciter recusavit (8). He was scarce ever seen in public Places or Walks, where so many People meet to tell or hear News (9). In a word, he lived at a great distance from the Pleasures of the World, without a Wife, without Society, without walking and feasting. This did not proceed from a misanthropic Humour, but from four bodily Infirmities, which were, 'Crebra melendi orexis, audiendi gravitas, mandendi imbecillitas, frequens alternatio deambulandi & conquefcenti propter ramices inguinum (10): — A frequent Inclination to make Water, a difficulty of bearing, bad Teeth, and alternate walking and sitting on account of a Rupture: Which did not hinder him from living above eighty Years.

CHALVET (MATTHEW DE) in Latin Calventius, President of the Inquests in the Parliament of Toulouse. His Article, taken from the Elogies of Sammarthanus (a), is to be met with in Moreri's Dictionary: however I will give it entire, because I can supply it with a greater detail of Circumstances. I say then, that Matthew de Chalvet, descended from the Family of the Chalvets, of Roche-Montez in the Upper Auvergne, was born in the Year 1528, in the Month of May. He was brought to Paris in the Year 1539, by Mr Lizet, his Uncle, who was at that time Advocate-General in the Parliament of Paris (b), and who made him study polite Literature for six Years under Orontius Finaeus, under Tusan, under Bucbanan, and some other learned Persons. He went to Toulouse in the Year 1546, there to learn Civil-Law; and he lodged with Turnebus, Mercerus, and Govea (c). He took a Journey into Italy in the Year 1550, there to continue his Studies, and became a Disciple of Alciatus of Pavia, and of Socinus at Boulogne. Being returned into France, he went and finished his Course of Law at Toulouse, and associated with the Sieurs Roaldus and Bodin, reading Law-Lectures together in the public Schools with Reputation. Having taken his Doctor's Degree in That University, he resolved to go to Paris, there to make his Fortune; but, tho' he was induced to this Resolution by the Letters of Mr Lizet, he did not execute it: he thought it better to fix at Toulouse, where he married, in 1552, Jeanne de Bernuy, Daughter of the Lord de Palicat, Baron of Villeneuve. He was admitted Counsellor in the Parliament of the same Town, in the Year 1553, afterwards created Judge of the French Poetry, and Maintainer of the Floral Games. He was made President of the Inquests by Nomination of the Parliament in 1573. As he was of a calm and innocent Mind, he retired to his House in Auvergne, during the first and last Ragings of the Civil-Wars, that he might not be witness of the Disorders, which he foresaw would happen in Toulouse. It was in this Retreat, that he set about reading and translating Seneca [A], to comfort himself under the Public Misfortunes, and to employ his leisure to good purpose. Without reckoning his bodily Qualifications, he had, besides other Talents, a great Fidelity towards his Prince [B]. This is what gained him the particular Esteem of King Henry IV, who, in 1603, made him his State and Privy Counsellor. The following Year, he resigned his Dignity of President to Francis Chalvet, Lord de Fenouillet, one of his Sons, and retired home, to give himself up to Prayer, and gently to pass the Remainder of his Days amidst Repose and Books. He lived two Years after this happy Retreat, with so much Satisfaction, that he often said to his Relations, that, during the whole of his past Life, he had by no means lived [C] — He died like a true Christian, at Toulouse, the 20th of June, 1607, aged Seventy nine years (d). Several Authors have bestowed Elogies on him [D].

[A] He set about reading and translating Seneca. He dedicated this Translation to Henry IV, in 1603. It was reprinted in Folio, at Paris, for William Leyson, in 1624, and for John Richer, in 1634. Sammarthanus says, that he discovered his Industry, Fidelity, and Application, in the Translation of Seneca. Huetius nevertheless testifies, that he was not very solicitous to subject himself to his Author, and to render him word for word; and that, whereas nothing can be more dry and concise than Seneca, we meet with nothing more prolix and ample than this Version. It is Mr Baillet, who expresses himself thus (1).

[B] Without reckoning his bodily Talents, he had, among other good Qualities, a great Fidelity to his Prince. During the Studies of his Youth, he often unbent his Mind by the most decent bodily Exercises, which he had learned in Italy: being a very good Horseman, a fine Dancer, and the best Tennis-Player of his Time. He likewise tempered the Austerity of the Study of the Law by the Sweets of Latin and French Poetry, in which he had no bad Success, as will appear by his Verses, if his Heirs think fit to publish them (2). — He had many Friends: he likewise knew how to cultivate them; but, above all, there was a singular and perfect Friendship between Mr du Faur de St Jory, first President of Toulouse, and him, as well on account of Learning, as of their near Affinity. He was tall, and well-set, had a laughing Eye, white Hair, a sweet and venerable Countenance, a grave Deportment, modest, and full of Majesty: and the most entertaining Companion in the World (3). Scarce any one approached him, without remaining charmed; for he was of a Disposition affable, courteous, beneficent, and open, without Hypocrisy, without Ambition, without Avarice, employing himself more readily in serving others, than himself, fearing God, abhorring and condemning all Vices, particularly violent Practices and Innovations, even Those of Religion. He loved Order, Regularity, and Peace. — Amidst the Confusions of France, he constantly persevered in Obedience to his Prince, whose Party, as esteeming it the only just and lawful one, he ever faithfully followed. Therefore, when the Parliament was removed from Toulouse to Castelarras, he was pitched upon to go and compliment the King in their Name, at Lyons, in the Year 1594, which gave the King the utmost Satisfaction, as he shewed by the gracious Reception he gave him, and a Present, which he made him: and as for him, he thought himself very happy in being the first Officer of the Parliament of Toulouse, whom the King had seen since his Accession to the Crown, and since the beginning of the Reduction of Languedoc to his Service. Again, in 1603, he was deputed by the same Parliament to wait on his Majesty on several important Affairs: upon which Journey, the King, of his own meer Motion, as an honourable Recompence of his long Services, made him his State and Privy Counsellor, for which he took the Oath before the Chancellor de Belliere, to whom he was some way related (4).

[C] He found so much Satisfaction from the time of his Retreat, that he often said, that, during the whole of his past Life, he had by no means lived. He might therefore compare himself to an illustrious Person, who was Prefectus Pretorii under the Emperor Adrian. I speak of Similis, who was promoted to that Office against his Inclination, and who voluntarily quitted it; after which he retired into the Country, and died at the end of seven Years. He ordered this to be written on his Tomb; Here lies Similis, whose Age was very long, but who lived only seven Years (5). See several Collections concerning such things in the Historical Meditations of Camerarius, in the fifth Chapter of the third Book of the first Volume.

[D] Several Authors have bestowed Elogies on him. For a Proof, I shall only give the four first Verses of a Latin Epigram, which Peter le Loyer addressed to him.

Cum sua quisque tibi culto munuscula versu
Offerat, & genio dedit illa tuo,
Haud ego postremos inter numerabor amicos,
Et levis, at saltem munera grata dabo.

Whilst each hand strives in polish'd Verse to raise A Monument, O Chalvet, to thy Praise,
Not last, amidst thy Friends, thy Worth to sing,
A small, but grateful, Offering will I bring.

This Epigram follows the French Verses, by which The Author dedicates his Comedy of The Dumb Man to this President of the Inquests. Thus he praises him. Though I had as much Gold — down to Muse, inclusively: and again, My dear Chalvet — down to receive then, exclusively; in the Works and Poetical Miscellanies of Peter le Loyer, fol. 122. verso, Edition of Paris 1579.

CHAM, the youngest of Noah's three Sons [A]. We know nothing of him, but that he told his Brothers, that he had seen Noah stark naked in his Tent (a). A great many ridiculous Stories have been invented upon this single Fact. A little Leaven, on this occasion, has leavened a great Lump. Some believe, that, since Cham shewed so much Indiscretion towards his Father, he was a cursed Soul, guilty of all sorts of Abominations. They make him the Inventor of Magic [B]; and many things are reported about it: It is also said, that he gave an Example of Incontinency but little edifying [C]; I mean, that he got his Wife with Child in the very Ark. Some say, that the Fault he committed against his Father was infinitely more heinous, than it is represented to be in Holy Scripture. Some will have it, that he gelt him [D]; others, that he made him impotent by the Virtue

[A] The youngest of Noah's three Sons. This is plain and incontestable, since the Scripture says expressly, after having mentioned Cham's Action, that Noah awoke from his Wine, and knew what his younger Son had done unto him (1). Nevertheless, many Commentators maintain, that Cham was Noah's second Son: they prefer the words, where the three Brothers are placed in this manner, Sem, Cham, and Japhet (2), before such a plain Declaration: and there are some, who, to elude the Twenty fourth Verse, which I quote, pretend, that the Scripture does not speak of Cham there, but of Chanaan, Noah's Grandson: Others pretend, that Cham was only called the younger, because he behaved himself less prudently than his other Brothers (3). Is not this to open a Door to such Glosses, as would obscure the clearest Expressions of the Scripture?

[B] They make him the Inventor of Magic. In this Sense, that he alone preserved and transmitted it to the new World: so I call Noah's Descendants. For otherwise it was not Cham, who invented That black Science: The Angels, who fell in love with the fair Sex, taught it Men (4); but, because Cham durst not carry the Books relating to this matter into the Ark, he engraved the chief Doctrines of it on some very hard Bodies, which were able to resist the Waters of the Deluge: he hid This Treasure carefully: and, when they came out of the Ark, he took it from the Place, where he had put it. We read these silly things in Cassian. 'Quantum, says he (5), antiquæ traditiones ferunt, Cham filius Noë, qui superstitionibus istis, & sacrilegis fuit artibus & prophanis infectus, sciens nullum se posse super his memorabilem librum in arcam prorius inferre, in quam erat una eum patre iusto, & sanctis fratribus ingressurus, scelestas artes, & prophana commenta diversorum metallorum laminis, quæ scilicet aquarum non corrumperentur injuria, & durissimis lapidibus insculpsit. Quæ diluvio peracta, eadem qua illa claverat curiositate perquirens, sacrilegiorum ac perpetuæ nequitie seminarium transmissit ad posterum.' It is pretended, that Miriam, the Son of Cham, learned all these abominable Secrets of his Father; and that therefore the Sectors of This Science looked upon Cham as their first Founder, and called him Zoroaster, that is to say, the living Star, and honoured him as a God. 'Chamum eundem esse volunt cum Zoroastre Mago. Hujus sententiæ primus author quod quidem sciam est Pseudoclemens, qui lib. 4. Recognitionum Magiam scribit hominibus ante diluvium à mulierosis illis Angelis traditam: Ægyptiorum conditorem Mesuraimum didicisse à Chamo patre, & Chamum à posteris hujus artis admiratoribus Zoroastrem, seu vivum astrum, propterea fuisse dictum & pro Deo habitum (6).' See, below, the Remark [E].

[C] It is pretended, that he gave an Example of Incontinency, but little edifying. St Ambrose thinks, that the Expressions of Moses seem to intimate, that the matrimonial Functions were superseded and suspended in the Ark. At that time, says some Interpreters, it was requisite to think of the Maxim, which Solomon published a long time after; To every thing there is a Season, and a time to every purpose under Heaven; — a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing (7). The terrible Judgment, which God exercised on Mankind, ought not to have inspired any other Thoughts in Noah, and his Family, than those of Fasting and Penitence. 'Qui (Ambrosius) etiam notavit tam in ingressu, quam in egressu arcæ, seorsim viros omnes ab uxoribus nominari; ut ex ipsa descriptione insinuaretur perseverans conjugum continentia ab ingressu ad egressum usque: idque admodum verisimiliter. Nam, ut ait Salomon, Tempus amplectendi, & tempus longè fieri ab amplectibus. — Et verò lachrymarum potius, & orationum id tempus fuit ad placandam divinam iram, horribilem in modum sævientem (8). Nevertheless it is believed, that Cham did not contain himself, and that his Wife became the Mother of Chanaan in the very Ark. It is also said, that Chanaan proved a wicked Man, because he was the Fruit of an Incontinency exercised out of Season. He first saw Noah's Nakedness, as is pretended, and told his Father of it in a jeering way. If so, one might better apprehend, why Noah's Curse fell upon Chanaan, and not upon Cham. When some Doctors are asked, how That Patriarch came to know, that Cham had discovered his Nakedness? they answer, that he inferred it from the Impudence Cham had to prophane the Ark by approaching his Wife. Conjecturam Hebræi comminiscuntur ejusmodi. Nempe Noachum in ipsa adhuc arca Chami libidinosum animum arcam intempestiva Venere polluentis notasse. Hinc exasperatum statim culpam libidinis hujus in eundem conjecisse (9). Let us mention, on this occasion, the Answer, which others give: they say, that, as soon as Cham had satisfied his Sight with such an Object, he felt some extraordinary Alterations in his Body. His Eyes became red; his Hair and Beard were burnt: his Lips were distorted; he knew so little what he did, that he striped himself stark naked, and walked in that posture. Noah, seeing all this, concluded from it, that Cham had dishonoured him: but some say, that he knew it only by the Light of Prophecy. St Cyril is very reasonable, when he believes, that Noah, finding himself covered with a Mantle, which was none of his, asked the Reason of it, and understood by his two good Sons how the thing happened (10).

[D] Some pretend, that he gelt his own Father. Some Jewish Doctors tell us (11), that he committed this violent Action, to hinder Noah from begetting him other Brothers. Did he fear, that his Portion in the sharing of the whole World would be too little? Some grave Authors have taken the Pains to refute this very seriously by these words of the Scripture; Noah awoke from his Wine, and knew what his younger Son had done unto him. If such a painful Operation had been performed on him, say they, as This in question, he would soon have awaked, before he had slept out his Wine, by reason of the Pain he would have felt; and he would have surprized the Malefactor in the very Act, and there had been no necessity from him to ask who it was. Id Scriptura satis refellit, quæ ait Noë cum ex vino evigilasset didicisse quæ fecerat ei filius suus. At non evigilasset è vino, consumptis scilicet vaporibus, sed ingenti dolore somnus excussus fuisset, nec opus fuisset discere quid fecisset Cham, sed eum in ipso facinore deprehendisse (12). Here the Hebraicians triumph, who pretend, that it cannot be denied, that all the Gods of the Pagans were taken from the Jewish Tradition. Do not you see, say they, that Noah is the Saturn of the Heathens, and that the Story, which the Poets feign, that Jupiter caltreated his Father Saturn, is taken from The Adventure of Cham? The Count de Gabalès must divert us here with a Fragment of his Comedy. He supposes, that, after the Deluge, Noah yielded his Wife Vesta to the Salamander Oromasdes, Prince of the Fiery Substances, and persuaded his three Sons to yield their Wives also to the Princes of the three other Elements (13). He adds, that Cham proved rebellious of some Magical Charms [E]; others, that he committed Incest with Noah's Wife [F]. It is somewhat strange, that the Scripture does not take any notice, that this Patriarch did any thing to Cham; he did not so much as reprove him for it, and only cursed Chanaan the Son of Cham: but this Curse was only a Prophecy of the Victories, which the Descendants of Sem should obtain over the Descendants of Chanaan under Josua, that is to say, seven or eight Ages after Cham's Fault. This was all the Punishment of This wicked Son: for, what is commonly said, that he became black, and communicated his Blackness to his Posterity, which continues to this day in the Nations of Africa, is a chimerical Story. It is very probable that he settled in Egypt (b), and that he was worshipped there after his Death under the Name of Jupiter Hammon. Pleasant things have been answered to the Question, How Noah knew, that Cham had dealt so ill by him (c). Moreri should not have said, either that Cham mocked his Father, when he saw him naked, or that Chanaan was the first, who perceived Noah's Nakedness, and that he told his Father what he had seen; for neither the Scripture, nor any Author, who could know it, have said any such thing. If Moreri had mentioned these two things as the Conjecture of some Commentators, he could not be re-proved for it; but he gives them as part of Cham's History taken out of the Scripture. There lies the Fault.

rebellious to Noah's Counsel, and could not resist his Wife's Charms; but his want of Complaisance marked all his Posterity black: the horrible Complexion of the People, who inhabit the Torrid Zone, is the Punishment of the prophane Lust of their Father. — As for example, continues he (14), you believe, that the Injury, which Cham did to his Father, is such as it literally seems to be; truly it is quite another thing. Noah, being come out of the Ark, and seeing his Wife Vesta grow more beautiful every Day by the Commerce she had with her Lover Oromasti, grew passionately in love with her again. Cham, fearing his Father was going to People the World again with as black Children as the Ethiopians were, took his Opportunity, one Day, when the good old Man was drunk, and unmercifully castrated him.

[E] — others, that he made him impotent by the Virtue of some magical Charms. The supposititious Berosus of Annius Viterbiensis relates this foolish Story. He says, that Noah, not being able to suffer the irregular Life of his Son Chem, who had acquired the Surname of Zoroast, by addicting himself to Magic, became odious to This Son, and so much the more, because he had a great Tenderness for his other Sons, younger than Chem. The latter, having found an opportunity to revenge himself, made use of it. Finding his Father sleeping out his Wine, he took hold of his privy Parts, and muttered some words, which made him impotent the remaining part of his Life. 'Nactus opportunitatem cum Noa pater madidus jaceret, illius virilia comprehendens taciteque submurmurans, carmine magico patri illufit, simul & sterilem perinde atque castratum effect, neque deinceps Noa scemellam aliquam fecundare potuit (15). Yet this did not incline Noah to drive This Son from him; but it was for his other Vices. This wicked Man taught, that Men ought to live as they did before the Flood, by committing all sorts of Incests, and something worse; and he practised those abominable Lessons. 'At vero Chem cum publice corrumperet mortale genus, afferens & re ipsa exequens congregiendum esse, ut ante inundationem, cum matribus, sororibus, filiabus, masculis, brutis, & quovis alio genere, ob hoc ejectus à Jano piissimo & castissima atque pudicitia referatissimo (16). judge us against Cham; the Author whom I quote contains nothing but Fictions and Chimeras. The Rabbins are not more to be credited, when they vent their idle Fancies concerning Cham's Behaviour. Consider these words of Gabriel Naudæus (17); According to Rabbi *Samuel, he committed 'such a filthy and abominable Action against his Father, that I will say nothing of it, for fear of offending chaste Ears, but what was formerly said by Larentius Valla about a word of the like filthy Signification; Malo ignorari, quam me docente cognosci.'

[F] — others, that he committed Incest with Noah's Wife. It is the Opinion of Mr Von der Hardt, Professor of the Oriental Languages in the University of Helmstadt. He believes, that the Injury, which That Patriarch received from Cham, consisted in the infamous Temerity of This brutal Son in lying either with his own Mother, or at least with his Step-mother. He proves this Explication by several places of Scripture, where the Phrase of discovering the Nakedness of a Woman signifies to lie with her. It is said, in the same places of Scripture, that the Nakedness, or the Shame, of a Woman is the Nakedness, or the Shame, of her Husband; consequently, according to This Style, to have seen Noah's Nakedness is a covert Expression, which signifies to have lain with Noah's Wife. This Author supposes, I. That Cham took his Opportunity to do this Business, when Noah was sleeping out his Wine. II. That some body, having seen the Action, went and told Noah's two other Sons of it. III. That the latter, being angry at the outrageous Affront offered to That Patriarch, went with all speed to the Place; and, having surprized their Brother in the Fact, they threw their Cloaks over him and his Accomplice. IV. That they reported to their Father what they had seen. V. That Noah, being very angry, ordered, by his Will, that Chanaan, who was to be born of That incestuous Commerce, should be totally deprived of the Inheritance (18). These Hypotheses are learned and ingenious; but, if it be once allowed to suppose, that Moses's Narratives are so much disguised, it is to be feared, that This Method will be carried as far as the History of the Temptation and the Fall of Adam, as some have ventured do.

CHAMIER (DANIEL) one of the greatest Divines of the Protestant Party, was born in Dauphiné. He was a long time Minister at Montellimart (a); whence he went, in the Year 1612, to be Professor of Divinity at Montauban. He was killed there by a Cannon-Ball, during the Siege in the Year 1621 (b) [A].

[A] He was killed by a Cannon-Ball during the Siege of Montauban, in 1621. Some Historians say, he was killed being in Arms; that is to say, with a Pike in his Hand, and in his Armour, and that, at the end of the Sermon, he had preached that Day, he had three times repeated, They shall not enter. 'Chamier - - - - - quamquam propugnaculo tegebatur, tormentaria pila in frustra dicer-

It is strange, that no body has written his Life. None but the French are capable of such a Negligence. If Chamier had been of another Nation, his History (large enough to be bound) would appear in all Libraries, especially considering, that he left Sons, who were of his Profession, and whose Posterity is in the Ministry to this day (c). He was no less a Minister of State in his Party, than a Minister of the Church. Never was any Man more stiff, more inflexible [B], and more untractable, with respect to the Artifices, which the Court made use of to weaken the Protestants, than he. It is said, that it was he who drew up the Edict of Nantes [C]. He was honoured with several Deputations [D], and presided in some Synods (d). The Time he spent in the Political Affairs of the Party, did not hinder him from acquiring great Learning. He gave Proofs of it in his Dispute against us, that he had taken up Arms, but only that 'he was killed by a Cannon-shot at the Entry of the Bastion du Paillas, and that, in his Sermon of the foregoing Day, on the Thirty fourth Verse of the Thirty seventh Chapter of Jsaiah, he applied to Montauban the Promise of a Deliverance, which the Prophet made from God to Jerusalem, besieged by Rabshakeb, General of Sennacherib's Army; repeating, with great Vehemency, these Words, No, no, they shall not enter into it, they shall return the same way they came.' The Relation adds, that 'some of his Friends had heard him say, that he believed he should die in that Siege by a Cannon-shot - - - and, upon that Sunday in the Morning, he prophesied accidentally what happened to him in the Evening. His Colleague Jofon asked him, if he was not to preach that Afternoon? Not at all, said he: Do not you know, that this Day is the Day of my Rest (2)?' The Catholic Writers have severely reflected upon the Death of this famous Minister, and taken an Occasion from it to cry him down as a Boutefeu, who was not contented to preach up Rebellion, but took up Arms himself; without considering, say they, that, as the Laity are not permitted to encroach on the Authority of the Church, so the Ministers of the Gospel ought not to be permitted to take up the Sword. They are answered, as in the case of Zwinglius, that they may expose themselves in War, to recommend the Cause to God, and to comfort and strengthen those, who stand in need of that Assistance.

[B] Never was any Man more stiff, and more inflexible. The Historian of the Edict of Nantes is very happy in the Character he gives us of Chamier. 'He waited in vain at Court, says he (3), whether the Synod of Roche had deputed him. - - - After he had been there six Months, he could not obtain the Honour to speak with the King. His Person was not acceptable, because he was one of those Fools of the Synod (4), whom the King did not love, one of those untractable Men, who cannot be prevailed with, and one of those stiff Persons, who are proof against Fear and Hope, the strongest Engines of the Court.' He had said in another place (5), speaking of the Deputies on the Affair of the Edict of Nantes, that Chamier was one of the stiffest, and therefore as odious to the Courts, as he was beloved by the Churches. We shall say, in the Remark [B] of the Article FERRIER, that, in 1611, in the Assembly of Saumur, he was at the head of those, who would have the Affair concerning the Edict of Nantes vigorously contended for. But, if you would know the Humour of Chamier, and of those like him, read what d'Aubigné said of him in a jocose Stile.

'Now there appeared more Sauciness in these People, says he (6), at the last Treaty of Peace, and in the Assemblies, which lasted four Years, where, in these stiff-necked Men not only impudently resisted the honestest Deputies the King could choose in his Council of State, but also the greatest Lords of their Party, when, considering the Affairs of the Kingdom, they would have had them shew some Civility. One of them started up with a brazen Face, and answered freely, These Propositions do not answer the good Opinion, which those, who sent us, have of us. He was desired to explain this: La Valliere advanced, and, explaining it, said, Gentlemen, this is to betray the Churches of God. I heard, within these few Days, M. de Villeroi relate, how he, with Messieurs de Rosny and de Thou, and others, being at a Conference with four of these ill-bred Men, whilst Calignon, in the King's Name, endeavoured to mollify these Men by his Eloquence, huge Chamier, having put his Cloak under his Backside, leaned with his left Elbow on the middle of the Table, and, with his other Hand, cut his Nails with a Pair of Scizars; and the Clippings flew into the Orator's Beard and Mouth: one of them flew into Rosny's Eye; and this Posture reproved all that could be said of him.'

[C] It is said, that it was he, who drew up the Edict of Nantes. I have read this in an Epistle Dedicatory of Varillas. 'As the Heretics, says he (7), are not likely ever to find any Security, which may seem sufficient to them, the Calvinists had obtained by their Importunities, that whatever was advantageous for their Party, in the Edicts of Pacification, might be included in That of Nantes. Daniel Chamier, the ablest of their Ministers, had the Commission to draw it up. He spent three whole Months in it, and boasted to have forgot nothing, that might serve for the Establishment of the Quiet of his Sect.'

[D] He was honoured with several Deputations. What Varillas has just said may be false; but it is certain, that Chamier was one of the chief Men of the Protestant Assemblies, wherein the last Pacification with Henry IV was discussed and concluded. La Trimouille, du Plessis, d'Aubigné, and he, were chosen, 'To debate about the Matters, which could not, without Confusion, be digested by the Body of the Assembly, which consisted then of seventy, and sometimes of eighty Heads (8)'. He appeared no less in the Assembly of Saumur, in the Year 1611. 'He had the first Voice in it, as being Assistent to the President; and, because he understood Business, the Conclusion depended very much on the turn which he gave to things in voting (9)'. The Author, from whom I borrow these Words, tells us a thing, which deserves to be mentioned here: 'They bethought themselves, says he (10), of bringing some personal Trouble upon him, in order to make him weary of the Assemblies, wherein he had too much Authority. The Consistory of Montelimar, where he was Minister, took the Opportunity of his Absence and Deputation to give his Place to another. This was done without consulting or hearing him, by I know not what Intrigues, wherein it is likely Lesdiguières had a Hand; since it was done in his Province, in his Sight, and in a Town, where he could do what he pleased. But, to make the Injury yet more odious, the Consistory sent to search his Library, with some violence, under pretence of looking for Papers which belonged to the Church. The Proceedings of the Consistory had something so offensive in them, and shewed so much Contempt of Chamier, that he was very much offended at it, and so much the more, because both his Interest and his Honour were concerned in it. - - - He made his Complaints to the Assembly about it, as being an Affront to them, as well as to him; and he seemed ready to leave Saumur, to go and settle his Affairs at home. This was just what the Court would have desired, to deprive the Party (whose Resistance it feared) of a good Head - - - but Chamier was stopped by having Justice done him. The Assembly maintained him in the Ministry at Montelimar. I find, that he had quitted That Church in 1606, to profess Divinity in the Academy of Die (11). I do not know the Reason, which obliged him to return to his first Post.

Father Coton [E], and in his Books [F]. The Thought of those, who make him the Head of a Party, the Head of the Metaphorists [G], does not deserve to be confuted. It is more absurd, than the Boldness of those, who have given us the Sect of the pretended Bezanites.

[E] He gave Proofs of his Learning, in his Dispute against Father Coton. Here is what a modern Author, and a good Protestant, says of it. In the Year 1600, Chamier had a Conference at Nîmes with That Jesuit; 'in which each Party boasted to have the Advantage, according to the usual Custom. The Truth is, that the Jesuit dazzled the Hearers by some eloquent Digressions, which put the Subject of the Dispute every Moment out of fight; and that Chamier, being more solid, and more scholastic, had obliged the Jesuit, by his Arguments, to get off by this Artifice. They, who have written That Jesuit's Life, do sufficiently discover, that Chamier's Dryness would have confounded their Hero, if he had not warded the Blow by eloquent Discourses, which were beside the Business, and which cost him nothing (12).

[F] - - - - and in his Books. His Treatise de Oecumenico Pontifice, and his Jesuitical Letters, deserved Scaliger's Esteem (13). Sharp Complaints were made, that he had published some Jesuits Letters, with his Glosses and Remarks. 'If the Ministers are mildly treated, it is to invite them to do worse, and to give them an Opportunity of turning Sugar into Poison. It has appeared so, within these few Years, by the Ministers of Dauphiné, and chiefly by Chamier, to whom Father Coton, and Father Ignatius Armand had privately written concerning some Points of Faith, by way of Conference, with Letters full of Humanity: but how did he make use of them? He caused them to be printed without their Knowledge, and against their Intention; and, putting his Glosses upon them, publicly exposed what they had communicated to him alone: which is a perfidious Affront; for several things are written in private, which one would not so willingly publish (14).'

With Chamier's fair side, in the Quality of a Writer, is his Catholicæ Panstratia, or, The Wars of the Lord (15), wherein he learnedly treats of the Controversies of the Protestants and Roman Catholics, and sets himself particularly to refute Bellarmine. This Work contains four Volumes in folio, and is not complete. The Controversy concerning the Church is wanting in it, which is a wide Subject; and would have made the fifth Volume. The Author's Death hindered him from finishing it. See here what was written from Geneva (16), concerning This Panstratia, in the Year 1606. 'Monsieur Chamier is very intent upon Controversies. If he goes on as he has begun, and finds ready Printers, he will give us as many Volumes, as Baronius in his Ecclesiastic Legends, which he firmes Annals.' This Body of Controversies was printed at Geneva in the Year 1626 (17). Hadrian Chamier, Minister of Montelimart, and the Author's Son, dedicated it to the National Synod of the Reformed Churches of France, as a Work due to them, not only because it was composed at their Desire, but also because they had bestowed several Gratifications upon Daniel Chamier, to encourage him to set about That Work, and because, after his Death, they had given to his Family several Marks of their Liberality, and had contributed to the Charges of the Impression. Benediç Turretin, Professor of Divinity at Geneva, took care of the printing of the Panstratia, and added a short and good Preface to it. An Abridgment of the Panstratia appeared at Geneva, in the Year 1643, under the Title of Chamierus Contrabitus. Frederic Spanheim is the Author of That Abridgment, in one Volume in folio. They who know, that the Panstratia comprehends four great Volumes, will scarce believe, that the Author of the Bibliothèque of Dauphiné knows what it is, since he calls That Work a Panstratia, or Discourse on the controverted Points of the two Religions. A Pocket-book might be called so; as for Example, That which our Chamier published against Father Tolosain, Abbot-General of St Antony (18), or the Considerations, which he published, in 1600, against the Advertisements of Porfan.

His Corpus Theologicum was printed at Geneva in 1653. It is a small folio, which contains also his Epistolæ Jesuiticæ.

[G] Some make him - - - - Head of the Metaphorists. A Jesuit, whose Name is James Gaultier, who, of all Men, made the least Scruple to multiply the Sects of the Protestants, found seven of them in the first Years of the XVIth Century. The first is That of the Metaphorists, whose Errors he attributes only to Daniel Chamier. He says, that the chief Error of the Metaphorists, and That, which gave them That Name, consists in saying, that Jesus CHRIST is not properly the Word and Image of God the Father, but metaphorically. He adds, that Daniel Chamier uttered this Blasphemy several times, in the Conference, which he had with him in the beginning of January 1601. 'Hoc speciatim ineunte Januario anni 1601. notatum fuit in Daniele Chamierio Montiliensi Ministro, quum illi mecum Alani esset disceptatio, in qua ille non semel sed multoties in pleno confesso hanc ipsam blasphemiam enuntiavit, dictavit, suaque manu subscript (19).' We have here an Example of what strong Prejudices can do: for, in the first Place, there never was any Sect of Metaphorists among the Protestants of France: their Synods never had any thing to discuss on that Subject, nor with any such Persons. In the second place, where did this Jesuit learn, that it is an Heresy and Blasphemy to say, that the Terms Word and Image are not taken in the proper but in the figurative Sense, when they are spoken of Jesus CHRIST in relation to God the Father? In the proper Sense, the first of these two Words signifies only the Action of a Man, who speaks; the second only signifies a Figure, that represents a Body. It is most certain, that, in this Sense, nothing can either be the Word or the Image of God the Father. But does it follow from thence, that Jesus CHRIST is only the Word and Image of his Father figuratively? Not at all. A Man, blinded by his Prejudices, fancies there is nothing real in Metaphors (20), and will no longer hearken to Reason. Did not he, who said, that the Scipio's were two Thunderbolts of War (21), attribute to them all that was most real, most active, and most solid in Military Virtue? Nevertheless it is very true, that he made use of a Metaphor; and a Man must be senseless, if he says, that the Scipio's were only Thunderbolts in a metaphorical and figurative Sense. An Author, mentioned in the foregoing Remark, tells us very gravely, that Chamier was one of the chief Seſſaries of the Faction of the Metaphorists (22). How many Persons will repeat this Fallhood, without informing themselves of the thing, without suspecting that This Faction of the Metaphorists is a Chimera of James Gaultier, and without knowing, that Themſelves, and That Jesuit, and All the most rigid Orthodox in general, are Metaphorists in the sense that Chamier was one? I have said something elsewhere (23) against the ridiculous Illusion of those, who have so much enlarged the List of Sects.

CHANG Y (PETER DE) Esq; lived in the XVIth Century. He translated into French the Latin Book of Ludovicus Vivés, Of the Institution of a Christian Woman, as well in her Infancy, as married, and a Widow. Likewise the Office of a Husband (a). The Edition I have of it is neither the first, nor the second: it is of Paris, for James Kerver, 1542, in 8°, and was unknown both to La Croix du Maine, and Du Verdier Vau-Privas (b). To it was newly added, a very short and fruitful Institution of the Virtue of Humility: with an Epistle of St Bernard, touching the Business and Management

(b) La Croix du Maine knew of none of the Editions. Du Verdier Vau-Privas mentions only That of Puteus, in 1544, in 16; and that of Paris, 1579, in 16.

Management of a Family. The Author had been some time dead. He had dedicated the Work to his Daughter Margaret. He was above Sixty Years of Age, when he set about this Version, and was severely afflicted with the Gout (c). He had born Arms in his Youth, and had translated six Books of Pliny into French [A], amidst the Fatigues and Interruptions of War. He had Sons, who were learned Men, as I observe in the Remark.

(c) See, before the Book, the Latin Verses Simonis Romyglat Andegavensis.

Neither La Croix du Main, nor Du Verdier Vau-Privas, say any thing of the Translation of the six Books of Pliny; but they observe, that his Summary of the sixteen first Books of Pliny was printed at Lyons, for John de Tournes, in the Year 1551, in 16mo. It was BLAISE DE CHANGY, one of his Sons, who published it (2). He was Curate of Dépoisses, as I learn from a Stanza of ten Verses, prefixed to his Translation of Ludovicus Vives. Peter

Pessallier, a Native of Auxerre, is the Author of it. JAMES DE CHANGY, another of our Author's Sons, was an Advocate: the Land of Changy is, I believe, in Burgundy; for thus the Epistle Dedicatory of this Translator begins:

To my Daughter MARGARET.

YOUR Brother James, Doctor of Laws, has brought me, to Changy, from the Library of the Sieur St Anthot, Counsellor in our Sovereign Court of Dijon, a Book in Latin, composed by an eloquent Man, containing the virtuous Education of a Christian Woman.

Du Verdier ascribes to James de Changy, Doctor of Laws, and Advocate at Dijon, a French Translation of the Book of Johannes Ludovicus Vives, Of the Institution of a Christian Woman, &c (3). He says, that it was printed at Lyons, in 16mo, for Salpicius Sabon, and that Lewis Torquet (4) had likewise made a newer Translation of the same Book. It is plain, that he gives to the Son, in Page 597, what he ascribes to the Father, in Page 1000. Why does he not mark the Year of the Edition of Lyons?

CHARLES V, Emperor and King of Spain, born at Ghent the Twenty fourth of February, on St Matthias's Day, 1500, was the greatest Man that the August House of Austria produced. He was qualified for the Field and the Cabinet; so that, finding himself Master of so many Kingdoms and Provinces, he might have subdued all Europe, if the Valour of Francis I. had not been an Obstacle in his way [A]. There was a continual Rivalship between these two Princes, wherein Fortune declared most times against France; which was partly to be attributed to the Superiority of the Forces on one side of Charles V., and partly to the ill Conduct of the Council of France, in which more Faults were committed, than the Valour of the French Troops was able to repair. All this did not hinder Charles from receiving several Checks in his Expeditions against France. It is said, that he was one of those dull-witted Men, who promise nothing less in their Youth, than what they shall one day prove. It is even said, that this was of great Use to him in gaining him the Preference to Francis I., with respect to the Imperial Crown [B]. Altho' he had an excellent Preceptor (a), yet he learned but little Latin

(a) He was afterwards Pope under the Name of Adrian VI.

[A] He might have subdued all Europe, if the Valour of Francis I. had not been an Obstacle to it.] He was almost the only Prince, who opposed the Torrent; and, if History be well examined, we shall find, that the Emperor had commonly more Allies, than Francis I.; and England was so far from thinking of keeping the Balance even between these two Princes, that it often joined with the Emperor. Is it not known, that, in 1544, Charles V. and Henry VIII. had already divided France between them, and that their Treaty imported, that they should join their Armies, before Paris, to plunder That great City (1)? They set about the Execution of This Project at the same time: since, whilst the Emperor made an Irruption into Champagne, the English made a Descent into Picardy. Thus was the King of France paid for all his Cabals, to favour the Love of Henry VIII. for Anne Boleyn. Thus Charles V. was pliant enough to forget the Affronts offered to his divorced Aunt, and the Promises he had made to the Court of Rome (2). It is pretended, that it was one of the Things his Conscience checked him for afterwards, and for which he forsook the World. 'Esse non pauca quæ Caroli vellicarent animum pietatis omnino non furdum. of Charles, not altogether deaf to the suggestions of Piety: That he had made a League with Henry, King of England, who, to oblige Charles, had been excommunicated by the Pope; in which his fierce and implacable indignation against the French King got the better of the injury he had received from Henry, in the Divorce of his Wife Catharine, the Emperor's Aunt, and the Promise he had made, never to be reconciled to an Heretical King; till he should make satisfaction to the Papal Dignity. What I am going to say is a more remarkable thing than it is thought to be. Charles V. had more Forces than Francis I., and yet, by his Address, or because his Superiority was not so much feared as That of the French, he commonly formed more numerous Confederacies in his Favour, than Those of his Enemies. I shall observe, by the way, that Brantome spoke with too much Disdain of the other Princes, who opposed the Ambition of Charles V. 'That Emperor (says he (4)) would easily have compassed his Design, if it had not been for our great King Francis, or his Shadow only. And he would have beat down all petty Princes and Potentates like Nine-pins; and their Power would have signified no more than That of Those little Devils of Rabelais, who can only hail on Cabbages and Parsley in a Garden: The Pope could not have resisted him, seeing he was taken in his Fortresses of St Angelo, which was pretended to be impregnable.'

Latin (b); he succeeded much better in the living Languages. He had the French so perfectly, that he made use of it to compose his own Annals [C]. Nevertheless it is pretended, that he esteemed the Spanish most [D]. He made Speeches on several Occasions; but he forgot himself most terribly in the Speech which he made in Spanish before the Pope, in the Year 1536 [E]. They had no reason, in the Death of the Emperor Maximilian, which happened the 22d. Day of January 1519, Francis I. openly canvassed for the Empire, and bought some Voices, who, having received the Payment, turned on his Competitor's side. The Glory, which already surrounded That Monarch, was one of the Causes of his Exclusion. The greater Merit he seemed to have, the more it was feared he would reduce the Princes of Germany by Degrees, as his Predecessors had reduced those of France; and, if Oppression was to be feared on either side, it did not seem so near on Charles's side, who was five Years younger than he, and, in Appearance, of a very mean Genius. In fine, by all these Considerations, and with 300000 Crowns, which were brought into Germany the foregoing Year, and very properly distributed, Charles carried it, and was elected at Frankfurt the twentieth of June, being at that time in Spain, where he had been near two Years (5). This confirms what I have said already more than once (6), that, on some Occasions, the Superiority of Forces, or Merit, serves rather to frustrate a Design, than to make it succeed.

[C] He had the French Language so perfectly, that he made use of it to compose his Annals. I have read only in Jerom Ruscelli, that Charles V. composed the Memoirs of his Reign in French; and he is also the only Author, whom Valerius Andreas alledges (7), where he speaks of That Work of Charles V. I wonder Those Memoirs have never appeared, since there were Copies of them, and William Marindo had translated them into Latin, with a Design to publish them immediately. Ruscelli affirms it. Egli stesso il predetto Imperator Carlo Quinto era venuto scrivendo in lingua Francese gran parte delle cose sue principali, come già di molte delle sue proprie fece il primo Cesare, & che s'aspetta di hora in hora d'averle in luce fatte Latine da Guglielmo Marindo (8). Brantome had reason to say, that they would have sold well; but he ought not to have doubted, as he did, of Marindo's Version, under Pretence that it remained in Obscurity. He believed, that the Author, whom he quotes, spoke of That Translation as of a Work already public: This he ought not to have believed. Let us see now what he says: 'I have seen a printed Letter (9), among Those of Belleforest, that he translated out of Italian into French; which certifies, that Charles V. wrote a Book like That of Cæsar; and which had been translated into Latin at Venice by William Marindre; which I cannot well believe; for every one would have bought it, like Bread in a Market in time of Famine; and certainly the Desire of having such a fine and rare Book would have set it at another Price than it has been set at, and every body would have had one (10). Ghilini has placed This Prince among Authors, and pretended, that the Work, which I have mentioned, had been printed. 'Opere sue, says he (11), che publicate, accrescono non poca fama al suo per altro celebratissimo nome, e sono, Istoria delle cose da lui fatte, la qual scrisse in lingua Francese ad imitazione di C. Giulio Cesare. — He acquired no small reputation by the History of his own Actions, which are published, and written in French, in imitation of Julius Cæsar.' Afterwards he gives the Titles of some of This Emperor's Letters and Manifestos; Which is a new Fault; for Those Writings were drawn up by his Secretaries. I imagine, that, if Father Bouhours had thought of what Ruscelli relates, he would have mentioned it in That Place of his Conversations, wherein he says, that Charles V. had a great Idea of our Language: He thought it fit for great Affairs, and called it a Language of State, according to the Testimony of Cardinal du Perron †. It was perhaps for this reason, that he did it the Honour to make use of it in the most famous Actions of his Life. The History of the Wars of Flanders ‡ informs us, that he spoke French to the States of Brussels, in resigning all his Kingdoms to Philip II (12). To which these Words of Brantome may be added: Among all Languages, he thought the French to be more Majestic than the rest — and he loved to speak it, though he understood some others very well (13).

[D] It is pretended however, that he esteemed the Spanish most. Let us cite Father Bouhours again. 'If Charles V. were to return into the World, he would not be pleased, that you should prefer the French Language to the Castilian; for he used to say, that, if he was to speak to Ladies, he would speak Italian; that, if he was to speak to Men, he would speak French; that, if he was to speak to his Horse, he would speak High-Dutch; but that, if he was to speak to God, he would speak in Spanish. He ought to have said, without any more ado, replied Eugenius, that the Castilian was the natural Language of God, as a learned Cavalier of that Country said one Day, who maintained, in a good Company, that, in the Terrestrial Paradise, the Serpent spoke English, the Woman Italian, the Man French, but that God spoke Spanish (14). This differs much from what was said by a Spaniard to a German: The Germans, said he, do not speak, but thunder, and I believe, that God made use of their Language, when he thundered the Sentence of Condemnation on Adam. He was answered, That the Serpent had made use of the Affections of the Castilian Language to deceive Eve. Petrus Royziz Mauræus Hispanus, Poeta illo seculo celebratus, consiliarius regius, & ob eruditionem Langorum acceptissimus; etiam in quotidiano convictu: sed qui velut diva loquens Germanicam linguam ridere soleret. Itaque famulos Langi Oratores, mensæ aliquando adstantes, atque dura pronunciatione & accentu affectate voces Germanicas exasperantes, isto scommate jocove illudit: Germani, inquit, non loquuntur, sed fulminant. Et credo ego, mi Lange Orator, Deum ex indignatione hoc sermonis fulmine usum, cum primos parentes extruderet Paradiso. Cui Langus, Ego rursus, inquit, verisimile censet, serpentem suavi & blando vocis Hispanica suco usum, cum imposuit Evæ. Hoc argutulo responso Royzizium & convivis & adstantibus propinavit deridendum: quod & ipsum regem hoc audientem mirè delectavit (16). I have lengthened this Citation, to shew, that the King of Poland himself was entertained with these Jest. But here is another Division, which does not altogether agree with That of Charles V. and which pleases a Spanish Doctor very much. The German Language, says he, is for Soldiers, the French for Women, the Italian for Princes, and the Spanish for God. 'De præstantia — illarum (linguarum) quæ Europæis frequentiores sunt, sic Tympius † distinguendum putat, ut si quispiam cum Deo locuturus esset, Hispanice deberet loqui, ob linguæ Majestatem; si cum aliquo Principe, Italice propter hujus elegantiam; si cum fœminis, Gallicè ob suavitatem; si cum militibus, Germanicè quod fit omnium robustissima; ac sic omnes suo encomio evexit, sed Hispanicam cæteris superiorem merito extollit (17). There is yet another Division, according to which the Spanish Language is fit to command, the Italian to persuade, and the French to excuse one's self. From whence it comes, said a Spaniard, that God made use of the Castilian to forbid the first Man to eat of a certain Fruit; that the Serpent made use of the Italian to deceive Eve, and that Adam spoke French to justify his Fault (18).

[E] He forgot himself most terribly, in a Speech which he made — before the Pope in 1536. It was a considerable Cause, which he would plead himself before the Pope, the Cardinals, the Ambassadors of Princes, many Prelates, and great Lords. He dexterously mentioned all that he thought most fit to justify his own Conduct, and to condemn That of Francis I. He declared the Conditions, on which he was ready to conclude a Treaty of Peace with France, in France, to be satisfied with the French Embassadors, who were present at that Act [F]. Many Persons have accused him of having committed a great Fault, when he trusted to the Honesty of Francis I [G]. One must be very satirical to call this a Fault [H]. The Flemish Historians were either very simple, or very dishonest, in relating what passed on that Occasion [I]. The raising of the Siege of France. He said also, that, if this did not please Francis I, he offered him other Terms, upon which he expected an Answer in twenty Days; which were, that, to avoid the Effusion of human Blood, 'they should end their Quarrels between themselves in their own Persons — by fighting in an Island, or on a Bridge, or in a Boat on some River; and that, as to the Weapons, they might easily agree to have them equal, and that, for his Part, he would like any of them, were it either to fight with a Sword, or a Dagger, in his Shirt (19).' If this Proposal did not please, he offered another, which was War. He declared, that, if it came to that, he would take up Arms 'in such a manner, that nothing in the World should divert him from it, till one of the two should be the poorest Gentleman in his Country. Which Misfortune he hoped, and was sure, would fall on the King, and that God would assist him, as he had done hitherto (20).' See the Margin (21). He added, That his assurance of conquering was grounded on three Reasons. I. On his Right. II. On the Junctures of the Times, being as favourable to him as could be imagined. III. 'On his finding his Subjects, Captains, and Soldiers, so well disposed, bearing such a Love and Affection towards him, and so well experienced in the Art of War, that he might entirely rely on them. A thing which he certainly knew to be quite otherwise with the King of France; whose Subjects, Captains, and Soldiers were such, that, if his were like them, he would tie his Hands, put a Rope about his Neck, and go in that Condition to the King of France, and beg his Mercy (22).' Here one may ask the Question, which Ulysses put to Agamemnon;

Ἀτρεΐδην, ποῖόν σε ἔπος φέρον ἐρκος ἰδούτων (23);

What Word, Atrides, has escap'd thy Lips!

Here one may justly wonder, that a Discourse, more becoming a Braggadocio on a Stage, or a Spanish Knight, than an Emperor of Germany, should come from the Mouth of This wise Prince, before such an august Assembly. 'Sane mirati fumus vehementissime cum hanc orationem legimus apud Bellaium & alios, potuisse ejusmodi verba & alia quam plurima non minus ferocia, quæ iidem auctores recitant, excidere in tali conventu adeo sapienti ac prudenti ab omnibus habito Principi, quæ magis Pyrrhopolines Militi glorioso Plautino convenire videntur (24).' But, as a Modern Historian observes, Good Fortune, and the Panegyrists, and Prophets, had concurred to fill This Emperor's Mind with vast Designs. 'Ever since he had seen himself at the Head of two great Armies, and made Solyma retreat, and Barbarossa fly, his Mind ran altogether upon War. The Flatterers, who spoil the wisest Princes by their excessive Praises, promised him nothing less than the Empire of all Europe: The Poets and Panegyrists impudently assured him of it, and the Diviners and Astrologers, who are as bold Liars, had spread the Belief of it in such a manner by their Predictions, that they made an Impression on weak Minds (25).' It was at this same time, that the Emperor, being swelled up with the Victories he had obtained, and with those he held already for certain, said to Paul Jovius, Make good Provision of Paper and Ink, for I have cut out Work enough for you (26). But never was the Providence of God more visibly seen to mortify the Presumption of Man. Charles V, at the Head of Ten thousand Horse, and above Forty thousand Foot, supported by a good Fleet, commanded by the famous Andrew Doria, fell upon Provence, and caused at the same time an Army of Thirty thousand Men to fall into Picardy (27). But it proved like the Mountain's bringing forth; Porturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus (28). The Army of Provence miscarried before Marsilles, and was reduced to a pitiful Condition, without giving Battle; and That of Picardy miscarried before Peronne (29).

[F] They had no reason, in France, to be satisfied with the French Embassadors, who were present at This Solemnity.] The Bishop of Mâcon, who was at that time at Rome in the Quality of Embassador of Francis I, and the Sieur de Velli, who performed the same Function at the Court of his Imperial Majesty, were present at the Speech. The first could answer but little, because he did not understand Spanish; and neither of them had time to say much. The worst is, that they did not give their Master a faithful Account of all that Charles V had proposed. They suppressed the Offer of a Duel, as also the Praises, which he gave his Soldiers, and the Contempt he shewed for those of France. They suppressed all this, at the Pope's Request, and that they might not retard the Treaty of Peace, by exasperating their Master (30). Brantome is very diverting, when he describes the Postures, which an Embassador, who was a Sword-man, made, during That Speech, and Those, which the Sieur de Velli, a Gown-man, made (31).

[G] Many accuse him of having committed a great Fault, when he trusted to the Honesty of Francis I.] The City of Ghent revolted in the Year 1539, and offered to deliver themselves up to France. The King not only refused such Offers, but also gave the Emperor notice of it, who, finding no better Remedy for an Evil, the Consequences of which were to be feared, than running to it in Person, desired a Passage through France, any other way seeming long and dangerous to him. He obtained what he desired, and received extraordinary Honours all over the Kingdom, and chiefly at the Court. The Conduct of Francis I was doubtless very fine and generous; but it is a great Illusion to praise him for not attempting against the Emperor's Liberty. Is a Man to be praised for not committing a notorious Perfidy?

[H] — one must be very satirical, to call this a Fault.] Most of those, who blamed Charles V for the Trust he put in the Generosity of Francis I, did not design to reflect upon that Emperor, but to give a frightful Idea of That King: For, if it was an offence against the Rules of Prudence, to rely on the Word of Francis I, it is a Sign, that it was very probable he would commit a base and treacherous Action as soon as he could. I own that some Authors ground themselves on the continual Tricks, which they impute to Charles V, in relation to the King of France; and they argue thus: That Emperor should have feared, that Francis I might find many specious Pretences, after having suffered so many Injuries, to violate the Laws of Hospitality; Prudence therefore did not allow him to trust That Monarch. They may say what they please; their Thoughts will certainly tend more to the disreputation of Francis I, than Charles V; and it cannot be said, without blasting That King's Honour, that he deliberated in his Council, whether he should make Charles V a Prisoner, or not. Camerarius, a German Author, finds no likelihood in it (32).

[I] The Flemish Historians were either very simple, or very dishonest, in relating what passed on that occasion.] The Belgic and Germanic, &c. Candor of Historians, generally speaking, is but a Chimera; perhaps there are no Nations that afford more equitable Pens, or more passionate Writers than These. Their Slanders are as keen and biting as Those beyond the Alps; and besides, they are sometimes built on very gross Fables. I do not mention all those, which they have published concerning Charles the Vth's Passage through France; I shall content myself to quote these Words of a French Annalist (33). 'Nec ullo modo audiendus infidus quidam Belgicus Chronologus * dum scribit, Cæsarem paucis illis quibusdam totam per urbem Lutetiam diffeminatis præsentissimum sui periculum cum vitasset, perniciosissimo of Mets was one of the greatest Mortifications that he met with in all his Life-time, and they make him say a witty thing on the Ascendant that the Star of Henry II had over him [K]. Notwithstanding his great Successes in his Undertakings, it is certain, that his History is but a Mixture of good and bad Fortune [L]. His Abdication is a thing very singular: It was a noble Subject for the Makers of Reflexions. They said very different Things about his Motives [M], and the Occupations of his Solitude [N]; and some pretended, that he soon repented of pernicissimo cursu primum Cameracum, hinc Gandavum concessisse. Infusiora namque sunt ista quam ab homine mente sobrio proferantur. At sic lubet plerisque Belgis, cum de Francis agitur, futuri & ineptire, qualia per multa apud Maierum, Massæum, & alios ejus generis homines, reperire liceat. — Nor are we to give any Credit to an insipid Belgic Chronologer, when he writes, that the Emperor, having been lampooned all over Paris, and having escaped the most imminent Danger, fled as fast as he could, first to Cambray, and from thence to Ghent. For such Stories are too ridiculous for a Man in his Wits to relate. Yet most of the Germans take a pleasure in venting such idle Tales, when they are speaking of the French Affairs: of which kind we meet with great numbers, in Maierus, Massæus, and such like Authors. The long Wars of France, with the House of Burgundy, had so much incensed the Flemings, that those, who could not commit Hostilities with Sword in Hand, exercised them with their Pen, or with their Tongues. Now in these several kinds of War, many Persons make use of the Maxim, Dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirat? An Historian, who dares say, that Charles V ran away Post, and who does not know, or pretends not to know, that That Prince was accompanied by two Sons of France to the very Frontiers, and received in all the Towns as the King himself, what kind of Man must he be?

[K] They make him say a witty thing on the Ascendant that the Star of Henry II had over him. I perceive very well, said he, that Fortune is like Women; she prefers Young Persons to the Old. Strada mentions this Thought of Charles V in general (34): Scioppius is in the wrong to censure him for it (35), and it is by a Spirit of Contradiction that he questions whether the Emperor said it. He acts the Part of a Divine unreasonably, and is mistaken in believing, that this Saying of Charles V ascribes all Things to meer Chance. Is it blind Chance that makes Women love a young Husband better than an old one? There is nothing more opposite to Fortune than an Affection, whatever it be, of favouring one thing more than another. If the Maxim of Charles V was true, it would much better prove the Doctrine of Providence, generally speaking, than it would prove the opposite Opinion. Scioppius is more in the right, when he says, that This Maxim is to be found in Machiavel; for we find the following Words in the Twenty fifth Chapter of the Prince of That Florentine Author. 'Jo giudico ben questo, che sia meglio essere impetuoso che riservato, perche la Fortuna è donna: & è necessario volendola tener sotto, batterla & urtarla. Et si vede che la si lascia piu vincere da questi, che da quelli che freddamente procedano. Et pero sempre (come donna) è amica de' giovani, perche son meno rispettivi, piu feroci è con piu audacia la comandano. — It is better, in my Opinion, to be impetuous, than respectful; because Fortune is a Woman; and, if you would get the better of her, you must use her ill: and it is plain, that she oftner submits to such Persons, than to those, who go coolly to work: for this reason, like a Woman, she favours the young, because they are less respectful, more fierce, and command her with more boldness.'

[L] His History is but a Mixture of good and bad Fortune. He confesses himself, in the Speech he made, when he resigned all his Dominions, That the greatest Prosperities, he ever had in the World, were mixed with so many Adversities, that he could say he never had any Contentment (36). It is pretended, that, after his Abdication, he was used to say, that one Day of his Solitude made him relish more Pleasure, than all his Triumphs had given him (37).

[M] Very different Things are said about the Motives of his Abdication. Strada observes, that the Abdication of This Emperor became a Subject of Declamation in the Schools. Non ignoro eam rem vario tunc hominum sermone fuisse disceptatam: bodieque declamatorum in Scholis (38), politicorum in aula, argumentum esse, Cæsarem abdicantem (39). Some have said, that, finding himself no longer able, by reason of his Infirmities, to support the Weight of his Glory, he wisely prevented the Shame of a greater Decay of his Reputation. It has been also said, that Spite at seeing his Fortune inferior to That of so young a Prince, as Henry II, though she had so often triumphed over That of Francis I, obliged him to forsake the World. I shall say, in the following Remarks, that the Spite at not being able to become a Pope, and the Desire he had to serve God according to the Rites of the Protestants, have passed for the Causes of his Retreat. But every one has not looked upon this great Action with a critical Mind. Some have said, that a sincere Desire to meditate on the Nothingness of this World, and on the solid Treasures of Heaven, inclined him to seek a Solitude, that, by the Exercise of Penance, he might expiate the Evils, which he had occasioned in Christendom, and prepare himself early and usefully for Death, by an intire Application to Things relating to his Salvation. See most of all these Things, and several others, nobly represented in Strada (40).

[N] — and the Occupations of his Solitude. He made choice of it in the Monastery of St Justus, situated near Placentia, on the Frontiers of Castile and Portugal. The Monks of That Monastery call themselves Hieronymites. He caused a little House to be built next to That Convent, made up of six or seven Rooms, and shut himself up in it in the Month of February, 1557. He kept only twelve Servants, and a Horse. He did not employ himself so much in the Exercises of Devotion, but that he amused himself with many other Things, as in taking the Air on Horse-back, in cultivating his Garden, in making Clocks, and Mechanical Experiments with a famous Engineer (41). Some Days before his Death, he caused his Funeral to be celebrated, and assisted personally at it (42). Some have said, that he endeavoured to make several Clocks agree together, with so much exactness, that they should all strike at the same Moment; and that this Design was not so difficult to execute, as the Agreement of Religions, which he had in his Head in the Time of the Interim. He had not so absolutely renounced the World, but that he enquired how the War went, and gave his Opinion about it; as appears from what he said and did, after he had heard this his Son, who was victorious at St Quintin, knew not how to make use of his Advantage. The Thing is related thus: 'Though he was a Monk, and half a Saint, yet he could not forbear (as it was said at that time, when the common Report of it ran every where) having heard, that the King his Son had gained the Battle of St Quintin, to ask the Courier, who brought him the News of it, if he had pursued his Victory as far as the Gates of Paris? And, being told that he had not, he said, that, at his Age, and in that Fortune, he would not have stopped in so fair a way, and would have run much better; and he was so vexed at it, that he would not see the Dispatches the Courier brought him (43). We must not forget what a young Monk said to him. 'The Emperor going one Morning, in his turn, to awake the other Monks, he found this, who was but a Novice, so fast asleep, that he could hardly awake him: The Novice getting up at last, against his Will, and being yet half asleep, could not forbear saying, that he ought to be satisfied with having disturbed the Quiet of the World, as long as he was in it, without coming to disturb the Quiet of those, who had left it (44). I have read a thing, that seems to me worthy to be mentioned. It is an Extract of a Piece, which Balzac had received from Rome, about the Retirement of Charles V.

(38) This puts me in mind of Juvenal's Words, Sat. 1. ver. 13. which shew, that the Scholars of his Time declaimed on the Abdication of Sylla. Et nos ergo manum ferule subduimus, & nos

Balzac (45) relates the beginning of it thus: 'When Charles, weary of the World, resolved to die under the Empire of his Brother, and under the Reign of his Son.' The Author of This Piece, after several moral Reflexions, tells this Story. 'Nevertheless, as there is nothing so clean, but slander may soil it, and nothing so good but that it may be misconstrued; some say, that This Prince repented of his Retirement, and was so much vexed at it, that it had even a little distracted him. For proof whereof, they tell this fabulous Story: They say, that he had Five hundred Crowns in a black Velvet Purse, which he would never part with, but carried it every Night to Bed with him: If we will believe them, he kissed, he caressed, he idolized, This Purse. And, after having displayed the Riches of the World, the Pearls and the Diamonds of so many Crowns, that he had wore, he became covetous of Five hundred Crowns. One of the King of Spain's natural Subjects formerly told me this Story; but I laughed at it, and put it among the apocryphal Tales. It is much more likely, that, if the Emperor repented of any thing in his Solitude, it was of having retired no sooner from the World; or, as an Italian Author speaks of it, of not having sooner cut short the Game of Fortune. For thereby, says he, he over-reached Fortune, though he is so strong, and knows so well how to bubble Men (46).

(46) Ibid. pag.

[O] Some pretend, that he soon repented of having resigned his Dominions to a Son, who shewed so little acknowledgment for it.] We are told of an Answer, which Philip II made to Cardinal de Granvelle; from which one might infer, that Charles V did not defer his Repentance till the next Day, and that his Desire to renounce Authority and Government, did not exceed the Twenty four Hours. 'It is this Day a Year, said Cardinal de Granvelle to King Philip, that the Emperor divested himself of all his Dominions. It is also this Day a Year, answered the King, that he repented of it.' They, who are not so malicious, pretend, that he did not begin to be sorry for the Loss of his Crowns, till, going through several Provinces of Spain, in his way to Burgos, he saw so few of the Nobility come to meet him. Besides, being come into That Town, he was obliged to wait no little time for the Sum, which he had reserved for himself. He had occasion for part of it, to reward his Domesticks, whom he was to discharge; and he was put off from Day to Day for the Payment of it; which displeased him much. I shall tell down a long Passage of Strada (47), where we meet with these Particulars, and wherein we shall see, that he affirms nothing about the Repentance in question (48). 'Quum in Cantabrigiam appulsus, ac profectus inde Burgos, raros admodum sibi obvios vidit Hispanos Procures, (quos nempe solus incomitatusque titulis suis Carolus non allegerat) sensit tum primum nuditatem suam. Accessitque illud, quod ex centum nummum aureorum millibus, (quem sibi reditum ex imensis opibus tantummodo seposuerat, quum eorum parte opus tunc esset, qua famulos aliquot donaret, dimitteretque; expectandum ei plusculum, nec sine stomacho Burgis fuit, dum ea videlicet summa aliquando redderetur. Quam ille offensionem sicut dissimulante haud tulit, ita occasionem nonnullis forte praeibit affirmandi, Regnis vix ejuratis, cepisse Carolum iniri consilii penitere. Quamquam alii ipso ejurationis die mutasse illum sententiam ex eo narrant, quod aliquot post annis, quum Cardinalis Granvellanus ex occasione Philippo Regi revocasset in mentem, Anniversarium illum esse diem, quo Carolus pater Imperio Regisque cesserat; responderit illico Rex, & hunc quoque diem Anniversarium esse quo illum cessisse penituit. Quod incerto rumore prolatus facile percipiebat apud homines, non sibi in tam inaudito facinore constantem vel unius diei persuadentes. Nisi forte Philippus non putavit in parente laudandum, quod

(48) After the Words, which I quote, he rejects this Repentance as a very ill grounded Report.

'imitandum sibi non statueret.' It has been pretended, that King Philip did much worse than not being punctual in the Payment of the Pension; for it is said, he lessened it by two thirds. Let us hear Brantome. 'I have read a strange thing in a little Book wrote in Flanders, intituled, The Apology of the Prince of Orange, which I neither will nor can believe, being published by the King of Spain's Enemies; though it may possibly be true: I affirm nothing but what I have seen and do certainly know, that out of a Hundred thousand Crowns, which he had reserved to himself, or other Revenues, the King his Son cut off two Thirds, so that most times he had not wherewith to maintain himself and his Servants, nor to give Alms, and exercise Charity towards his old Servants, and faithful Soldiers, which was a great Heart-breaking to him, and which hastened his Death (49). It may be said in general, that Ingratitude chiefly appears in the Behaviour of Children towards their Fathers.

[P] It is said, he did not forget to discipline himself.] Strada affirms it positively. 'Quin etiam plexo e funiculari tormento — exigere a sese anctas vitae pœnas perseverare cepit. Quos inde funiculos a Philippo Rege reverenter habitos, ab eo que morti proximo afferri ad se jussos, & ut erant cruore Caroli patris aspersi, filio Philippo Tertio traditos, inter Austriacæ monumenta Pietatis asseruari fama est (50). — Besides which, making a Scourge of small Cords — he began very severely to punish himself for his past Life. Which Scourge, being had in great Reverence by Philip II, and being ordered to be brought to him on his Death-bed, and delivered, stained, as it was, with his Father's Blood, to his Son, Philip III, is said to be kept among the Monuments of the Austrian Piety.' He is not the only Author, who says, that The Scourge, which Charles V made use of, and which is stained with his Blood, is kept as a kind of Relic. What he says, that King Philip II caused his Father's Scourge to be brought to him, and gave it to his Son, is confirmed by other Historians. You will find it in the Memoirs of Ciboerni (a) (51), and in Those of Brantome: I shall only quote the last. 'He caused also a disciplining Whip to be taken out of a little Chest, which was bloody at the ends; and, holding it up, he said; This Blood is of my Blood, yet not properly mine, but That of my Father, whom God absolve, who made use of this Whip: This I am willing to declare (52). Scioppius boasts to have handled This Whip in the Monastery of the Escorial. Quod ego in Monasterio Laurentiano manibus tractavi & Car. V. sanguine, ut aiebant, adhuc oblitum vidi. He rallies Strada, for having observed, that the same Whip is yet stained with Charles's Blood; for it is a Proof, says he, that the Descendants of That Emperor have let his Whip hang on a Hook, without lashing their Shoulders with it; which Scioppius would not have thought amiss. What he says there against Flagellation, is curious enough. 'Vereor ne Austriaci Principes pietatem suam frigide laudatam putent, cum flagellum illud adhuc Caroli sanguine notatum prædicetur: quod argumento est, id ipsos jam octoginta annos ferreatum de parietibus clavo pependisse, nec vel filii ejus vel nepotis ac pronepotum dorso molestiæ multum creasse (53).'

[Q] Some Authors speak very advantageously of his Piety.] William Zenocarus affirms, that Charles V composed Prayers for each Expedition he undertook, that he wrote them with his own Hand, that they were as long as the seven Penitential Psalms, and that, having caused them to be approved by his Confessors, he repeated them every Day in the midst of his Armies. Sometimes, when he felt devout Emotions and Compunctions, he stepped aside, under pretence of some natural Necessity, that he might be longer in the Fervour of Prayer. He gave Adrian Sylvanus these Prayers to keep, with order to tear them to Pieces, and throw them into the Air, if any Misfortune should happen to him. Many, having that he died almost a Lutheran [8]. The first of these two things is more probable ing observed the Time, which This Emperor employed in his Prayers, said, that he spoke often to God than to Men (54).

[R] — others pretend, that he had more Ambition than Religion. They maintain, that the desire he had to aggrandize himself, to the Prejudice of Francis I, was the Cause that he suffered Solyman to take Belgrade and Rhodes, and that he did not make use of the favourable Occasions, which God put into his Hands, against the Turks, either in Hungary, or Africa. He would rather ravage France, than make use of the Advantages he had gained over the Infidels. He is accused of having encouraged Lutheranism, which he might easily have extirpated. He found his Advantage in the Divisions, which That Sect caused, and made use of them sometimes against the Pope, sometimes against France, and sometimes against Germany itself. It is said, he rejected the Offers, which the Protestants made him, to serve him against the Turks, if they might have Liberty of Conscience; but he granted it to them, when they promised him to renounce their Alliance with France (55). If it be so, it cannot be denied, that This is an Example of what I have said in other Places (56) concerning THE RELIGION OF SOVEREIGNS. As Men, they are zealous for their Religion; they pray to God; they go devoutly to Church; but as soon as they consider themselves invested with the Quality of Sovereigns, they think only of conquering their Enemies, and vigorously attack, not those, who are most opposite to their Belief, but those, whom they hate most, out of Fear or Jealousy, though they were the greatest Support of their Religion. For the rest, a great Falshood has been published in the Life of Charles V (57). It is This: 'Being obliged to avoid Duke Maurice (for he was only attended with six fixeremen); the Princes of Germany proposed to him, that, if he would but command, that their Opinions should be examined, they would supply him with a Hundred thousand Men, to oppose the Turks, who invaded Hungary, and that they would maintain them, till he had made himself Master of Constantinople. He answered, that he would purchase no Kingdoms at so dear a rate, nor Europe itself on such a Condition; but that he only desired JESUS CHRIST crucified (58). It is certain, that, after the Flight of Charles V before Maurice, the Protestants obtained almost every thing they asked for. See Maimbourg's History of Lutheranism (59). I refer you thither, because it is a Book an hundred times more common than Sleidan, Ibuanus, and Cytreus, quoted by Maimbourg.

[S] — and that he died almost a Lutheran.' This Brantome shall be the first, that I quote: 'This Book (60) even says, that it was once decreed by the Inquisition of Spain, the King his Son being present, and consenting to it, to take up his Body, and cause him to be burnt as an Heretic, (What Cruelty!) for having in his Life-time spoken slightly of Religion; for which reason he was unworthy of Burial in holy Ground, and deserved to be burnt like a Faggot; and also, that he had too much adhered to the Opinions of the Archbishop of Toledo, who was held a Heretic, and was for that Reason kept a long time Prisoner in the Inquisition, and rendered incapable, and deprived of his Bishopric, which was worth a hundred or sixscore thousand Ducats: This was indeed the ready way to make it believed, that he was an Heretic, and to have his Estate and his Spoils (61).' The other Author, whom I shall quote, gives a more curious detail of all this. 'The strangest of all the Reports, says he (62), spread abroad about the Emperor's Retreat, was, that the continual Correspondence, which he had with the Protestants of Germany, had given him some Inclination for their Opinions, and that he had hid himself in Solitude, to have the Liberty of ending his Days in the Exercises of Piety, agreeable to his secret Dispositions. He made choice of Persons, all suspected of Heresy, for his spiritual Guides, as, Dr Caçalla his Preacher, the Archbishop of Toledo, and chiefly Constantine Pontius, Bishop of Dresse, and his Director. It was known afterwards, that the Cell, in which he died at St Justus, was filled on all sides with Writings of his own hand about Justification and Grace, which favoured of the Doctrine of the Innovators (63). But nothing confirmed this Opinion so much as his Will. There were almost no pious Legacies in it, or Foundations for Prayers; and it was made in such a different manner from Those of the zealous Catholics, that the Inquisition of Spain thought they might very well be offended at it. Nevertheless, they durst not break out before the King's Arrival: but that Prince having signalized his Arrival in That Country by the Punishment of all the Partizans of the new Opinion, the Inquisition, being grown bolder by his Example, attacked first of all the Archbishop of Toledo, then the Emperor's Preacher, and, lastly, Constantine Pontius. The King suffering them to be imprisoned, the People looked upon his Patience as a Masterpiece of his Zeal for the true Religion; but the rest of Europe saw, with Horror, the Confessor of the Emperor Charles, in whose Arms That Prince died, and who had as it were received That great Soul into his Bosom, delivered up to the most cruel and shameful Punishment by the Hands of his own Son. In effect, in the Sequel of the Process, the Inquisition, bethinking themselves of accusing these three Persons of having had a Hand in the Emperor's Will, they were so audacious, as to condemn them to be burnt with the Will. The King awaked at this Sentence, as at a Clap of Thunder. At first, the Jealousy of his Father's Glory made him take some Pleasure in seeing his Memory exposed to That Affront; but afterwards, having considered the Consequences of That wicked Attempt, he hindered the Effect of it by the mildest and most secret means he could pitch upon, to save the Honour of the Holy Office, and to make no breach in the Authority of That Tribunal. — In the mean time, Dr Caçalla was burnt alive, with a Phantom representing Constantine Pontius, who died some Days before in the Prison. The King was constrained to permit This Execution, to oblige the Holy Office to consent, that the Archbishop of Toledo might appeal to Rome, and to speak no more of the Emperor's last Will. If these things be true, the Emperor must have been the greatest Hypocrite that ever was, or the Historians, who speak of his Devotions (64), and Hatred of Heretics (65), have greatly imposed upon us. It is pretended, that he reckoned it one of his Crimes, that he had not caused Luther to be burnt, notwithstanding the safe Conduct he had granted him (66).

Turn to the Remarks of the Article of Carranza, where you will find several things concerning this Matter. What follows may pass for a Supplement, and will point out some Faults of the Author of Don Carlos's History. I. The Spanish Historians do not agree, that Constantine Pontius (67) was Charles's Director, or Confessor; they allow, that he had been his Preacher. II. He was not Bishop of Dresse. I find no Bishopric in Spain, or any where else, of that Name. It is true, Ibuanus speaks of an Episcopus Drossensis (68) (it is doubtless what deceived the Author of Don Carlos's History), but he does not say, that That Bishop was Constantine Pontius; he was a Preacher of Seville, whose Name was Giles, who held the same Opinions, and underwent the same Fate, with Constantine Pontius; for they both died before the Auto de Fé was held, and were both burnt in Effigy (69). This Giles was nominated by the Emperor to the Bishopric of Tortosa (70). It is not true, that the Inquisition did not begin to attack Dr Caçalla, and Constantine Pontius, till Philip came into Spain; he did not arrive there till the beginning of September 1559; and those two Persons were in the Prisons of the Inquisition before the Death of Charles V, which happened, as every one knows, the Twenty first of September 1558. The Count de la Roca relates what was said by the said Emperor on occasion of the Sentence against Caçalla (71) and the Imprisonment of Constantine (72). Another Historian (73) says, probable than the last. The Apology of the Prince of Orange is improperly alledged upon this Occasion [T]. Charles V was not free from human Infirmities say, that Caçalla, in whose House the Assemblies of the Protestants were held at Valladolid, was executed the Twenty first of March 1559, whilst Philip was still in the Netherlands. IV. Constantine Pontius, having been imprisoned by the Inquisition, in Charles's Life-time, did That Monarch no Service on his Death-bed; so far was he from receiving That Great Soul into his Bosom. Thuanus deceived the Author of Don Carlos's History: which ought to be a Warning to all Authors not to trust blindly to any body. Constantinus qui a sacris confessionibus diu Caesari eique in solitudine sua post imperii ac regnorum abdicationem, ac postremo animam agenti semper praesto fuerat, ad idem mox tribunal raptus, &c (74). — Constantine, who was long Confessor to the Emperor, both before, and after, his Abdication, and at the time of his Death, was soon after called to the same Tribunal.

(74) Thuan. ubi supra.

If one goes astray in following Thuanus, what may not one fear in following mean Historians? V. Any Reflexion against Philip, by virtue of a pretended Permission granted by him to imprison Caçalla and Constantine, after his Return into Spain, is chimerical: for those two Persons were in Prison before the Emperor's Death. VI. Some Historians (75) say, that Caçalla repented, and endeavoured in vain to convert one of his Accomplices, whose Obstinacy was so great, that he suffered himself to be burnt alive: This is to say plainly enough, that Caçalla was not burnt till after his Death.

(75) Herrera, Historia General. ubi supra.

VII. However, he was not burnt alive with a Phantom representing Constantine Pontius; for the Execution of Caçalla was performed in the Auto de Fé of the Twenty first of March 1559, at Valladolid, and That of Constantine Pontius in another Auto de Fé at Seville (76).

(76) Ibid.

VIII. The King did not oblige the Holy Office to consent, that the Archbishop of Toledo should appeal to Rome; for, in the first place, That Archbishop's Cause was not brought to the Court of Rome by an Appeal; but the Pope ordered it to be brought before him; and the same Pope, who would have had the Inquisition of Spain send him That Prisoner at first, and who found himself obliged to consent to the Proceedings of That Tribunal, always reserved the definitive Sentence to himself (77). In the second place, King Philip was so far from desiring, that Carranza should appeal to Rome, that he opposed a long time the Instances, which the Pope made, to refer That Archbishop's Case to him. The Fathers of the Council of Trent complained several times to the Legates of what the Inquisition of Spain practised toward Carranza; the Legates wrote to the Pope about it; the Pope charged his Nuncios to act vigorously; and you will see, in Palavicini (78), that They, who believe, that his Holiness did not shew all the necessary Vigour in it, must be such, as do not consider the necessity, he was in, to yield to Philip's Opposition, through a Principle of Prudence.

(77) Palavic. Hist. Concilii Trident. lib. 21. cap. 7. n. 7.

You will find none of these Remarks in the Thoughts of a Man of Wit on the Novel intitled Don Carlos (79); and yet That witty Writer does his best to criticize That Novel in every thing. This surprises me; for, should a Man set up for a public Censor of a Book, without knowing whether it offends against History?

(78) Ibid.

[T] The Apology of the Prince of Orange is improperly alledged.] Brantome boasts to have read in it, that King Philip II consented, that the Body of Charles should be taken up, and burnt as a Heretic. He is mistaken; and perhaps I have discovered the cause of his Error. I conjecture, that he had read That Apology, bound with some other small Pieces, published against Philip II, in favour of Prince William. He either thought, that all those Pieces belonged to the Apology; or he did not remember, in which of those Pieces he found what he relates: and, as the Idea of the Apology had more strongly affected him, he persuaded himself, that he had read This strange Fact in the Apology. The Truth is, This Reproach is not to be found there (80), but we meet with it in an anonymous Piece, published in the Year 1582, under this Title, A Discourse on the Wound of his Highness the Prince of Orange. Wherein we read these Words: "Can

(80) Note, that the Prince's Silence is a Sign, that he found no ground for it: for he does not spare Philip II any where, but reproaches him with shocking crimes: he would have as freely reproached him with this, if he had thought it true.

there be a more wretched Creature than such an ungrateful Son, and so unnatural towards such a Father as the Emperor Charles was; an Emperor of such great Renown and Authority, who had in his Life-time given such great Riches to a wretched Son, and had reserved but Two hundred thousand Ducats of Income on Spain, and who nevertheless received nothing of it after he deprived himself of his Kingdoms. A Son, I say, who let such a Father pass the rest of his Days with Monks, and suffered him to live on the Remainder of his Jewels, and upon his Goods, which he was forced to sell and pawn for his Subsistence? An ungrateful Son, who suffered the Inquisitors to deliberate, whether they ought to dig up his Father's Bones and burn them as of an Heretic, for having conselt, at his Death, on the Remembrance of the Archbishop of Toledo, that he depended on the sole Merits of JESUS CHRIST, and had no hopes in any other. An unnatural Son, who deprived That good Archbishop of his whole Estate, for having assisted the Emperor till his Death, and for having instructed him in the way to Salvation; and who kept him Prisoner, till he was forced to let him go to Rome; where, after That good Archbishop had gained his Cause, he was poisoned by This King's Ministers, for fear he should enjoy again the yearly Income of Two hundred thousand Ducats, which the Archbishopric of Toledo is worth. If this were found in the Apology of the Prince of Orange, there would be some reason for inserting it in a History; for the Name of so great a Prince, and the Authority wherewith his Manifesto was clothed, are good Securities: but as for those many Pamphlets, which were published in those times, without the Authors or Printers Names, they deserve no more to be quoted, than those, which have overflowed Europe within these thirty or forty Years, printed by Peter Marteau. Not but that there are some Truths in this kind of Writings, whether they were dispersed abroad in the time of the Duke of Alba, and during the Remainder of the XVIth Century, or whether they did not appear till our times; but, after all, whilst it is not known from whence they come, Prudence will not permit us to depend on them; and much less can a grave Author adopt what he finds in them. Commonly these Pamphlets are the Drainings of the Newfongers; those that forge them, being sure they shall never be accountable for them, rashly advance any thing upon Hear-say. We see a plain Falshy here concerning the Archbishop of Toledo. He did not gain his Cause, but was obliged to abjure; he was suspended for five Years (81), and he was Seventy three Years of Age: could it be imagined, that he could live above five Years after such a long Imprisonment? However, they would not have made away with him, till the five Years were near expiring. One may even maintain, that all that is given out in the Apology of the Prince of Orange is not true. Gratius affirms, that both He who drew it up, and He who drew up the Decree of Proscription of this Prince, mixed Truth and Falshood in their Digressions (82). 'Adversus novi moris Edictum Arausionensis apud Ordines Belgicos & Christianos Principes libello se defendit, adjuvante Petro Villerio (83), homine Gallo, qui subactum rebus forensibus ingenium, ad religionem docendam, & hinc ad intima Arausionensis consilia transfulerat, Extat Scriptum utrumque pari acerbitate, qua post crimina ad causam pertinentia, hinc animum in gratum & perduellem, inde seavam ac perfidam Dominationem, VERIS FALSISQUE NARRATIONIBUS PERMIXTIS, porro ad alia, rixantium more, prolabantur. — Against this Edit of a new kind, the Prince of Orange defended himself before the States of Holland, and the Christian Powers, in a Book, written with the Assistance of Peter Villiers, a Frenchman, who had turned the Bent of his Mind from following the Law to teach Religion, and from thence had gained the Confidence of the Prince of Orange. ties as to Women; and he was much more sober, than chaste [U]. He died the Twenty first of September 1558, in the Monastery of the Hieronymites, which he had pitched upon for his Retreat. His Body was left deposited there, till the Arrival of King Philip II in Spain. A magnificent Funeral was made for him some time after. That, which was made for him at Brussels, in the Church of St Gudule, was very sumptuous: none of his Exploits were forgotten in the Inscriptions, which adorned the Church (c); and I do not believe, that so many Titles were ever given to any Prince in the World, as were given him at that time. If the Subject was great, the Imagination and Rhetoric of the Spaniards were so likewise; and certainly the Historians of This Prince would have done more Honour to his Memory, if they had not been so excessive in their Praises. One Page of Tbuanus (d) is to be preferred before a Volume of Sandoval, because Tbuanus, a good Frenchman, is not suspected of Flattery. They have not failed to observe, that divers Prefaces distinguished This Emperor's Death (e). It is also reported, that his dead Body was preserved from Putrefaction [X]. His Life was published in Italian in the Year 1559, by a Spaniard, whose Name was Alphonfus Ulloa; and since that time many other Pens have been exercised on this noble Subject [Y]. I have forgot to observe, that, it has been said, that, posse, such as Ingratitude, and a treacherous Disposition on one side, and a tyrannical and perfidious use of Power on the other, WITH A MIXTURE OF TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD, like Persons that quarrel, they were insensibly led to other matters.' [U] He was much more sober than chaste. 'It is reported - - - that he always drank three times at his Dinner and Supper; and he was very sober in his eating and drinking. When he lay with a fair Lady (for he loved Women, and indeed too much considering his Gout) he never left her, till he had enjoyed her three times (84). Here is a great Inequality in the same number; three Draughts of Wine at Table, and three Draughts of Love in Bed, do not deserve the same Qualification; the first is an Act of Moderation, the last of Excess. It was the way not to expose himself to this Reproach:

Inachia langues minus ac me. to vindi
Inachiam ter nocte potes: mihi semper ad unum Mollis opus (85).
Inachias thrice you may enjoy,
Once does my feeble Passion cloy.

That my Readers may have wherewith to exercise themselves, by examining whether Brantome is more to be credited than others, I shall say, that William Zencarus not only praises Charles's Frugality, but also his Chastity. This Emperor, says he (86), often shut his Windows, when he saw fine Women coming, or when he knew they were to pass by. The Author, who relates this (87), says, that this Prince did so in the Emperor's Life-time. Others have observed, that he was true to his Empress (88), and that he concealed his amorous Intrigues (89), as much as he could; Si non capis, saltem cautes.

Commonly they give him but two natural Children, Margaret, Duchess of Parma, and Don John of Austria; but Mr Imhofius says, that Bernard Justiniani, in his History of Spain, gives him two more, to wit, Priamus Conrad of Austria, and another John of Austria, who died in the Year 1530, at seven Years of Age (90). I believe, that this Priamus Conrad, is the same with a certain Priamus Conrad, whom I have mentioned in another place (91), who passed for an uterine Brother of Don John of Austria. Note, that a Report was spread, that Charles V had the Pox. 'Imperator, ut nonnulli confirmant, ex morbo Gallico laborat. Accedit ad morbum hujus belli (Turci) impendentis metus. Hanc ego in malis voluptatem capio, quod eum qui in nos tam crudelis fuit, non solum copore ægrotare, verum etiam animo angere videre mihi videor (92).' This is what we find in a Letter of Bunel, dated from Venice in the Month of June 1532. And here is the Remark, which Mr Graveler made on That Passage: 'An illud (ex morbo Gallico) καλὰ ῥέστα, an in sensu mystico intelligendum sit, disquirant multi: sane quæ sequuntur, Imperatorem ex morbo venerico laborasse confirmant: utatur quique hac in re judicio suo. Hoc unum scio, non omnes qui gravius sunt supercilii, rigidæ virtutis esse sequa-ces: amavit Franciscus I. amavit & Carolus V. & ne quid tam strenuo rivali in ludo amatorio exprobraret, morbo etiam Gallico laboravit. Felix! & nimium felix, si gravius non laborasset, sed non runt Hispani quid sit el remedio de Carlos quinto.

[X] It was given out - - - that his dead Body was preserved from Putrefaction. Some Spanish Authors maintain, that it is preserved whole (93); and, because it was not embalmed, they attribute this Exemption from Corruption to his Sanctity and the admirable Candor, which they say were eminent in This Prince's Conduct. 'Cum nullis balsamis aut medicamentis pollinctum fuerit regale cadaver, quæ à corruptione præservare potuissent, ipso Imperatore sic ante obitum jubente; quid aliud dicere possumus, nisi eximium illius animi candorem & virtutis splendorem, cujus ingens semper dedit specimen, posteris Deum ostendere voluisse? cujus adhuc multo antea certissima indicia præstolatos fuerat: nam cum anno 14. ab illius obitu, in cenobio S. Justi corpus exhumaretur, non solum integrum & incorruptum inventum est, sed thymi quoque ramusculi, quibus monachorum more respersum fuerat, virides & optimum odorem adhuc spirantes apparuerunt (94). — Since the Royal Corps had not been embalmed, to preserve it from Putrefaction, according to the Emperor's dying Command, what can we say, but that God intended to let Posterity see the remarkable Candor, and exemplary Virtue, which always shone forth in This Prince? Of this we have a remarkable Instance: for, when his Body was interred in the Monastery of St Justus, fourteen Years after his Death, it was not only found entire and uncorrupted, but even the Sprigs of Thyme, with which, after the Monks' Manner, it was firewed, appeared still green, and of a most excellent Scent. — Anno 1656, cum potentissimi Regis nostri PHILIPPI justis antecessorum suorum regia cadavera ad insigne illud Pantheonis monumentum traducerentur, invictissimi Imperatoris Caroli V. cadaver adhuc incorruptum repertum est, labe nulla, nulla temporis edacitate, aut patredinis carie infectum; spectaculum sane mirificum, & plane admirandum, post annos 96 incorruptum permansisse, ut tradit P. F. Franciscus de los Sanctos, in Descriptione Fabricæ D. Laurentii & Pantheonis (95). — In the Year 1656, when, by Command of our most potent King PHILIP, the Royal Bodies of his Ancestors were translated to the famous Monument of the Pantheon, the Body of the most invincible Emperor Charles V was found uncorrupted, and uninjured by Time, or Putrefaction; a surprising thing, that it should continue uncorrupted after Ninety six Years; as we read in Franciscus de los Sanctos, in his Description of the Fabric of St Laurence, and the Pantheon.

[Y] His Life was published — in 1559 by Alphonfus Ulloa; and, since that, many other Pens have been exercised on this Subject. Lewis Dolce wrote This Emperor's History. William Zencarus of Schawenburg wrote it also (96). La vida del Emperador Carlos V. por Don Antonio Figueroa was printed at Brussels, in 4to, in the Year 1656. La vida in order to taste of all sorts of Government, he aspired to be Pope [Z]. If he had been treated, in that Station, as he treated Clement VII, he would have been very sorry: his Withes had been heard. It is pretended, that the Ravages of Alaric and Totila, and, in general, all that the most barbarous People ever did in Rome, does not come near the Excesses, which the Army of Charles V committed there. There was a remarkable Circumstance attending it: This Prince put himself in Mourning for That Victory: he forbade the Ringing of Bells (f), and ordered Processions, and public Prayers, to be made in all the Churches, for the Pope's Deliverance, who was his Prisoner (g), and yet he did not punish any of those, who treated the Pope and the City of Rome so basely (h). These Arts of deep Policy have not been less taken notice of, than Those, which he made use of in the Rebellion of Naples [AA]. They, who prefer him to the greatest Men of Europe since the Romans (i), flatter him; for what did he finish? Did not the War, which he made in the Empire for his Religion, end to the Advantage of the Protestants? And he was so far from having conquered any thing from France, that he had not Strength enough to recover what That Crown had conquered. If his Successor recovered the chief part of it, it was by a Treaty of Peace, in which France suffered herself to be bubbled, and shamefully betrayed.

The Historians of Charles V have too much imitated the Poets: They often heap together many Prodigies, by which they pretend his Victories were preceded. This they did chiefly as to the Battle of Mulberg, which he gained the Twenty fourth of April 1547. They say, that the Sun stopp'd its Course [BB], and that God wrought the same Miracle in favour of his Catholic Majesty, as he had done for Jesuba. A Prophecy was spread abroad, which promised This Emperor the

Defeat

Hechos del Emperador Carlos V. por Prudencio de Sandoval, came out at Pampelona, in the Year 1614, in two Volumes in Folio (97). I omit the rest; and, if one were to reckon up all those, who have written some parts of this History, it would be endless (98). I shall only speak of William Godeleweus, who wrote the History of the Abdication. But let us not forget James Masenius, a German Jesuit, who published, at Cologne, in the Year 1672, in 4to, Anima biforiae hujus temporis in juncto Caroli V. & Ferdinandi I. fratrum imperio representata. This Work deserves to be mentioned by the Jesuit, who continued Allegambe.

[Z] It has been said, that — he aspired to be Pope. Brantome, whom I have already quoted several times, is the only Author, in whom I have read this Particular. — If he had been able, says he (99), to have accomplished the Design he had to be Pope, he would have enlightened the World better, as being a divine Man; but he could not be elected by the Votes of the Cardinals, as Amedeus Duke of Savoy was, who retired afterwards to his Monastery of Ripaille, as the Emperor retired also to his. Nevertheless I have heard say, that, if he had had as much Strength of Body as of Mind, he would have gone to Rome with a powerful Army, to get himself elected, for Love, or by Force; but he attempted it too late, not being so brisk as formerly. Neither did God suffer it; for he would have made the Papacy hereditary (a thing never heard of) in the House of Austria. What Ambition! Failing of this Design, he turned Monk; this was great condescension. If he had tasted of the Papacy, as the above-mentioned Duke did, it would have been better for him; and, when he was dying, he might have said, that he had gone through all the Orders of good Fortune, and taken all the Degrees of Grandeur. The Chancellor de Chiverni observes (100), that it was believed, King Philip II would resign his Dominions, and take a Cardinal's Hat, that he might be elected Pope on the first occasion.

[AA] He made use of Policy, in the Rebellion of Naples. He rewarded the Chiefs of the Rebels, and gave nothing to those, who had served him faithfully. Omnes qui Cæsarem adjuverunt, qui bona, qui vitam pro eo deposuerunt, irremunerati remanserunt; qui adversæ factionis hostes illius nati sunt, qui arma contra illum tulerunt, omnes fuerunt optime & secundum vota sua expediti. This is what we find in Agrippa's Letters (101). This Conduct seems at first imprudent; for it may disgust good Subjects, and embolden the Factious. But Experience must have taught the contrary; for the greatest Princes have, and do still make use of this Method. They neglect those, whom they think themselves sure of, and labour chiefly to gain those, whom they distrust. Complaints, like those of the Prodigal Son's Brother, are frequent among loyal Subjects, when Troubles are pacified. In the time of Henry the Great, the Leaguers obtained more Preferments (a), than the old Servants (102). It is a Policy, which serves for a present Remedy, which Princes stand in need of: they expose themselves thereby to a future Danger; but they hope God will prevent it; and, after all, it is not a certain Evil.

[a.] Let us here produce what John Nerizian has said on the same Subject. 'Quandoque, says, this factious Writer, Principes, ut inimicum vincat obsequio — eum plus extollit servitorem suo; adeo quod quandoque boni servitores indignati dicant; Si quispiam a Principe nostro velit quicquam obtinere, oportet quod in eum aliquam committat prodicionem. — Sometimes a Prince, that he may conquer his Enemy by Obsequiousness, extols him more than his own Servant; inasmuch, that his faithful Servants may sometimes, through indignation, say; whoever would obtain any thing of our Prince, must betray him. — The Discourse of La Ruffia seems to have these Words in view.' REM. CRIT.]

[BB] His Historians — have heaped together many Prodigies — they say, that the Sun stopp'd its Course. I have not Lewis d'Avila's Relation in Spanish; but here is a Passage out of it, according to the Latin Translation (103). The Author speaks as an Eye-witness: 'Fæderico etiam futura clades evidenti prodigio denuntiata est. Sol enim velut sanguinolentus apparuit, & quod mirabilis est, perinde ac si corium tardasset, spatiumque diei addidisset, quum intentius intueremur, aliorum, quam pro horarum ratione, ferri visus est. Constant omnium hac de re opinio est, nec ego certe resellere ausim (104). — A manifest Prodigy foretold the impending Defeat of Fæderic. For the Sun appeared as it were bloody, and, what is more wonderful, as if it had retarded its Course, and lengthened the Day, when we looked more intently on it, it was seen bigger, than it should have been. This Event is universally believed, nor dare I contradict it.' Florimond de Remond mentions the same Passage (105), according to the French Translation, of this Spanish Work. He sets down also the Italian words of Baptista Gribaldi, who was present at the Action, and the Spanish Terms of Gonzalo de Illesca, taken from the second part of his Pontifical History, and the Latin Verses of an anonymous Author, and endeavours to prove, that the Fact is true. He has taken advantage, among other things, of Sleidan's not refusing Lewis d'Avila on this Stop of Defeat of the French, That of the Turks, the Conquest of Palestine, &c [CC.] We shall speak a word concerning a Lilly, that he had planted in the Garden of his Solitude [DD]. I cannot tell whether any Reflexion was ever made on a remarkable

the Sun, though he appears to be very angry with him. But Father Maimbourg laughed at this Spanish Vision, and at some others relating to the same Battle, and confuted them by some Arguments (106). He has not forgot to say, that 'the Duke of Alba, a very solid Man, who paid no regard to Trifles, made it appear, that he did believe any thing of what was said of this pretended Miracle, when, being come into France, to marry the Princess Elizabeth Daughter of Henry II, in King Philip's Name, he pleasantly answered That Prince, who asked him some Questions about it, That he was so busy that Day about what passed on Earth, that he took no notice of what was done in Heaven. Florimond de Remond mentions this Answer of the Duke of Alba, and tells his Readers, that he had it from a Gentleman of Biscay, Governour of Aegs, who spoke and lived after the old manner, in those times, being very familiar with the King, and his Favourite (107). Observe this well: This Historian had not met with this Particular in any Book; he had it from a Gentleman, who was then at the Court of Henry II. Perhaps he is the first Author, who published it, and from whom all the rest have taken it; and perhaps, if he had not mentioned it, we should not find it in the History of the Duke of Alba (108), lately published in French, as a Translation of a Latin Book, printed at Salamanca in the Year 1669, under the Title of Vita Ferdinandi Toletani Ducis Albani. The Author of the Translation protests he has made it with all possible exactness, and that he has added nothing of his own, nor curtailed it.

[CC.] A Prophecy was spread abroad which promised This Emperor the Defeat of the French, That of the Turks, The Conquest of Palestine, &c.] Antony Pontus, who bore Arms in the Expedition of Tunis under Charles V, wrote an Account of it, which was not published till a Year ago (109). He says, in his Preamble, that he will relate two things, to raise the Soldier's Courage; the one is an old Prophecy; the other is the Discourse of an Apparition, at the time of the Expedition of Odet de Foix in the Kingdom of Naples. Let us omit what concerns this Apparition, and content our selves with what relates to the Prophecy. 'Duo hæc ante præbentur, non quod historici interserunt, sed ut animi nostrorum militum alacres nunc his auditis ad arma fiant alacriores. Quorum illud unum imprimis subvenit, & ut vulgissimum ita quoque antiquissimum vatis illius, quæ propheta dicitur, verbum divinum, quod quidem tale circumfertur, Carolum Philippum filium ex natione Lillii, ut ejus verba præstingam, post Gallos Hispanosque domitos Romam quoque & Florentiam congregato magno exercitu Regem Græcorum vocari, indeque post victos Turcas, Chaldaeos, Palæstinofque, sanctam Hierusalem recuperaturum, atque inibi à Dei nuncio coronatum in summi Principis sinu vitam expiraturum, facietque prius edictum, ut qui sanctæ Crucis signum non adoraverit morte puniatur (110). Take these two Particulars by way of Specimen; not that the History requires them, but to enflame the Courage of our Soldiers by these Relations. The first that occurs, is, That well known and ancient Prophecy, which foretold, that Charles, the Son of Philip, of the Nation of the Lilly, to use the Prophet's expression, after having conquered the French and Spaniards, as also Rome and Florence, with a mighty Army, would be called The King of the Greeks; and that, having subdued the Turks, Chaldaeos, and the Inhabitants of Palestine, he would recover the holy City Jerusalem, and, being there crowned by the Messenger of GOD, would give up his Soul in the bosom of the Supreme Prince, having first decreed, that whoever shall not adore the sign of the holy Cross should be punished with Death. Compare this with a Prophecy, which David Pareus inserted in his Commentary on the Revelations in the Year 1598, and you will find a Specimen of the Frauds, which are committed in such cases. The Sieur Comiers relates (111), that, being at Orange in the Year 1660, they lent him this Work of Pareus, printed at Heidelberg, and that he read a Prophecy, in the 930th Page, which the Authors had found in adibus Præpositi Salezziani, and which contained these words: 'Surget Rex ex Natione illustissimi Lillii, habens frontem longam, supercilia alta, oculos longos, nasumque aquilinum: Is congregabit Exercitum magnum, & omnes Tyrannos Regni sui destruet, & morte percutiet omnes fugientes in montibus, & cavernis sese abscondentes à facie ejus. Nam ut Sponsus Sponsæ, ita erit justitia ei associata; cum illis usque ad quadragesimum annum deducet bellum, subjugando Insulas, nos, Hispanos, & Italos. Romam & Florentiam destruet & comburet, poterique sal seminare super terram illam. Clericos qui Sedem Petri invaserunt morte percutiet: eodemque anno duplicem Coronam obtinebit. Postremum, mare transiens cum exercitu magno, intrabit Græciam, & Rex Græcorum vocabitur. Turcas & Barbaros subjugabit, faciendo Edictum: Quicumque Crucifixum non adoraverit, morte morietur. Et non erit qui resistere poterit ei, quia brachium sanctum à Domino semper cum eo erit, & dominium Terræ possidebit. His factis Sanctorum requies Christianorum vocabitur, &c. — A King shall arise, of the most illustrious Nation of the Lilly, having a long forehead, lofty Eye-brows, large Eyes, and an aquiline Nose. This King shall gather together a great Army, and destroy all the Tyrants of his Kingdom, and shall smite with Death every one flying to the Mountains, and hiding themselves in Caverns from his Face. For as a Bridegroom to a Bride, so shall Justice be united to him: with them he shall continue to wage War to the Fortieth Year, subduing the Islanders, the Spaniards, and Italians. He shall destroy, and burn, Rome, and Florence, and it shall be that Salt may be sowed on that Land. He will put to Death the Clergy who have usurped the Seat of St Peter, and the same Year he will obtain a double Crown. Afterwards, passing the Sea, with a great Army, he shall enter Greece, and shall be called The King of the Greeks. He shall subdue the Turks and Barbarians, making an Edict, that whoever will not adore JESUS CHRIST crucified, shall die. And no one shall be able to resist him, because the holy Arm of the LORD shall be always with him, and he shall possess the Dominion of the Earth. When these things are done, it shall be called the Rest of the holy Christians, &c.' Comiers gives a French Translation of this in Prose and Verse, and adds (112), 'That he found the same Prophecy, but in different terms, in the ninth Volume of St Augustin's Works, in the middle of the Treatise concerning Anti-Christ (113), pag. 454, of the Impression of Lyons, in the Year 1586.' And note, that he applies both these Prophecies to Lewis XIV. 'As the Conquest of the World, says he (114), is not the Work of one Day, we ought at least to hope, that, in the next Year 1666, our Great Monarch will lay the first Foundations of That Universal Empire.' But take more particular notice of the Fraud of Charles V's Flatterers; they took hold of the first of these two Predictions, and to make it square with that Emperor; they curtailed it on the one side, and enlarged it on the other; they inserted his Father's and his own Name in it, as also the Conquest of France, and left out the aquiline Nose, and some other Features of the Face. I have seen some good People, infatuated with Prophecies, who, during the last War (115), applied all this pretended Oracle, as well as they could, to his Britannic Majesty King William. Observe, in the last place, the Confession of Pontus, that he published the Prophecy, to give more Courage to Charles V's Soldiers, and be persuaded, that most of These Inventors, or Promoters, of Predictions, propose nothing to themselves, but to amuse the Mob, and to inspire them with such Passions, as they wish them to be filled with; and, to succeed the better in it, they make use both of Subreption and Obreption.

[DD] We shall speak a word concerning a Lilly, which he had planted in the Garden of his Solitude. He planted it the latter end of August 1558; and he died the twenty first of September following. At markable Circumstance of the Siege of Metz. He formed no Enterprize more just than That, and of which the Success proved more unfortunate [EE]. I must not pass over in silence what he said to Francis I; You and I reign over Men so hot, so fierce, so boisterous, that, if we do not make War with each other by intervals, to amuse them, and to cool their Martial Impetuosity, our own Subjects will fight against us, which will be much worse (k). He left an Instruction to his Son, wherein, among other Advices, he gave him this; 'to strike fail when the Storm is too great, not to oppose the violence of angry Fate; dexterously to ward off the Blows, which one cannot bear; to let them pass; to lye by, and observe the opportunity of some favourable Revolution, and a better time (l).' He practised this Advice at the Peace of Passaw, which would have been disgraceful to the Empire, if Necessity, rather than the Emperor's Inclination, had not made it. He practised it also at the Peace of Soissons, where a Scarcity of Money interrupted the Success of his Arms; and he was compelled to offer himself as an Hostage to the Germans, who otherwise formed a design to seize him (m). Both he and his Son thought themselves capable of making good use of Opportunities; for it was one of their Sayings, To y el tiempos para dos otros, I, and Opportunity, against two Others (n). The Author, whom I quote (o), relates a thing, which equally shews This Emperor's Curiosity for Astronomy, and his Intrepidity. The Magnificence, with which the Fuggers received him in their House at Augsburg, ought not to be forgotten [FF].

the moment of his Death the Root of this Lilly shot forth a Stalk two Cubits high, with a marvelous Flower, as full blown and as odoriferous as those kind of Flowers are used to be in Spain in their usual Season. I make use of the Terms, which the Superior of the Fathers of the Oratory of Paris employed in haranguing the Queen of Spain, in the Year 1679 (116). I omit the ridiculous Preface, which he found in this Vegetation (117); but I must observe, that the Count de la Roca does not relate the Fact with the same Circumstances. Let us see his words; 'An impartial Author writes, that there was a Root of Lilly in a little Garden, into which a Window of the Emperor's Apartment looked, which, in the beginning of the Spring, put forth two Stalks, one of which broke it's Tunic, opened it's Flower, gave a pleasant Odour, and at last died, and the other, though of the same standing, which was not so forward, kept inclosed in it's Button; which made several People wonder, because it wanted neither Water nor Sun; and, the same Night that the Emperor's Soul left the Prison of his Body, That fine Flower opened, and was cut with Respect and Admiration, and placed on the great Altar (118). All that is wonderful in the Speech of the Superior of the Fathers of the Oratory of Paris, vanishes almost as soon as the Narrative of the Spanish Historian is attentively examined. I do not know the impartial Author, who is cited; but I fancy, that either he, or the Count de la Roca, have been transcribed by Famianus Strada. You will easily believe it, if you compare that Count's words with this Latin Passage: 'Nec illud admiratione caruit. In Caroli, quem dicebam, hortulo, binos eodem tempore stylos emiserat candens lilium. Alter Maio mense, uti assoleo, calyce dehiscens floruit: alter quamvis eadem culturâ provocatus tumorem tamen ac partus signa vere toto atque æstate sustinuit: eademque demum nocte, quâ Caroli animus integumentum sese corporis evolvit, ille explicato repente folliculo, intempestivâ nempe atque insperatâ germinatione promissit florem. Id verò & observatum ab omnibus, & lilio super Arâ templi maximâ ad spectandum proposito, fausti candidique ominis loco acceptum est (119). — Nor did This pass without Admiration. In Charles's Garden, a white Lilly shot forth two Stalks at once. The One, in the Month of May, was, as usual, in Blossom. The Other, though raised by the same culture, was seen to swell, and give signs of production, during the whole Spring and Summer: at last, on the same Night, in which the Soul of Charles threw off the covering of the Body, This Stalk, on a sudden unfolding itself, and untimely and unexpectedly shooting forth, promised a Flower. This was observed by all, and The Lilly, being placed on the great Altar of the Church, was received as a propitious Omen.' I remember an Observation, which I have read in a Work of Mrs Schurman. She relates (120), that, when du Lignon, one of the Disciples of Labadie, was endeavouring to establish his Sect at Herford, there happened three Prodiges. The first was, that the Trunk of a Tree, which had been dry four Years, shot forth on a sudden some Sprigs, four or five foot long, full of Leaves: This was in Autumn, and in a close place near the Church, which was afterwards assigned to the Labadists. The second Prodigy was, that all the Trees in the Prince's Garden bloomed during the Autumn, when she promised to protect their small Congregation. The third was, that a Swarm of Bees settled in the same Garden, and no body knew from whence they came. According to the Hypothesis of Presages, all these things promised a glorious and lasting Settlement; and yet That Sect was soon compelled to leave Herford.

[EE] He formed no Enterprize more just than The Siege of Metz, and of which the Success proved more unfortunate. Henry II, being confederated with some Princes of Germany, had been declared Protector of the Liberties of Germany (121), and boasted to act only according to that Quality (122). Nevertheless, he made himself Master of Metz, an Imperial City, and deprived it of it's Liberty, by a most egregious Cheat. The pretended Stratagem, which was made use of to subdue That little Republic, which looked upon This Monarch only as a Guardian, cannot be read without Horror. One might have said, upon that Occasion,

— Sed quis custodiet ipsos Custodes — (123)?

Charles V had therefore all the Reasons in the World to re-unite That City to the Body of the Empire, which had been divided from it in such a manner. He employed his greatest Forces in it, and miscarried shamefully (124); and at last, at the Peace of Munster, the Empire renounced That City, and left it to France. This Emperor had succeeded admirably well in some Enterprizes altogether unjust.

[FF] The Magnificence, with which The Fuggers received him — ought not to be forgotten. We shall speak below (125) of their Riches: we have here a remarkable Token of it. 'Mr Felibien (126) relates a very curious Particular concerning the Fockers, those famous German Merchants, who, to shew their Acknowledgment to Charles V, who, on his Return from Tunis, had done them the Honour to lodge with them, as he passed thro' Augsburg, one Day, among the Magnificences, with which they regaled him, caused a Faggot of Cinnamon to be laid on the Hearth, which was a Merchandize of great Price, and set fire to it with a Promissory Note they had of the Emperor's own Hand for a considerable Sum (127).

(*) His Christian Name was Hercules.

CHARNACÉ (a) (THE BARON de) acquitted himself happily of several Embassies under the Reign of Lewis XIII [A]. He was no less a brave Soldier, than a skillful Negotiator; and, in Holland, he had the Character of an Ambassador, and the Employment of a Colonel, at the same time. He was killed in performing the Functions of the latter, at the Siege of Breda, in the Year 1637 [B]. It is not true, that the Loss of his Wife produced in him the fatal Effect, which is spoken of in the Mercur Galant [C].

[A] He acquitted himself happily of several Embassies in the Reign of Lewis XIII. He was chosen by Cardinal Richelieu; which must at first give a very advantageous Idea of the Ambassador. But He, of whom I speak, had no need of such a Prepossession. The Negotiations he carried on with Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, which produced the Treaty of Berswald, the Twenty third of January 1631, and so good an Effect in Germany, are very convincing Proofs of it, tho' there should be no other. It was he, who induced the Swedes to pass into the Empire, and who laid the first Foundations of the Alliance, which has been so useful and so glorious to the two Crowns, and which is yet so to That of Sweden. He continued to negotiate with the same King, and with the Chancellor Oxenstern, till after the Battle of Lutzen, which made him retire into France. He had also negotiated with the Elector of Bavaria at Munich; but with little Success, because of the ill Humour of Sainte Etienne (1), a Relation of Father Jeseph's; who, being jealous at seeing a more able Man than himself at That Court, thwarted all his Negotiations, to the great Prejudice of the King their Master. It was Charnacé who signed the Treaty of the Hague, the Twenty fifth of April 1634, after which it was judged proper to make That of the eighth of January, of the Year following, in which he had a Hand, as one of the King's Commissioners. By the Treaty of 1634, the King promised to raise and maintain a Regiment of Foot, and a Troop of Horse, for the Service of the States, the Command whereof was given to Charnacé, who, joining the Profession of a Colonel with the Function of an Ambassador, resolved to be at the Siege of Breda, where he was killed in the Trenches (2). We see not the Occasion of This Embassy into Holland, in these Words of Wicquefort; and therefore another Book must supply us with it. Read the Life of Cardinal de Richelieu, and you will find there, that Charnacé went into Holland, to hinder the States from listening to the Proposals of a Truce, which the Spaniards made to them. He managed the Inclinations of the Directors and Deputies of the States so dexterously, and represented the Artifices and ill Designs of the Spaniards so well — that they resolved at last — as much through Necessity, as Reason, to prefer the Continuation of the War before the Truce. To which the Order contributed not a little, which was given to Charnacé, not only to solicit the Prince of Orange, who was known to be inclined to the Continuation of the War out of Interest, but also to offer the States a Succour of Ten or Twelve thousand Swedes, a warlike Nation, and confederated with France, which had made a good use of them for three Years, or thereabouts, when Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, made a Descent into Germany, and filled That great Empire with Terror (3).

[B] He was killed in performing the Functions of a Colonel, at the Siege of Breda. We have seen, in the foregoing Remark, what Mr de Wicquefort said of him; let us add to it these Words of another Author (4). Mr de Charnacé did his Endeavours to persuade the Prince of Orange to besiege another Place, which was of more importance to the common Good of the Allies, than That. Wherein This Ambassador was more concerned than he thought, since That Siege was fatal to him, having been killed at it with a Musket-shot in the Head, which he received in the Attack of a Horn-work. He was much lamented at Court for his good Qualities, and the great Services he did to the State, and also because he was related to the Marshal de Brezé, by his Wife Jean de Brezé. His Heart was carried into France, and is buried in the Church of the Carmelites at Angers, with an Epitaph, wherein he is said to have died the first of September.

[C] It is not true, that the Loss of his Wife produced in him the fatal Effect, spoken of in the Mercur Galant. The Abbot Deslandes, Great Archdeacon and Canon of Treguier, caused a Letter to be inserted in the Mercur Galant (5), wherein he says, that Charnacé, being in Germany with Gustavus, was so touched with the News he heard of the Death of his Wife, of the Family of Brezé, that he lost his Speech for ever after. Every body sees that this is a meer Story: Gustavus was killed at the Battle of Lutzen, in the Year 1632, and, in the Year 1634, Charnacé was displaying his Rhetoric in Holland, to hinder the Dutch from concluding a Truce with the Spaniards. Was That the Business of a dumb Man? This false Story cannot be rectified, by altering the Time and Place, where Charnacé heard of the Death of his Wife; for we have seen, that he endeavoured to persuade the Dutch not to besiege Breda, but another Place, whose Loss would be more pernicious to Spain. His Counsels proved ineffectual; Breda was besieged, and he lost his Life there. Where shall we then find the Time, when he lost his Speech? We shall see in another Place (6), that the Abbot Deslandes has related a Story concerning Fernel, which is no less apocryphal than this.

CHARPENTIER (PETER) in Latin Carpentarius, a Native of Toulouse (a), in the XVIth Century, made Profession of the Reformed Religion; but he published a Piece, which made him be considered as a furious Enemy of the Reformed [A]. He taught the Civil-Law for some time at Geneva (b), and left that Town much discontented, and without taking leave of his Creditors. This appears by a Letter, which

[A] He published a Piece, which made him be considered as a furious Enemy of the Reformed. This Piece was almost lost; but a Benedictine Monk (1), having inserted it in his Dialogues concerning the Prince of Orange's Enterprize upon England, printed at Paris in the Year 1689, it has been much spoken of since. Mr Jurieu, to discredit this Piece, thought himself obliged to publish what Thuanus said of it; and, because it was looked upon as a very proper thing, I shall set down the Narrative (2) of That Historian. One Peter Charpentier, a Native of Toulouse, who had publicly taught the Civil-Law at Geneva, being very familiarly acquainted with Bellicore, fled to his House, with some other Persons of less Note, during the Massacre; for it would have been too dangerous for a Courtier to give Retreat to Persons of Note upon such an Occasion. To comply with the Times, and thro' an Effect of his Humour, which made him defend the Party, with which his Interest obliged him to side, he began to inveigh most bitterly, not against the Authors of the Massacre, nor against the horrible Slaughter they had made, but against what he called the Cause, that is to say, against the Faction of the Protestants, for which he expressed a great Horror, and which, he said, God had justly punished for all their Irregularities, because they had made use of Religion, as a Pretence to cover their Spirit of Sedition, and Revolt; and because those pretended devout Men had taken up Arms against their Countrymen, instead of making use of Tears, Prayers, and Fasts, which Beza wrote to him, the First of April, 1570 (c). The same Letter testifies, that he had a Wife and Children. He published some other Books [B]; he was yet living in the Year 1584, and the King's Advocate in the Great Council (d). Rivet, who was so well versed in all kind of Authors, had but little Knowledge of this [C].

'Faits, for their Weapons: that they had seized divers Cities of the Kingdom: that they had put a great number of People to death, and carried their Insolence so far, as to make open War against their Sovereign. He said, that their Assemblies, where formerly they only prayed to God, were become Conventicles, and seditious Conferences, wherein they neither spoke of Piety, nor of the Mysteries of Religion, nor of the Correction of Manners, but of heaping up Money, of assembling of Troops privately in the Provinces, and of holding Correspondence with foreign Princes. He added, that they entertained seditious Persons in all the Cities of the Kingdom, to endeavour to disturb the Peace, which the King had granted to the Protestants, by his Goodness, and that nothing but the Sword of God, which Princes bear, could repress their Audaciousness; that he acknowledges, that it was God, who had inspired the Design of repressing it by the most severe ways, which a King, naturally very mild, was obliged to make use of. At first Charpentier was contented to speak thus in the private and familiar Conversations, which he had with Bellevue; but, because afterwards he said the same Things in public, he was judged to be a very fit Man for the Design the King and Queen had to justify the Massacre as well as they could. He accepted That Commission very willingly, and, having received a Sum of Money, which was given him, and great Promises that were made him to raise him to great Offices, which Promises were afterwards religiously kept, how unworthy soever he was of them, he departed from Paris with Bellevue, whom he left in Switzerland, and went to Strasbourg, where he had also formerly taught, that he might the better spread the Reports he was to disseminate in Germany. Being come thither, he wrote a Letter to Francis Portes (3), a Candiote, who was very learned in the Greek Language, and who had formerly been educated in Italy, in the House of Renata, Princess of Ferrara. In that Letter, which was dated the fifteenth of September, he said, that there were two Parties among the Protestants; one that was peaceable, and acted honestly out of a Principle of Religion, and who followed those Maxims they professed; the other consisted of those, who supported the Cause, a factious People, and Enemies of Peace: That Those two Parties had their Pastors; that the first had for them d'Espina, Sorel (in Charpentier's Letter, published by Sainte Marthe, is des Roisiers (4) instead of Sorel), Albrac, Capel, la Hoya, and Mercur; but that the other Ministers could not suffer the Moderation of these, and chiefly Beza, whom he calls the Trumpet of Seba, [§ (a)], and against whom he chiefly exclaims in his Book. He not only excuses the Massacre, but proves at length, and with much cunning, that it was lawful and necessary, in order to suppress an impious Faction, who made it their Business to overthrow the Royal Authority, to dissuade the Cities of the Kingdom from the Obedience due to their Sovereign, to disturb the public Tranquillity, and which seemed to have been formed for the very Ruin of the Protestant Religion, by turbulent Persons, and Enemies to their Country. An Answer was published to this Letter, under the Name of Portes, dated the first of March of the following Year, which was full of very sharp Expressions. Tuannus adds, that the Duke of Anjou earnestly solicited Francis Baudouin, a Civilian, who, having formerly embraced the Protestant Religion in Germany, suffered himself to be gained by the moderate Advices of Cassander, and returned to the Catholic Religion, and who taught then at Angers, to set about the same Design as Charpentier, (that is to say, to justify the Massacre) but that this Civilian excused himself modestly upon the Account of the Contest he had had with the Genevois, who, as he said, would discredit what he should say on that Subject; but that, in truth, he would not justify the Massacre, because he detested it, and, having read Charpentier's Letter, he observed in it great Faults of Memory, and great Mistakes in what he alleged out of ancient History. The Benedictine Monk published the Continuation of his Discourses, wherein he eludes this Testimony of Tuannus as much as he can (5). You will find the Substance of the same Letter of Charpentier in the third Volume (6) of Mezerai's Great History. That Historian pretends, that This Letter served for a Reply to Wolfgangus Prischtrachius [(6 §) a Polander, who had answered very sharply Bellevue's Speech (7). D'Aubigné (8) will have it, on the contrary, that Wolfgang Prischtrach, and Portus of Crete, whom Charpentier took to witness (9), wrote against Bellevue and Charpentier. He expresses himself ill; for he ought to have said, that Portus wrote against the latter, and Prischtrach against the former. It does not appear, that Charpentier had in view Prischtrach's Work. So that I believe Mezerai is mistaken. This Letter of Charpentier to Portus serves a Roman Catholic (10) by way of Epitome, for his Preface to a Book of Controversy, published in the Year 1585 (11). He inserts it almost entire, and advertises his Readers of it in another Book (12). I must add, that it is found in the first Tome of the Memoirs of the State of France under Charles IX (13), together with a French Translation of a Latin Answer, which Francis Portus made to him. This Answer contains many Particulars of the Life of Charpentier, little honourable, not to say shameful to him. [(a §) An ALLUSION of Seba, the Anagram of Beza, to Seba, the Name of That seditious Person, of whom it is said, in the second Book of Samuel *, that he founded a Trumpet, to raise the People against David. For the rest, the Letter of Charpentier is dated the fifteenth of September 1572: the Answer of Francis Portus, and the Extract of the Remarks of Francis Baudouin on the Letter of Charpentier, are found in the Memoirs of the State of France under Charles IX †. REM. CRIT.] [(6 §). We read it Prischtrach, in the Memoirs of the State of France ‡. REM. CRIT.] [B] He published some other Books.] According to la Croix du Maine * he has wrote several Books both in Latin and French, which have been most of them printed: but I do not know, whether he would own all those, that came out under his Name; for several Pieces have been ascribed to him, of which he was not the Author — I have seen a Latin Treatise of his concerning the bearing of Arms; but I cannot tell whether the French Translation was made by him. It is printed at Paris in both Languages (14). The Title of That Work of Charpentier is, Pium & Christianum de armis consilium, and was printed at Paris in the Year 1575. I have spoken elsewhere (15) of an Answer, which was made to it. [C] Rivet had but little Knowledge of Charpentier.] The Romish Controversists reproach the Protestants continually with the Civil-Wars of France, as if it was a thing approved of by the Ministers. They make use sometimes of Charpentier's Testimony (16). The Jesuit Petra Sancta had the Confidence to set forth, in a Piece, which he published against du Moulin, that Measures were taken at Geneva to destroy Francis II, Catherine de Medicis, his Mother, Mary Stuart, his Wife, his Brothers, &c. all at one time (17). He cites Sarius lib. 4. ad. ann. 1561. Petrus Carpentarius, Genebrardus in Chronol. Rivetus, refuting the Book of That Jesuit, says, among other Things, that Those three Witnesses were not to be credited; that Sarius was convicted of Calumny by Baronius, for having defamed Victorinus, Bishop of Poitiers (18); and that Charpentier and Genebrard, two obstinate Leaguers, incurred the King's Hatred. Carpentarius & Genebrardus qui inter regis perduelles vixerunt, & justam ejus indignationem incurrerunt, inter eos qui ultimi steterunt in adver-

prefixed to the 1607.

CHARRON (PETER) Author of a Book which made a great Noise, intitled, Of Wisdom, was born at Paris in the Year 1541, where he made a great Progress in Classical Learning, and went thro' a Course of Philosophy. He studied afterwards the Civil and Canon Law at Orleans and Bourges, and took his Doctor's Degree in That Faculty, in the last of Those Two Universities. Then he returned to Paris, and, having been admitted Advocate in the Parliament, he frequented the Bar five or six Years with great Assiduity; but, foreseeing, that it would be difficult to raise himself that way, because he found himself incapable of stooping to make his court to Attornies and Solicitors, he applied himself in earnest to the Study of Divinity, and became so great a Preacher, that several Bishops strove to have him in their Dioceses. Arnaud de Pontac, Bishop of Bazas, having heard him preach in St Paul's Church in the Year 1571, conceived a great Affection for him, and carried him with him to Xaintes, and to Bourdeaux, and into his Bishopric, and some other Places of Gascogne and Languedoc (a). Charron acquired such a Reputation by his Eloquence, that every body was desirous to have him, and the Bishops of several Dioceses, where he had preached, offered him the Theological Canonships of their Churches, and other Dignities and Benefices, and made him several - - - - - Presents. He was successively Theologal of Bazas, Acqs, Lethoure, Agen, Cahors, and Condom, Canon and Schoolmaster in the Church of Bourdeaux, and Chanter in the Church of Condom. Queen Margaret made him her Preacher in Ordinary - - - - - He was also in the Retinue of Cardinal d'Armagnac, Legate of Avignon. He did not affect to take the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity, nor That of Licentiate, or Doctor, or Professor, in That Science, but was contented with the Character of Priesthood. He was 17 or 18 Years absent from Paris; and, being returned thither in the Year 1588, he had a desire to end his Days there among the Carthusians. He had made a Vow to embrace their Order, and he opened his Mind about it to the Prior of the Charter-house (b). They had some Reasons to refuse him [A]: He addressed himself to the Prior of the Celestins, and found the same Obstacles; after which some Casuists declared him free from his Vow (c). Whereupon he resolved to end his Days under the Character of a Secular Priest. He preached the Lent-Sermons, at Angers in the Year 1589, and afterwards went to Bourdeaux, where he contracted a very strict Friendship with Michel de Montagne [B]. He published there his Book of the Three Truths in the Year 1594 [C], for which he had the Dignity of Great Vicar of the Bishop of Cahors bestowed upon him, together with a Theologal Canonship. He was deputed to the General Assembly of the Clergy in the Year 1595 (d); and That Assembly made him their First Secretary. Being returned to Cahors, he staid there till the Year 1600, where, among other Works, he composed the

[A] They had some Reasons to refuse admitting him a Carthusian. Least it should be thought, that Those Reasons were grounded on some Irregularity of Peter Charron, or that he renounced his Vow too rashly, I must comment the Text of this Remark with these Words: 'He made his Application to the Prior of the Charter-house of Paris. - - But could not be admitted into it, how earnestly soever he desired it, only because he was too far advanced in Years, being at that time Forty seven or Forty eight Years of Age; and their Excuse was, That one must be used, from his Youth, to bear the Austerity of That Religious Order. Being refused there, he addressed himself to the Provincial of the Celestins of That City, to be likewise received into their Order, and met with the same Obstacles. So that, having done all that lay in his Power to perform his Vow, he was assured by Messieurs Faber, Dean of the Sorbonne, Tyrius, a Scotish Jesuit, and Feuardent, a Franciscan, all very learned Divines, that, in Conscience, he was free from such a Vow, and might freely continue as a Secular in the World, and that he was not obliged to enter into any other Religious Order (1).'

[B] He contracted a very strict Friendship with Michel de Montagne. Charron had a wonderful Esteem for That Author's Essays, and adopted several of his Maxims. It may be said, without Rashness, That he, of these two Friends, who should have instructed the other, was his Scholar, and that the Divine learned more from the Gentleman, than the Gentleman from the Divine. There are a great many Thoughts in the Books of Wisdom, which had appeared in Montagne's Essays. No doubt but This Docility of Charron contributed much to the intimate Affection, which Montagne had for him, and that it was the reason, why he permitted him, by his last Will, to bear the full Arms of his Noble Family, because he left no Male Issue behind him (2). Charron shewed a very solid Gratitude by his Will; for he left Five hundred Crowns to the Lady Leonora de Montagne, the Wife of the Sieur Camien, Counsellor in the Parliament of Bordeaux, the good Sister of the late Sieur de Montagne, Knight of the King's Order, and his Gossip. And he made the said Sieur de Camien his sole and universal Heir, provided he should pay the Legacies contained in his Will, amounting to near the Sum of Fifteen thousand Livres (3).

[C] He published, at Bourdeaux, his Book of the Three Truths in the Year 1594. He did not put his Name to it. See here what these Three Truths are: I. That there is a God, and a True Religion. II. That, of all Religions, the Christian is the only True One. III. That, of all the Christian Communions, the Roman Catholic is the only True Church. By the first he opposes the Atheists; by the second the Pagans, Jews, and Mahometans; and by the third, the Heretics and Schismatics. This Work is very methodical. In the last Part, he attacks the Treatise of the Church, which Mr du Pleffis

Three Books of Wisdom. He caused his Christian Discourses to be printed at Bordeaux in the Year 1600 [D]. He had left Cabors: He was already settled at Condom, where he had accepted the Theological Canonship, and the Dignity of Chanter, which the Bishop had offered him. He published his Treatise of Wisdom at Bordeaux, in the Year 1601. Two Years after, he took a Journey to Paris, to thank a Bishop, who had offered him the Theological Canonship of his Church [E], and to publish a new Edition of That Treatise. He did not live long enough to see above three or four Sheets re-printed: He died suddenly in the Street, the sixteenth of November 1603. The Impression of that Work was finished, notwithstanding the many Obstacles, which were to be surmounted (e) [F]; for the Author having said many Things according to the Light of Philosophy, he could not write against popular and superstitious Opinions, without advancing some Maxims, which seemed to contradict the Doctrines of Religion. For which reason, many Persons exclaimed against this Book, and cried it down as an impious Work. But some Persons of great Understanding opposed This Persecution, knowing how to distinguish Things. It fell out very luckily for Charron's Memory, and for his Book, that some Statesmen, as Illustrious by the Force of their Genius, as by their Authority, concerned themselves with this Affair: Had it not been for that, he would have been ignominiously branded, and his Book had been entirely suppressed.

(e) Taken from the Elogy of Peter Charron, before the Book of Wisdom.

Plessis Moray had published sixteen Years before. A Writer of the Protestant Religion published soon after, at Rebel, an Answer (4), in vindication of That Treatise of du Plessis. The Work of the Three Truths was applauded by the Catholics; it was printed two or three times at Paris from the Bordeaux Edition; and afterwards it was published in Flanders, under the Name of Benedict Vaillant, Advocate of Sainte Foy (5). The Publication of This Work brought Charron acquainted with Messire Antony d'Ebrard de St Sulpice, Bishop and Count of Cabors, who, without having seen the said Sieur Charron, from the sole Relish of his Book, sent for him, made him his Vicar-General, and gave him the Theological Canonship of his Church: which he accepted; and, being there, he caused his Book to be printed, the second time, at Bordeaux, in the Year 1595, putting his Name to it, and added to it a Reply to the Answer, which has been printed at Rebel against his Third Truth (6). Francis du Jon, or Junius, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, wrote an Answer (7) to This second Edition of the Three Truths, and published it in French, in the Year 1599: he inserted therein the Work of his Adversary intire. Note, That Charron had revised, and very much enlarged, This Work, since the Edition of the Year 1595, and that he had made another Reply to the second Answer made to the Third Truth (8). All this, being ready for the Press, was found in his Study, after his Death. The Universal Heir gave hopes that this Manuscript should be published, and dedicated to the Cardinal of Joyeuse (9).

[D] He caused his Christian Discourses to be printed in the Year 1600.] They are sixteen in number: The eight first treat of the Eucharist; the rest concern the Knowledge and Providence of God, the Redemption of the World, and the Communion of Saints (10).

[E] He took a Journey to Paris, to thank a Bishop, who had offered him the Theological Canonship in his Church.] Claudius Dormy, Bishop of Boulogne, and Prior of St Martin's in the Fields at Paris, was the Person he was to thank: He had received very obliging Letters from him, which shewed, that his Books pleased That Prelate, and that he would take it kindly, if he would accept of the Theological Canonship of his Cathedral (11). Note, That the Approbation of That Bishop concerned the three Books of Wisdom, as well as the sixteen Discourses. He did not accept these Offers, and he told one of his intimate Friends, That he would willingly enough have accepted That Canonship for some Years; but that a cold Climate, near the Sea, was not only unpleasant and melancholy, but also unwholesome; and that he loved the Sun, that the Sun was his sensible God, as God was his insensible Sun, and that therefore he feared he could not live healthfully and pleasantly at Boulogne (12). He is not the only Man of Letters, to whom cold and moist Climates are inconvenient, and to whom the Sun is a sensible God.

VOL. II. No. XLV.

[F] The Books of Wisdom were printed, notwithstanding the many Obstacles which were to be surmounted.] Let us set down the Narrative, which is found in his Elogy. He had affectionately recommended This Work, and the Christian Discourses, to one of his most intimate Friends, an Advocate of the Parliament (13). This Friend took so much care of them, that they were published, notwithstanding the Opposition of some malicious or superstitious Men, who had mean and weak Souls, and were perquam similes Noctui quorum oculi tantum splendorem ferre non poterant, & ad ipsius Solis lumen caligabant, not being able to bear the Brightness of That rare, sublime, and divine Wit. For they undertook to prevent the Impression of his Books of Wisdom, and, for that end, they had recourse to the Authority of the Rector of the University, and of some Doctors of the Sorbonne, and even of the King's Council, both in the Parliament, and in the Chatelet; besides, they caused Simon Millanges, a Printer of Bordeaux, to interpose in it, for his particular Interest. Complaints were made about it at the Chatelet, in the Court of the Green-Cloth, in the Court of Parliament, and in the Privy-Council; and they came also to the King's Ear: The Sheets, which were already printed, and the Author's Copy, were seized three times. But, as This faithful Friend had two or three Copies of That Work, and desired to make it appear by good Proofs, that the Love he had for the deceased Sieur Charron did not end with his Death, he got, at last, with much ado, all the Books printed; and, before they could be sold, there was a Suit in Law about it. Finally, The Chancellor, and the King's Attorney-General, shewed them to two Doctors of the Sorbonne, who wrote down what they had to say against Those Books, which speak only of human Wisdom, treated Morally and Philosophically. And all was put into the Hands of the President Jeannin, Counsellor of State, one of the most judicious and experienced Men of That Time; who, having seen and examined them, plainly said, that Those Books were not written for common Readers; that none but solid and sublime Wits could make a Judgment of them; and that they were truly Books of State; and, having made his Report to the Privy-Council, the Sale of them was permitted to the Bookfeller, who had printed them, and he had a full Replevy of all the Seizures, which had been made; after it had been remonstrated and proved, that Those Books had been corrected and enlarged by the Author, since the first Impression made at Bordeaux, in the Year 1601, and that by those Additions and Corrections, he had cleared, and confirmed, and in some Places softened, his Discourses, without making any Alteration in the Sense: Which he had done, to stop the Mouths of malicious People, and to satisfy the Ignorant; that he had shewed them to some of his best Friends, clear-sighted Persons, and no ways pe-suppressed. Indeed, he always wished to have Persons of that Character for his Judges [G]; for he did not expect the same Equity from those, whose Profession engages them to be passionate, and who have contracted a Habit of condemning, with Precipitation, whatever does not agree with their prejudicated Opinions. Some believe, that it is a glorious thing for France to have permitted the Publication of this Book, notwithstanding the Oppositions and Murmurs of many People. This made it appear, that wise Men did not approve, that a tyrannical Yoke should be put upon the Mind, and that they approved the Liberty of Philosophising, when it is confined within due Bounds. The most violent Declaimer, that appeared against the Book of Wisdom, was Garasse, a Jesuit. He has placed Charron in the Catalogue of the most dangerous and wicked Atheists [H]. He was too narrow spirited (f), to know, that a great difference is to be made between what a Man believes by the Efficacy of Faith, and what he ingenuously owns that Reason suggests to him about the Doctrines of Religion. One of the things, which this Jesuit most haughtily and maliciously censured, is at the bottom very reasonable; and, if it be read with Attention, it will appear so, and the Reader will be full of Indignation against the Ignorance or Dishonesty of That Caviller. It relates to a certain degree of Strength, which Peter Charron attributed to those, who fully shake off the Belief of a Deity [I]. His Censurers did not regard dantic, who were well edified and pleased with them; and that, above all, he submitted himself and his Books to the Censure and Judgment of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Church.

You may easily perceive, by this Narrative, that the Edition of Paris, 1604, is not the same in all respects with the Edition of Bourdeaux 1601. The latter contained some things, which were suppressed, or softened, and rectified in the former; which was the Reason why the Bourdeaux Edition was more esteemed by the Curious; and therefore the Booksellers caused the Book to be re-printed in several Places, according to That Edition (14); which made a Bookseller of Paris publish an Edition, wherein he added, at the end of the Book, all the Passages of the first, which had been castrated, or corrected, and all those, which the President Jeannin, appointed by the Chancellor for the Censure and Examination of That Book, had judged ought to be altered (15). This Edition, which is of Paris 1607, has been followed in the re-printing of This Work, at Rouen, 1622, and elsewhere: It is, doubtless, to be preferred before the first; for the Book appears there such as it had been corrected and enlarged by the Author for a second Edition, and, besides, we find in it, apart, what was peculiar to That of Bourdeaux. By this means all the Proceedings became needless.

[G] He always wished to have Persons of great Genius for his Judges.] 'He was sensible, in his Life-time, that his Book of Wisdom would not be acceptable to weak and superstitious People, and that it would be censured by presumptuous, proud, positive, and opinionated Men, who fancy they know every thing, and that they are the wisest Men in the World; whereas, for the most part, they are most impertinent and ignorant, and some of them are infected with an almost incurable Distemper.' For which reason he drew up a small Treatise of Wisdom, a few Months before his Death, containing a Summary of his Book, together with an Apology, and an Answer to the Complaints and Objections, which were made against him; which was printed by itself in the Year 1606, with some Christian Discourses, by David le Clerc; and he desired it should be dedicated to Monsieur de Harlay, First President of the Parliament of Paris, knowing very well, that none were able to judge impartially of his Book, but such Men as That Lord, that is, such as have a bold, generous, sublime, and no ways superstitious or mean Soul; which was done according to his Desire and Intention (16).

[H] Garasse placed Charron in the Catalogue of the most dangerous and wicked Atheists.] Never was such a furious Writer seen: It would fill a Book, to copy all the abusive Language he gave Charron, in his Somme Theologique, and in his Doctrines Curieuses, &c. Let us be contented with this Passage: 'I have defined, says he (17), the brutish, drowsy, or melancholy Atheism, to be a certain fantastical Humour, which has introduced Diogenism into the Christian Religion; by which Humour a Man, besotted with his languishing and lazy Melancholy, laughs at every thing, through a dull, ridiculous, and pedantic Gravity. They, who have read the Wisdom and the Three Truths, will understand very well what I mean by these words; for here is That Writer's Humour naturally represented — In our time the Devil, who is the Author of Atheism, and the Ape of the Works of God, has raised two profane Men, Christians in appearance, and Atheists in reality, to imitate Solomon in writing A WISDOM, the one a Milanese (18), who wrote in Latin, the other a Parisian, who wrote in his Mother Tongue, both equally pernicious, and great Enemies of Jesus Christ, and of good Manners, as we shall see in the Relation and Examination of their wicked Propositions. In a word, These two Prevaricators have endeavoured to shew, that true Wisdom consists in despising Religion and good Manners. — Tertullian has a good Saying, in the Fourteenth Chapter of his Apology, which may here be my Authority: Speaking of Marcus Varro, who was accounted the Wisdom of Rome, he shews, that, in his Writings, which, by good Fortune and by God's Favour, are lost, he was more an Atheist and Cynic, than Menippus and Diogenes, so far as he had published several Atheistical Notions with a kind of Modesty and Probability; whereas others, having written some impious things, have made them suspected by their way of writing. I say the same of those melancholy and languishing Writers, who under the Title of Wisdom, Truths, and Catholic Discourses, have stifled all sense of Religion.' The Abbot de St Cyran would not suffer this violent Critic to blast Charron's Reputation; he took his part, when he censured the Faults of Garasse's Somme Theologique (19). I remember, among other things, that he complains of This Censurer's Injustice, who, taking advantage of an Error of the Press, had carried on his Invektives in a strange manner. The Series of Charron's Discourse shews, that he meant, that God acts temporally; but the Printers, instead of putting temporellement, put temerairement. See what I shall cite below out of the Prior Ogier.

[I] — This relates to a certain degree of Force, which Peter Charron ascribes to those, who entirely shake off the belief of a Deity.] To judge well of his Doctrine on this point, all his words must be weighed, and nothing must be left out that he says. Here is the whole Passage: 'This first, habitual, and universal kind of Atheism (20), cannot lodge but in a very strong and bold Soul;

(17) Garasse, Somme Theologique, pag. 66, 67. In his Apology against the Prior Ogier, pag. 251, 262, he says Charron is more dangerous to Youth, and to others, who have but little Learning, than the Books of Theophile, and Lucilio Vanini, for as much as he has published more impious things than they, and with some Modesty; that is to say, he is so much the more dangerous, because he stands on his Guard, and because his Wisdom is read as a pious Book.

regard the Advices he had given, which were sufficient to prevent their rash Judgments

It must be furious and maniac. Surely there must be as much (and perhaps more) strength and stiffness of Soul, to reject and resolutely lay aside the Belief of a God, as constantly to adhere to him, which are the two opposite Extreams, and very rare and difficult: but the first more. A Medium between them proceeds from an ordinary Strength and Virtue, and consists in not being able to cast God off, and yet faintly and remissly adhering to him: which is the case of most Men, more or less, in an infinite number of degrees. — To adhere resolutely and inviolably to God, requires very great strength and application of the Soul, which must be always intent and attentive; a special divine Favour and Grace, and a continual Assistance of the Holy Ghost. On the contrary, to get loose from, and cast off the Sense and Fear of a Deity, a thing interwoven in our Nature, requires a monstrous and furious Strength of the Soul, and such as is hardly to be found; although those great and notorious Atheists, who, thro' an extreme and furious Insolence, had a mind to withdraw their Allegiance to the Deity, and to shake off a superiour Being, did what they could to acquire it. But the most ingenious of those, who have attempted it, could never compass their Design: For although, being undisturbed, and at liberty to speak their mind, they seemed to have gained this point, by laughing at the Notion of a God and Religion; yet, when they were followed close, they Child-like yielded. Whenever an unexpected and remarkable Prodigy and Token of God's Wrath happened, they were more frightened, and looked paler than others, hiding themselves at a Clap of Thunder, or at the Noise of a Storm. Thus, unwilling to acknowledge a God, lest they should stand in fear of him, the fear of the least thing forced them to acknowledge him (21).

Now let us see the words of the Censurer (22). 'He lays down for a Maxim, That the first kind of Atheism cannot be harboured but by a very strong and bold Soul, and that it requires more Strength and Stiffness of Soul to reject and lay aside the Belief of a God than constantly to adhere to him. And though he endeavours to mollify this Proposition by a deceitful Expression, I maintain that it is wicked and dangerous, because it encourages many young People of a loose Life, whose Minds are floating, and who are not yet come to that pitch of Madnels, as wholly to cast off the Belief and Fear of a Deity. For every one being naturally desirous to be thought a Man of great Parts, and of a sound and strong Judgment; if any young, heedless, and wavering Persons happen to read this Proposition, as it happens but too often, they become downright Atheists. All Charron's Discourse inclines the Mind of his Readers to That furious Rage of shaking off the Belief of a God, which is nevertheless base Cowardice, as it appears by all Atheists, who die either mad or Cowards: We have some Instances of it in Fontanier and Vanini, who, after having uttered insolent Bravadoes against the Deity, were not tired with making feigned and sacrilegious Confessions, whilst in Prison, in order to appear good Men.' Note, that Garasse, in his Somme Theologique, which came out after the Apology, which I have just now quoted, bestows a whole Section (23) upon the Confutation of This Opinion of Charron. He alleges the Example of some Fathers of the Church, who shewed an unshaken Courage: He maintains, that Atheism proceeds only from Cowardice; I say he maintains it, considering things another way, and according to a different view, in which he does not directly oppose Charron's Notions: and he mentions again the timorous dissembling of the two Atheists, who were punished with Death some time before. This Refutation is not solid, since Charron had plainly and precisely owned, I. That a very great strength of Soul is required to be firm in the true Faith of God. II. That the greatest and most notorious Atheists, when they are followed close, do yield child-like. So that it may be said, that Garasse fought with his own Shadow: he proved what his Adversary did not deny, and what he formally acknowledged. I shall therefore leave That Chapter of the Somme Theologique, and the last part of the Passage, which I have related, and shall only consider the other half of That Passage.

I find several Faults in it; for, I. This Jesuit suppresses every thing, which shews Charron's Orthodoxy, and which may serve to discover the true sense of his Words, and to remove the bad Impressions, which his Maxim, proposed in general, and without any Explanation, might produce in the Reader. II. He calls all this a deceitful Expression. Now this is such base and foul dealing, that it ought to be referred to the cognizance of criminal Judges: nay, severe Tribunals should be set up against Authors, who, by such perfidious Tricks, blast the Honour, Reputation, and Memory of a Writer. You suppress a thing, and yet you say it is deceitful. You should have produced it at length, and then you might have denominated it: but you thought it would be better for you to deceive the Readers, by interposing your Judgment about a thing, which you do not shew them, and which you are sure most of them will not look for. I say, III. That Garasse builds on a wrong Foundation; for he builds on this Principle: Though Atheism should be the effect of a great strength of Soul, yet this should not be acknowledged; such a Truth ought either to be suppressed, or the contrary Opinion be boldly asserted, lest it should make presumptuous Men desirous to fall into a condition, that is the Criterion of a strong Mind. It plainly appears from this Jesuit's Objection, that he reasons after this manner (24). Now let any equitable Person judge, whether this be fair dealing? and whether it will not introduce meer human Policy, and the grand Secret of the Military Art, into Religion? In short, whether this is not to decide, that, provided Orthodoxy triumphs, it is no matter by what means, or how. Ought not a Man to be contented with behaving himself in such a manner? Must he also require from every Author, that he tread in the same Steps? Shall not Peter Charron be permitted to prefer Sincerity before Utility? I go farther, and say, that he followed the Ideas of what is honest, without bringing the Useful Part into any hazard. Did he not assert, that Atheism requires a strong, but a furious and maniac Soul, and that That Force was monstrous and furious, and a very great and furious Insolence? Is there any thing in this, that can tempt an ambitious Person? And, if it could allure any One, must it not be the worst of Men, and a Soul depraved to the highest degree? Do such profligate Wretches, so spoiled and so incorrigible, deserve, that, in their favour, things should not be delivered according to the Ideas, which are thought the most just? When Cicero owned, that Marc Antony had great Strength of Body (25), when Tacitus acknowledged the same quality in one of Augustus's Grandsons (26), had they any reason to fear, that their Readers would wish to acquire such a Strength? Was it not so characterized, as to create a Disgust? Now I ask, whether Charron did not make use of a Corrective, yet more proper to inspire, I will not say Disgust, but Horror? Observe here St Augustin's Maxim, that great Piety, and great Impiety, are equally uncommon. Insania ista paucorum est; sicut enim magna pietas paucorum est, ita & magna impietas nibilo minus paucorum est (27). This comes very near to one of Peter Charron's Propositions.

Perhaps, some will think, that he has contradicted himself, having acknowledged both a great strength of Soul, and a childish Weakness, in Atheists; but certainly he did it without falling into Contradiction, since he considered them under different Circumstances. He believes them strong in Prosperity, and weak in Adversity: So that the contrary Qualities, which he attributes to them, are two things, that succeed each other. It is not therefore a Contradiction to admit of them in one and the same Subject: A Contradiction supposes, that both the Terms should subsist together at the same time: It requires also, that they should be affirmed of the same Subject, according to the same Notion: thence it comes, that, without departing from the Rules of contradictory Propositions, it may be affirmed, that the ments [K]. However it be, Charron was a Man of an unblameable Life; and, I think, same Persons are fearful and bold at the same time; fearful with respect to certain Objects, and bold with respect to others. We have daily Instances of it. Some Men of extraordinary Intrepidity would not lie, upon any account, in a Chamber, if they were told, that it is haunted with Spirits: others would boldly lie there alone, though their Cowardice is so great, that a drawn Sword makes them tremble. The Uneasiness that troubles the former, about a Trifle, which they have taken for an ill Omen, I say, That Uneasiness, which no Reason can remove, will not hinder them from fighting like Lyons. The latter, laughing at all sorts of Prefaces, will run away like a Hare, if they are attacked by an equal number. Such a one, who has not the Courage to see a Man let blood, or to kill a Pullet, endures the sharpest Pains with all imaginable Constancy, and expects Death in his Bed with an heroic Firmness. Another, who is unconcerned in the most frightful Dangers of War, trembles for fear, when a Physician tells him he must die. It has been said, that a steady Mind is neither moved with the Threatnings of a Tyrant, nor with the Danger of Shipwreck, nor with Thunder or Lightening; and that the Ruins of the World would fall upon him without making him afraid:

Iustum, & tenacem propositi virum,
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instantis tyranni
Mente quæsit solida: neque Ausfer, Dux inquieti turbidus Adriæ,
Nec fulminantis magna Jovis manus:
Si fractus illabatur orbis,
Impavidum ferient ruinæ (28).

(28) Horat. Od.

&c.

*Nor Civil Rage, nor Tyrants Frowns, controul
The steady Purpose of the Just Man's Soul.
Tho' Storms and Ruin are around him burl'd,
Fearless he meets the Shock, nor dreads a falling World.*

But such a Steadiness is scarce any where to be found in it's full extent: we seldom see more than some Parts of it. There are some noble Souls, which no Promises, nor any Flattery, can divert from the Paths of Virtue; but they are not Proof against the Threats of a Dungeon, or such other ill Treatment. Some form the most noble and magnanimous Resolutions for the Good of their Country. Their Notions are great, and shew a generous and steady Soul; but they could not put them in Execution: they would perform their Duty very ill in a besieged Town, if they were placed in the Breach: an involuntary Fear would seize them, and make them run away, even before they should distinctly perceive it. The Body of these Men does not second the Soul: a certain Disposition of the Organs, which mechanically produces Fear, dejects the superior Part, and puts it out of countenance (29). There is, without doubt, a Courage, or Intrepidity of Mind, which is sometimes attended with great bodily Fear. Mr Hobbes's Courage and Steadiness related only to the Objects of the Mind. There was scarce any Proposition, or Paradox, which astonished him, or troubled his Confidence; but the least danger of his Body frightened him. Montagne, who seems to be so much above Prejudices, and so well furnished with the pretended force of Incredulity, had a Softness of Soul, which would not permit him to see a Pullet's Throat cut without uneasiness, nor could he patiently hear a Hare groan under the Teeth of his Dogs (30). This Difference proceeds from the Difference of Mens Tempers: we must not therefore wonder, that a Man, who has the boldness to shake off the most general, and the most sacred Opinions, should be so weak as to tremble at the sight of an Executioner, and to dissemble his Belief, in order to avoid the Pains of the Torture. The Strength of his Soul does not respect the Objects of the Body, but those of the Mind. A mean Soul, capable of all sorts of Villainy and Infamy, a Slave of Capadocia (31), the greatest Coward and the greatest

(29) We may say of it, as of Debauchery, Quin corpus onustum Hæternis vitiis animum quoque prægravat una, Atque affigit humi divine particulam aure.

Rogue in the World, has sometimes surprising Strength to bear the most violent Torments; the Rack, ordinary and extraordinary, the most terrible, will not make him confess any thing: but how many Men of great Virtue, and of admirable Probity, would rather accuse themselves falsely, than expose themselves to the Torture? How many Persons, who were true Lovers of their Religion, have had recourse to all manner of Shifts and Equivocations, and left no Stone unturned, to save their Lives, whilst they were in the Prisons of the Inquisition (32)? The fear of capital Punishment disordered their Souls, and suspended all the Strength of their Piety. Thus the Laws of the Union of the Soul and the Body produce a great Diversity in Men.

I observe all these things, to reconcile Peter Charron with Mr de la Bruyere. 'Do your Men of strong Minds (Esprits forts), says this latter (33), know, that they are called so ironically? What greater Weakness, than to be uncertain what is the Principle of one's Being, Life, Senses, and Knowledge, and what will be the end of them? What greater Discouragement, than to doubt whether one's Soul be not material, as Stones and Reptiles, and whether it is not corruptible like those vile Creatures? Is it not a nobler thing, and which requires greater Strength, to have the Idea of a Being Superior to all other Beings, &c.' They are both in the right; and their Difference lies only in the different Relations of the Word Strength; and I do not think, that Mr de la Bruyere would have denied to Charron, that the Atheists have Strength, in the same Sense as the Demoniac, who broke all the Chains, wherewith he was loaded, and whom no one could master (34). For the rest, the Precaution, which Garrasse would have us use, would be of no great Advantage; for it is no easy thing to correct the Ideas, by which we judge, since the fear of over-turning a Salt-steller is a Weakness, it requires some Strength to overcome That Fear, and so gradually with other things. It would be no easy thing to correct these Notions, tho' all Authors should carefully abstain from giving the Name of Strength to That Turn of the Mind. The Impious would appeal to their Patriarch Lucretius:

Humana ante oculos sedere cum vita jaceret
In terris oppressa gravi sub religione.

Primum Graius homo mortales tollere contra Est oculos ausus, primusque obfiteri contra:

I shall set down the Advice he gave them. 'I am willing to advertise the Reader, who shall undertake to judge of this Work, that he must have a care he does not fall into any of these seven Mistakes, as some have done as to the first Edition; which are, to take for a Duty what is only a Matter of Fact; for a thing to be done what is only a Judgment; for a Resolution and Determination what is only proposed, discussed, and problematically disputed; for my own Opinions, what others believe; for an outward State, Profession, and Condition, what belongs to the Mind, and is internal; for Religion and divine Belief, what is but an human Opinion; for a supernatural Grace and Operation, what is only a natural and moral Action. A Reader, free from Prejudices, will find, in these seven Points, well understood, wherewith to resolve his Doubts, to answer all the Objections, which himself and others may raise, and inform himself of the Design of this Work. But if, after all, he is not satisfied, and does not approve of it, let him attack it boldly and briskly, (for meer slandering, biting, and reviling, is an easy thing, though shameful and pedantic); and then either I shall yield, and ingenuously confess that I was mistaken; (for this Book makes it's boast to shew the Sincerity and Ingenuity of it's Author); or I shall examine his Impertinency and Folly (36). What he had said, just before, is too fine not to be inserted in this Remark: A great many Readers will learn their Duty from it: They will see there, with what Disposition of Mind they ought to judge of a Book, which is not written according to the Humour or Prejudice of the Multitude, that is to say, where the Author lays down his Thoughts as they arise in his Mind, without dogmatizing, or designing to form a Sect. 'Some find, says Charron (37), that this Book doth too boldly and too freely shock the common Opinions, and are offended at it. To whom I answer these four or five words; First, that Wisdom, which is not common and popular, has the Liberty and Authority, Jure suo singulari, to judge of every Thing; (it is the Privilege of a spiritual wife Man, Spiritualis omnia judicatur, & à nemine judicatur) and to censure and condemn the common and popular Opinions, as being most of them erroneous. Who shall do it then? Now, in doing this, it must needs incur the Displeasure and Envy of the World. Moreover, I complain of them; I tax them with a popular Weakness, and an effeminate Softness; which makes them altogether unfit to understand any good and wise Thing: The strongest and boldest Propositions are most becoming a strong and elevated Mind; and nothing is strange to him, who knows what the World is: It is a Weakness, to wonder at any thing; we must stiffen our Courage, strengthen our Soul, harden and steel it, to enjoy, know, understand, and judge of all Things, though they seem to be never so strange. There is nothing above the Reach of the Mind, if it be not wanting to itself: but it ought not to do, or consent to, any thing, but what is good and honest, though all the World should talk of it. A wise Man does equally shew his Courage in these two Things: Those nice Persons are neither capable of the one, nor of the other; they are weak in both. Thirdly, I do not pretend to impose my own Opinion upon any body: I only offer my Thoughts to the Reader's Consideration. I shall not be angry if I am not believed; none but Pedants will be out of Humour upon such an account. Passion and Reason do not go hand in hand; and they, who are governed by the one, are not by the other. But why are they angry? Is it because I am not of their Opinion in every thing? I am not angry with them, because they differ from me. Is it because I say several Things, which do not agree with their or the ordinary Palates? That is the very reason why I publish them. I say nothing without giving some Reasons for it: If they have any thing to say to the contrary, which is grounded upon better Reason.

sons, I shall willingly hear it, and make my acknowledgment to them.' I exhort all my Readers to consider seriously these two Passages.

[L] It is easy to prove, both by his Writings and Actions, that he did not doubt of the Truth of Christianity.] 'His Innocence, his Candor, and his Probity, have at last overcome the Slanders and Calumnies of his Adversaries.' Thus speaks the Author of Charron's Elogy (38). And then he goes on: 'As to his Morals, Conversation, and Actions, as well in private as in public, I shall only say, that he conformed himself altogether to the Rules and Duties contained in the twelve Chapters of his second Book of Wisdom, and practised them very exactly. And as for his Religion and Belief, they may be seen in his Books of the Three Truths — and in his Christian Discourses, printed after his Death, which make a moderate Volume — His good Conscience appeared also in the manner, in which he possessed, or left, his Benefices. His Piety discovers itself in the Will, which he wrote with his own Hand, the thirtieth of January 1602; — wherein, after having returned Thanks to GOD, for the Benefits he had received from him in his Life-time, and having most ardently supplicated him, through his infinite and incomprehensible Goodness, and through the Mercy of his well-beloved Son our Lord and Saviour Jesus CHRIST, and through all his Merits, multiplied and spread over all his Members, the holy Elect, to grant him the Pardon and Remission of his Sins, to take and hold him for his, to assist and direct him with his Holy Spirit, so long as he should be in this World, to preserve, and make him persevere with a sound Mind in his Love and Service, and, at the Point of Death, to receive his Soul among the rest of his beloved Children, and to inspire all his holy Elect with a desire of praying and interceding for him; he left, among other things, a Legacy of Two hundred Livres to the Church of Condom, if he should be buried there, upon Condition, that, on the Day of his Decease, a high Mass should be said for him, every Year, and an Absolution on his Grave: Moreover, he gives Two thousand Four hundred Crowns to poor Scholars, and Maids, who are to be married, the Revenue of which shall be yearly and perpetually distributed, one half to three or four Scholars, and the other half to three, four, or five, poor Maids.' Add to this, I. The fervent Desire he had to confine himself to a Monastery, according to the Vow he had made. II. The care he took to consult three Casuists, before he held himself free from That Vow (39). Is it not an amazing thing, that such a Person should be defamed as an Enemy to Christianity, and an Atheist? Is it not a manifest and deplorable Effect, either of the Malignity, or of the Weakness of Mens Minds? Here are some Verses of the Prior Ogier, against Father Garasse, in Favour of Charron:

Damnatur sic Charro Pius doctusque, Garasso
Execratore, atque puer cunabula fandi
Vix habet, & primæ lallat documenta Minervæ, Quamvis sancta ejus tot adhuc Ecclesia verbis
Perfonet eloquii, Verique in triplice libro
Fortiter hæreticæ frangat mendacia sectæ (40).

Thus pious Charron, if Garasse says true,
Scarce the first Elements of Learning knew;
Tho' still the Church his Eloquence reſounds,
Which lying Heresy so strongly wounds.

This Writer's Prose is yet more glorious to Peter Charron. Read the eleventh Chapter of his Judgment of the Doctrines curieuses, where you will find the Confutation of Garasse's pretended Proofs of Charron's Atheism. Read also Garasse's Reply (41); it will serve, as much as any thing, to shew his Temerity; for all that he quotes out of Charron is either true, or unfaithfully related, or may bear a good Sense.

thousand Readers, there are hardly Three to be found in any Age, who are well qualified to judge of a Book, wherein the Ideas of an exact and metaphysical Reasoning are set in Opposition to the most common Opinions. I wonder that Moreti has taken Charron's Part [M]; for he might have found himself involved in the Censure, which the Print, prefixed to the Book of Wisdom, exposes to the Eyes of the Public. It is a Figure, which seems to favour the Sceptics [N]. I must say something of what Sorel observes concerning our Author [O]. This will give me

But, it will be said, did not Charron say, that all Men boast wrongfully to have a Religion, which comes from God? These are his Words: 'Religions must be brought in, and given by an extraordinary and heavenly Revelation; they must be received by divine Inspiration, and as coming from Heaven: and, indeed, all say, that they receive them, and believe them. All use this Jargon, that they have them not from Men, nor any Creature, but from God. To speak the Truth, without any Flattery or Disguise, there is no such thing; they have received them by human Hands and Means (42).' I answer, that in the second Edition he excepted the true Religion. He goes on thus: 'Which is true in all respects as to false Religions; they are meer human, or diabolical, Inventions; but the true ones, as they are of another resort, so they come, and are received from another Hand: Nevertheless, we must make a Distinction. As to the Reception, The first and general Publication of them was, Domino co-operante, sermonem confirmante sequentibus signis, divine and miraculous.' Had he not said a little before, 'That Unbelievers and irreligious Men are such, because they consult and rely too much upon their own Judgment, being willing to examine and judge of Matters of Religion according to their Capacity, and handle it with their own and natural Tools. A Man must be simple, obedient, and meek, to be well qualified for Religion; he must believe, and submit his Judgment out of Respect and Obedience to the Laws, and suffer himself to be directed and governed by public Authority: Captivum intellectum ad obsequium fidei (43). These Words may serve him for a Shield against all the Darts of his Enemies; for, if you object against him, that he makes some Remarks, which strike at Religion, and shew, that he was more persuaded of the Force of his Remarks, than of the Truths, at which those Remarks are levelled, he may answer you: 'I should be such a one as you say, if I were directed by the weak Light of my Reason; but I do not trust such a Guide; I submit myself to God's Authority, I captivate my Understanding to the Obedience of Faith.'

[M] I wonder, that Mr Moreti has taken Charron's Part. He has done it with great Warmth: so far as to say, that du Pleix is brutishly passionate (44), according to his Custom. This Expression seems to me too harsh. Du Pleix, speaking of the Bergards, says (45), 'That they believed there could be no Sin in following Nature, and that, in his Youth, he had familiarly known Peter Charron, Theologal of Condom, who was possessed with such Errors, and preached them in his Sermons; and that he held many other dangerous Opinions, some of which he had inserted among the Follies of his WISDOM.' Here is a great Affront put upon Charron by this Author. There had been perhaps a Quarrel between them, which made him speak with so much Animosity. These are Sorel's Words (46): He is also too angry, not considering, that du Pleix's Design was rather to advance an Antithesis, and a Quibble, than to use very offensive Words. Note, that Moreti gives a very wrong Account of what concerns Charron's Desire to become a Carthusian. He does not explain, why the Age of Forty seven Years was an Obstacle to it, and he supposes, that Charron did not dedicate himself to the Ecclesiastical State, till after his useless monastic Vow: which is very false.

[N] A Figure, prefixed to his Wisdom, seems to favour the Sceptics. Charron caused Wisdom to be represented, in the Title-Page of his Book, 'by a Woman stark naked — with a healthful, manly, and smiling Face — standing, with her Feet joyed on a Cube: having on her Head a Crown of Laurel and Olive, representing Victory and Peace; and an empty Space about her, signifying Liberty. On her right Side, these Words, I know not, which is her Motto; and on her left Side, these other Words, Peace and little, which is the Author's Motto. — Beneath are four little, ill-favoured, vile, and wrinkled Women chained; and their Chains are fastened to the Cube, which is under Wisdom's Feet, who despises, condemns, and tramples upon them, two of which are on the right Side of the Title of the Book, to wit, Passion and Opinion. Passion is lean, and has a disordered Face; Opinion appears with wild Looks, fickle, heedless, supported by many Persons, which are the Mob. The other two are on the other Side of the Title, to wit, Superstition, with a chilled Face, joining both Hands, like a Servant trembling for Fear. And false Science, an artificial, acquired, and pedantic Virtue, a Slave to Laws and Customs, with a Face puffed up, proud, and arrogant, with lofty Eye-brows, reading in a Book, wherein are these Words, Yes, No (47).

[O] We must say something of what Sorel observes concerning this Author. He says, among other things, that some Persons affirm, 'That Charron is more dangerous than Montagne, who was a Cavalier, because, being a Divine and a Preacher, his Book is read as a Piece that may serve for Christian Instruction, and yet he has very bad Notions of Religion' (48). Sorel mentions two of them; but, because he abridges the Words of the Original too much, I will set them down at large at the end of this Remark. To this some answer, continues he, that Charron was a Man, who professed to speak freely, according to his Thoughts, and that if, notwithstanding his good Intention, every thing he says is misinterpreted, it is not his Fault. I shall observe, by the way, that a Layman, who is an Author, and has no Character, ought to enjoy a greater Liberty of speaking what he thinks, than a Doctor of Divinity, a Preacher, or a Professor; for it is presumed, that such Persons say nothing but what they design for Instruction, and what they desire others should believe. Therefore it is supposed, that they have well examined their Doctrines, and their Character will easily persuade the Hearers to yield to their Authority. But when a Layman, without a Title, speaks, he makes no great Impression; his particular Opinions are looked upon as Things spoken at random, and consequently his Pyrrhonism is of no dangerous Consequence. It is therefore certain, that the Venom, which might be in Montagne's Writings, would be a great deal less dangerous, than That, which should be found in Charron's Books. I have mentioned, somewhere else, an Observation of Sorel, which is, that a Physician, whose Name was Cbanet, maintained, against Charron, that Beasts do not reason. He adds, that 'Some body said (49), that Charron was only Montagne's and du Vair's Secretary. In effect, Charron has taken many Philosophical Sentences, Word for Word, out of Montagne's Essays; and his Description of the Passions is wholly Mr du Vair's.' He observes, that 'many Persons of Honour and Probity have taken Charron's Part (50). The learned Naudé said, in his Bibliographia, That he esteemed him so much, that he preferred him before Socrates; that Socrates spoke to his Scholars confusedly, and according as there was occasion for it; whereas Charron had reduced Wisdom into an Art, which was a divine Work, and that, if he spoke like Seneca and Plutarch in some Places, he carried them always further, than they intended to go. In short, it must not be thought, that a Man of an unblameable Life, and of an exemplary Moderation, as Charron was, had any ill Design in his Writings.' This Conclusion is a great deal better than the Translation of Gabriel Naudé's Latin Words. 'Petrus Charondas vel hoc ipse me occasion to set down the two Passages, which raised the greatest Clamours against our Divine; the one concerns the Immortality of the Soul; the other relates only to Religion. I believe I may very well say, that the Candour of this learned Man, in representing the Objections of the Libertines, contributed greatly to make People doubt of his Christianity. It is certain, that he did not enervate the Objections. I shall give an Instance of it, which related to the Divisions of the Christians [P] and their mutual Hatred. It is remarkable, that, in the Year 1607 (g), there remained no Male Issue of Thibaut Charron (h), the Father of him, who Sane ejus liber & Aristotelem nobis exhibet & Senecam, & Plutarchum, ac divinius etiam aliquid præ se fert, quam antiquioribus cunctis & recentioribus fuerit concessum (51). It is manifest, that Sorel has misrepresented Naudé's Thought.

(51) Naudéus, Bibliographia Politica, pag. m. 13.

Let us set down the two Passages, which I have promised. It happens sometimes, that Things, which are not good, and even those, which are bad, ought to be authorized; as if, to be honest, one ought to have a Tincture of Dishonesty. This is to be seen, not only in the Administration of Policy, and of Justice, but also in Religion; which plainly shews, that the whole Conduct of Men is a crazy Structure, and very weakly built. This is the first Passage; you will find it in the fourth Chapter of the first Book of Wisdom, pag. 25, of the Bourdeaux Edition, 1601. The Author struck out the last Lines in the Paris Edition, 1604. He stopped, after having said (52), And this is to be seen every where, in Policy, Justice, Truth, and Religion. But note, that he did not curtail what he had said for the Proof of his Thesis. After all, said he, is there any thing, which discovers human Weakness better than Religion? He had proved it by the Scripture, and by evident Notions. This whole Passage was preserved in the Edition he corrected, and which was examined after his Death. From whence we may infer, that, upon several Occasions, a Man appears to be an Heretic, only by his manner of expressing himself. Take away certain Words, which seem too harsh, and make use of others, which signify the same thing, but are not so blunt, and, whereas you was accounted an Heretic, you will be looked upon as Orthodox; the printing of your Work shall be no more forbidden, and the Sale of it will be permitted. At the bottom, Charron's Assertion, proved and explained as it is in his Book, is most true. Here is the second Passage: 'The Immortality of the Soul is a thing most universally, religiously, and plausibly received all over the World (I mean an outward and public Profession, and not an inward, serious, and true Belief, which shall be spoken of hereafter) the most usefully believed, and the most weakly proved, and grounded upon human Reasons. These Words are to be read in the fifteenth Chapter of the first Book of Wisdom, of the Bourdeaux Edition: They were rectified in this manner. 'The Immortality of the Soul is a thing the most universally, religiously (it is the chief Foundation of all Religion) and plausibly entertained by all the World: I mean, with an outward and public Profession, but not so much with a serious, inward, and true one; as it appears from so many Epicureans, Libertines, and Scoffers. Nevertheless, the Sadducees, who were the most considerable Men among the Jews, did not scruple to deny it. It is most usefully believed, though not sufficiently proved by Natural and Human Reasons; but it is properly, and better, grounded upon Religion, than upon any other thing (53).'

whose Faith, as to This Doctrine, is only founded on Revelation (54), but in relation to the Libertines, who might take Advantage of the Authority of so famous an Ecclesiastic. After all, This Prejudice, I think, was not to be feared; for the learned Libertines care but little, whether or no a Divine owns, that the Philosophical Proofs of the Immortality of the Soul are not strong. They are not ignorant, that such a Confession is of no Advantage to them, so long as the Proofs, taken from the Scripture, are so demonstrative, as they are. They know very well, that Aristotle's Hypotheses (55) concerning the Mortality and Materiality of the Souls of Beasts, and concerning a real Distinction between Matter and Extension (56), enervate all Arguments, taken from Reason, for the Spirituality of our Souls. Whether this be owned or not, they suppose the Thing is not the less clear for it. To this very Day, they persist in their Prepossessions, because they see, that the strong Proofs, which the new Philosophy affords, for the Immortality of the Soul, are liable to these two Inconveniencies, either that the Souls of Beasts are immortal, or that Beasts are meer Machines.

(54) The common people are ignorant of the Philosophical Arguments for the Immortality of the Soul.

(55) As they were explained in Charron's time, in the Protestant and Catholic Universities, they acknowledged Aristotle's Categories; they believed therefore that Quantity is distinct from Matter, as Accidents are distinct from Substance.

(56) The Peripatetic Protectors have indeed maintained, that actual Quantity is inseparable from Matter, but not that it is the Essence of it.

[P] He did not enervate the Difficulties of the Libertines. I shall give an Instance of it, which relates to the Divisions of Christians.] 'In truth it is a strange thing, that the Christian Religion, which, being the only true one, as coming from God, ought to be indivisible, since there is but one God, and one Truth, should nevertheless be torn into so many Parts, and divided into so many contrary Opinions and Sects; inasmuch that there is not any one Article of Faith, or Point of Doctrine, but what has been differently debated and contradicted by Sects and Heresies. And That, which makes it to appear more strange, is, that such Divisions or Partialities are not to be found in the false Religions of the Heathens, Jews, and Mahometans. For their Divisions are either few and inconsiderable, as in the Jewish and Mahometan Religions; or, if they have been many, as in the Pagan Religion, and among the Philosophers, they have not produced very great Disturbances in the World; whereas there have been great and pernicious Divisions from the beginning of Christianity; and they have continued ever since. For it is a terrible thing to consider the Effects, which the Divisions of Christians have produced. In the first place, as to the Political State of the World, many Alterations and Subversions of Republics, Kingdoms, and Kingly Races, and Divisions of Empires, have happened, so far as to disturb the whole World with cruel, furious, and more than bloody Exploits, to the great Scandal, Shame, and Reproach of Christendom: in which, under the Name of Zeal and Affection to Religion, each Party hates the other mortally, and thinks it lawful to commit all manner of Hostilities. A thing, which is not to be seen in other Religions. The Christians alone are permitted to be Murderers, Perfidious, and Traitors, and to exercise all sorts of Cruelties against one another, against the Living, and the Dead, against the Honour, Life, Memory, and Minds, Graves, and Ashes of Men, with Fire and Sword, with sharp Libels, Cursings, Banishments, both from Heaven and Earth, taking dead Bodies out of their Graves, burning of Bones, and removing of Altars, without any Composition, with such a Rage, that all consideration of Kindred, Friendship, Merit, and Obligation, is thrown off. He that was yesterday extolled to the Skies, and called a great, learned, virtuous, and wise Man, if he happens to change sides this day, is preached and wrote against, and proclaimed an ignorant, and and a wretched Man. In this they shew their Zeal for Religion; but, in all other things, relating to the Practice of religious Duties, they appear very indifferent. Moderate and discreet Men are noted and suspected as being lukewarm, and wanting Zeal. It is an abominable Fault, to be kind and civil to those of the contrary Party. Some are scandalized at these things, as if the Christian Religion taught Men to hate and persecute others, and was designed to indulge our Passions of Ambition, Avarice, Revenge, Hatred, Spight, Cruelty, Rebellion, and Sedition: which are elsewhere more quiet, and less violent, when they are not set on by Religion (57).

(57) Charron, in the first chapter of the third Book of his Three Truths.

This great Scandal might at this day be represented in more elegant Terms; but I defy our best Writers to express it with greater Force, and to paint the Shamefulness of it in more lively Colours. Charron employs all his Skill to remove this Scandal (58); and whoever should call him a Prevaricator in this respect, would be as unjust as Garasse was, who called him so upon another Account. Let us set down the Words of this Jesuit; they are most unjust. 'There likewise (59) he openly declares, tho', according to his usual way, with a treacherous and smooth train of Words, That

(58) Id. ibid.

Religion is a wise Invention of Men, to keep People to their Duty: and, although he seems to expose this as an Atheistical Tenet, yet, like Lucilio Vannini, he betrays his Cause; for he mentions their Arguments, explains and comments upon them, and then leaves them unanswered: A Prevarication common to these two Writers (60). It is

(59) That is, in the first Book of the Three Truths.

(60) Garasse, Apologie contre la Censure de la Doctrine Curieuse, pag. 266.

false, that Charron does this; for, after having faithfully proposed the Objections of the Atheists, he refutes them with great Application and Solidity. But this displeases vulgar Authors, and even great Authors, who have more Wit and Learning than Sincerity. They would always have the Enemies of the good Cause represented in a languishing and ridiculous Equipage, or at least their strong Objections confuted by stronger Answers. Sincerity does not allow of the first, and sometimes the nature of the Subject makes the other impossible. I have been a long time surpris'd to see, that Those are looked upon as Prevaricators, who propose great Difficulties to themselves, and refute them weakly. What! would you have the Answers of a Divine about Mysteries, which are above Reason, to be as clear as the Objections of a Philosopher? From this very thing, that a Doctrine is mysterious and incomprehensible to the weakness of human Mind, it results necessarily, that our Reason will oppose it with very strong Arguments, and that it can find no other good Solution but God's Authority. However it be, Charron did not flatter his Party. He had a penetrating Wit; he discovered at a great Distance all that could be said by two Disputants. He took his Measures accordingly, explained himself ingenuously, and made use of no Cunning to obtain the Victory. But he found himself the worse for it; for the World dislikes such Candour.

I shall give elsewhere (61) another Example of his Candour in setting forth Difficulties.

(61) In Remark [G], of the Article SIMONIDES.

CHASTEL (JOHN) Son of a Woollen-Draper of Paris, made a wicked attempt upon the Life of Henry IV, the Twenty seventh of December 1594. That Prince, having taken a Journey towards the Frontiers of the Country of Artois, was, that day, returned to Paris; and, being in the Apartment of his Mistress (a), who was lodged at the Hotel du Bouchage, as he was coming forward to embrace Montigny, he received a Blow with a Knife on his Under-Lip, which broke one of his Teeth (b). John Chastel, who gave the Blow, and who had designed to have carried it to his Throat (c), was but 18 or 19 Years of Age. Having missed it, he let fall his Knife, and retired amidst the Croud - - - Every one was astonished, and - - - uncertain on whom to lay the blame; and this unhappy young Wolf had like to have escaped - - - Some one of the Company cast his eyes on him, and he was seized at a venture (d). 'His Wild Looks discovered that he had given the Blow (e). The King commanded the Captain of the Guards, who had secured him - - - to let him go, saying, that he pardoned him. Afterwards, understanding that he was a Disciple of the Jesuits, he said, Must the Jesuits, then, be convicted by my mouth (f)? This Parricide, being carried to the Prison of For l'Eveque (g), was interrogated by the Provost de l'Hôtel, and declared the Reasons, which had induced him to this Attempt [A]. He was conveyed the next day to the Conciergerie du Palais, and repeated what he had said at

[A] He made an Attempt on the Life of Henry IVth — and declared his Reasons for it. I cannot alledge an Author, less to be suspected, than the Historian, whose words I am going to cite. 'This Parricide (says he) (1) carried to the Prison of For l'Eveque, — there confessed, that he had a long time resolved within himself upon this Blow, and that, notwithstanding he had failed in the Attempt, he would yet perform it, if he should have it in his Power, believing it to be for the Service of Religion. That, eight Days before, he had taken this enterprise again into consideration, and, at about eleven o'Clock in the Morning, when he had determined to do what he had done, having seized on a Knife, which he had found on the Dresser, in his Father's House, he carried it into his Study, and returned from thence to dine with his Father and some other Persons. Being examined as to his Quality, and where he had studied, he said, that it was principally among the Jesuits, with whom he had been three Years, and the last time under Father John Gueret the Jesuit: That he had seen the said Father Gueret the Friday or Saturday before the Blow, having been carried to him by Peter Chastel, his Father, on a case of Conscience; which was, that he despaired of the Mercy of God on account of the great Sins he had committed: That he had been inclined to commit many enormous Sins against Nature, of which he had several times made Confession: That, to expiate these Sins, he was persuaded, that he ought to perform some signal Action: That he had often had an inclination to kill the King, and had discovered his disposition to his Father; on which his said Father had declared, that it would be a wrong Action. This was his Answer, when he was examined before the Provost de l'Hôtel: what he replied, the next Day, to the Officers of the Parliament is as follows. 'Being asked, what the signal Action was, which he said he had thought himself obliged to perform, to expiate the great Crimes, with which he felt his Conscience burthened, he said — That, believing himself forgotten of God, and being convinced that he should be damned as much as Antichrist, he was willing of two Evils to avoid the worst, and, being damned, he had rather it should be ut quatuor, than ut octo. Being asked, whether, falling into this Despair, he expected to be damned, or to save his Soul by this wicked Act, he said, That he believed the performance of this Act would serve to lessen his Punishment, being convinced, that he should be at the former Examination (b). He was condemned to Death, by an Arrêt of Parliament, the Twenty ninth of December 1594 [B], which Sentence was put in execution the same day by Torch-light. The same Arrêt banished all the Jesuits from France (i). The Father of John Chastel, and the Jesuit Gueret, under whom the Assassin had performed his Course of Philosophy, were tried the tenth of January following (k). We will mention, below, the Sentence passed on them [C], and give a short Analysis of a Work, which was printed some time after, and intitled, An Apology for John Chastel [D]. The Author of this Book relates, that a Lay-man, disguised as a Priest, was sent to confess John Chastel, in order by more punished, if he died without having attempted to kill the King, and less so, if he should make an effort to take away his Life: inasmuch that he thought the least degree of Punishment was a kind of Salvation in comparison of the most grievous. Being asked, where he had learned this new Divinity, he said, That he had acquired it through Philosophy. Being interrogated, whether he had studied Philosophy in the Jesuits College, he said, yes, and That under Father Gueret, with whom he had been two Years and a half. Being asked, whether he had not been in the Chamber of Meditations, into which the Jesuits carry the greatest Sinners, who there see the Figures of several Devils, in diverse frightful Shapes, under pretence of bringing them back to a better Life, to deter them, and to excite them by such admonitions to the Performance of some great Action, he said, that he had been often in that Chamber of Meditations. Being asked, by whom he had been persuaded to kill the King, he said, he had heard in several Places, that it ought to be held as a true Maxim, that it was lawful to kill the King, and that They, who said so, called him a Tyrant. Being asked, whether the Discourse about killing the King was not common among the Jesuits, he said, he had heard them say, that it was lawful to kill the King, and that he was out of the Church, and that he was not to be obeyed, or held as King, till he should be approved of by the Pope. Being again examined in the great Chamber, The Presidents and Counsellors thereof, and of the Tournelle, being assembled, he gave the same Answers, and laid down and maintained This Maxim; That it was lawful to kill Kings, even the reigning King, who was not within the Church, because, as he said, he was not approved of by the Pope (2).

[B] He was condemned to Death, by an Arrêt of Parliament, the Twenty ninth of December 1594. To know the Particulars of the Punishment, to which he was condemned, you must read what follows. 'The Court — has condemned, and does condemn the said John Chastel to make the amende honorable before the principal Gate of the Church of Paris, naked in his Shirt, holding a lighted Wax Candle of two Pound weight, and there, on his knees, to say and declare, that wickedly and traitorously he had attempted the said most inhuman and abominable Parricide, and wounded the King in the Face with a Knife; and that, through false and damnable Instructions, he had said, during the said Process, that it was lawful to kill Kings, and that King Henry IVth, now reigning, is not within the Church, till he procures the Approbation of the Pope: of which he repents, and asks Pardon of God, of the King, and of Justice. This done, to be led and conducted in a Sledge to the Grevé: There the Flesh of his Arms and Thighs to be torn off with Pincers, and his right Hand, holding the Knife, with which he attempted to perpetrate the said Parricide, to be cut off; afterwards his Body to be torn and dismembered by four Horses, his Body and Limbs thrown into the Fire, and burned to Ashes, and the Ashes to be cast into the Air. It has declared and does declare all his Goods confiscated to the King. Before which Execution, the said John Chastel shall be put to the Torture both ordinary and extraordinary, to discover the Truth of his Accomplices, and of any Circumstances resulting from the said Process (3).

Let us observe, that this Arrêt of the Parliament of Paris was put, at Rome, in the Index of the prohibited Books. The Author of the Anticodon does not forget this Circumstance; but This Answer was made to him. 'As to what he adds, that The Arrêt of Chastel was censured at Rome, it is replied, that it is false, speaking thus absolutely; for Answer was sent from Rome to the late King, that the Censure related only to the Matter of Right, not the Matter of Fact: assuring him, that they detested the Attempt of Chastel, as much as France itself; but that there was, in the Arrêt, a Clause definitive of Heresy, which they looked upon as belonging to the cognizance and determination of the Church: and this was the subject of the Censure (4). One of the Authors, who wrote against the Mystery of Iniquity (5), had recourse to the same Distinction. Rivetus, who replied, agreed with him as to the Fact; but he maintained, that the Censure deserved nevertheless to be condemned (6). Let us observe likewise, that the Jesuits published in Flanders, as well at Douay as in other Towns, an Advertisement to the Catholics, on the Arrêt given against them. This Advertisement, both in Latin and French, was spread over several Kingdoms of Christendom (7). It was answered. You will find, in Victor Cayet (8), the principal points of these two Pieces.

[C] The Father of John Chastel, and the Jesuit Gueret — were tried — we will relate, below, to what Punishment they were condemned. 'The Court has banished and does banish the said Gueret and Peter Chastel from the Kingdom of France; to wit, the said Gueret for ever, and the said Chastel for the term and space of nine Years, and for ever from the City and Suburbs of Paris; has enjoined them to observe their Exile on pain of being hanged and strangled without other form or manner of Process. It has declared and does declare all and every the Goods of the said Gueret confiscated to the King, and has condemned and does condemn the said Peter Chastel to a Fine of two thousand Crowns to the King, to be applied to purchase Bread for the Prisoners of the Conciergerie, to be imprisoned till the full payment of the said Sum, and the time of Banishment not to commence till the Day when the said Sum shall be paid. The said Court orders, that the House, in which the said Peter Chastel lived, shall be pulled down, demolished, and razed, and the Place applied to the Public, never to be again built on: in which place, to perpetuate the Memory of the wicked and detestable Parricide, attempted on the Person of the King, shall be erected an high Pillar of Free-Stone, with an Inscription, containing the causes of the said demolition, and erection of the said Pillar, which shall be raised with the Money arising from the demolition of the said House (9). The Historian, whom I copy, immediately adds; 'This Arrêt was accordingly executed, and the House pulled down, in the room of which was set up a Pillar, on the four Faces of which were engraved on Tables of black Marble, in Letters of Gold, viz. on one the Sentence of John Chastel, and the Jesuits; and on the three other Faces, Verses and other Inscriptions. This Pillar has been since pulled down, and to the Place, where it stood, they have brought a Spring, as I shall observe in the continuation of my History of the Peace (10).

This Writer has forgot one Circumstance, which ought not to have been omitted; to wit, that Gueret was put to the Torture, and confessed nothing.

[D] We shall give a short Analysis of a Work — intitled An Apology for John Chastel. The whole Title is as follows: An Apology for John Chastel of Paris, put to Death, and for the Fathers and Scholars of the Society of JESUS, banished the Kingdom of France;

this means to discover the whole Secret of the Affair; but that this pretended Confessor

France, against the Arrêt of Parliament, given against them at Paris, the Twenty ninth of December, Anno 1594. Divided into five Parts. By Francis de Verone Constantin.

The First Part contains seven Chapters, which tend to undeceive those, who judge of things only by the exterior conformity which one often sees between Good and Bad. If you consider the bare action of John Chastel, and the appearance of the Persons, you will find him to have committed a most abominable Parricide; for you will believe, that a private Person attempted to cut the throat of his lawful Prince: 'But whoever shall see likewise (adds the Author (11) not what is said, but what actually is, and with the Judgment, not of prejudiced Judges, but of the Church and the Estates, and of all Laws, Divine as well as Human, and the fundamental ones of the Kingdom, received, published, revered, practised, and held, time out of Mind, in France, to wit, an Excommunicated, Heretical, and Relapsed Prince, a Profaner of Things sacred, a declared public Enemy, an Oppressor of Religion, and as such excluded from all Right of coming to the Crown; and therefore a Tyrant instead of a King, an Usurper instead of a natural Lord, a Criminal instead of a lawful Prince; will take care (if he has not lost all sense and apprehension of Humanity, and Love towards God, the Church, and his Country) to affirm no otherwise, than that an Attempt to rid the World of him is a generous, virtuous, and heroic Act, comparable to the greatest and most praise-worthy to be met with in ancient History, both sacred and profane: There being but one thing to be said against it; that it was not accomplished, to send the wicked to his own place, like Judas, whose Followers, which are the Calvinists, he supports. And, whereas the Blow failed, the former will say, that it was a manifest favour of Heaven, and that whoever doubts it is an Atheist (as some prating Fellow has written): the latter will likewise say, and with too much Judgment, that it is a Demonstration, not of Favour, but of Wrath: not of Compassion, but of the Indignation of God against his People, over whom he would not yet cause the Rod of Affliction to cease, (whom he hath otherwise cursed) nor break the Yoke of his burthen, nor the staff of his Shoulder, nor the Rod of his Oppressor, as in the Day of Midian. And, as for the Tyrant himself, it is not so much Preservation, as deferring to a proper Season and Hour, which God has chosen, to punish him more severely in another World, when the measure of his Guilt shall be full, and the People chastised.' Note, that, at Ch. xii. Part v. p. 249, he gives hopes, that another Assassin will succeed better: 'if, what lately happened, says he, The first Blow, given to the Prince of the Beggars, (he speaks of William Prince of Orange) aimed only at the Jaw, the second has not failed afterwards. Of which the first was the Preface, as the same will happen to the Person that has been smitten on the same place.' My Reader will hereby perceive, that this Writer builds his Apology only on the Supposition, that Henry IV was not a King, but a Tyrant and Usurper.

He endeavours to prove, in the second Part, that the Action of Chastel is a just one. He grants, that the Persons of Kings are sacred (12); but he maintains, that 'the Intention of Chastel was not to offend or kill a King, tho' in his own Account such, and in whom is the Semblance of a King, no farther than the Gravity and Merit of the Person, at least his being reputed as sprung from the Blood of the Kings of France, and being served as King. Although otherwise he is by no means one, as being an Inheritor, neither of the Faith, nor the Virtue, nor the Merit of the Kings of France. And that, being on that account, that is to say on account of his Impiety and Heresy, most justly excluded by the Church and the States, he cannot be so at all, except in Fact and not in Right; which is called Tyranny, and Tyranny in the highest Sense (13).' He says, that the pretended Conversion of Henry IV cannot confer on him the Title of King (14), in Prejudice of the Excommunication as well of Right as Fact, which binds him ever bound, and which always works its Effect, in order to deprive him of the Royalty (15). He even affirms (16), that the Absolution of the Pope would not be sufficient to re-instate a Person, who has been condemned not only by the Church, but likewise by the States; for the Pope can remit Ecclesiastical Condemnation, but not Civil (17). He goes farther; he disputes his Right of Succession (18): he cites various Examples, which prove, that, even in France, the immediate Heirs of the Crown have been excluded, to make way for the Election of the most distant. 'And, as to the special Regulation of the Succession, adds he (19), when we consider, that, by the Confession of Doctors, all Right of Consanguinity ceases at the tenth Degree, we may judge how weak, 'yea, how null is his Right, who claims but from the Twenty second Degree.' He reckons differently from Mr de Perefixe, who places but ten or eleven Degrees of Distance between Henry III, and Henry IV (20), as I have said elsewhere (21). He says, in Chap. 11, that superior Commands set aside inferior, and that, according to this Rule, if it be forbidden in general to kill, yet that it is lawful to do it, as to certain Persons, and particularly Heretics and Tyrants (22). He cites hereupon some Passages of Scripture, and Canon-Law; and he maintains, in Chap. 12, that Heretics ought to be executed by private Persons, if it cannot be otherwise done. He alleges (23) an Arrêt of Parliament of the Year 1560, pronounced 'by the late President le Maître, against the Huguenots, by which any one is permitted to kill them. And 'This not without thoroughly considering, that there is no Beast more dangerous, than That which devours Souls; no Thief more pernicious than He, who robs Men of their Faith and Religion; no Aspic more venomous than That, which, in fawning, goes directly to the Heart; nor a more dangerous Poisoner than he, who corrupts the Waters of Jacob's Well * (which is the Word of God, or the Scripture), as did formerly the Phisicians.' In the thirteenth Chapter he collects together what has been said by various Authors on the Lawfulness of killing Tyrants. He says, that Lycanus †, Cajetan, Soto, Sylvestre, Fumus, and others after St Thomas, - - - Fernandus, Vasquius, Covarruvias ‡, and others, agree in the same Decision, and, even without taking Religion into the Question, 'that, with regard to Tyrants, who usurp, by Arms, or other unjust ways, an unjust Dominion, and to which they have no Right, and where there is no recourse to any Superior, to obtain Justice on them, nor any means to remove Tyranny, it is lawful for any one of the People to kill them; Even, adds Cajetan, by Poison, and treacherously. And St Thomas, in this respect, justifies an Expression of Cicero, alleged above in his Book of Offices: Adding as a reason; that, in as much as the Tyrant wages an unjust War against the People, both in general and in particular, and the People, on the contrary, have a just cause of War against him, they may do, against his Person, whatever the Right of War permits to be done against a real Enemy. And that, if he is thus killed, it is by Authority, not private, but public (24). The Heretics themselves, continues he (25), though they change their Discourse according to the Success of their Affairs, and according as they have a Prince, contrary or favourable to them, have filled their Books with it. Witness the Author of the Questions, under the Name of Junius Brutus: George Buchanan, in his Book de Jure Regni, &c. where he ranks Tyrants among savage Beasts, and who ought to be treated as such: Bodin likewise, in his Repub. who condemns a Tyrant, using Violence, to undergo the Law Valeria, which orders such Persons to be executed without Form, or Manner of Process: And, in consequence, the Executions, which, on that Account, they have done on great part of the Nobles, in France, Scotland, England, and Germany, by the Advice of Ministers, on pretence of their being Tyrants,

(20) We find no more between Robert of France, the Stem of the Bourbon Family, sixth Son of St Lewis, (the common Stem of Henry III, and Henry IV.) This Robert was born in the Year 1250, and Henry IV, in 1553. But the Difference between Mr de Perefixe, and the Author of the Apology of Chastel, arises from the different manner of reckoning these degrees in the Civil and Canon Law.

* spect, no difference between them and us, ex* cept as to the particular Determination of a Ty* rant, to know who is, and who is not one.* He ends this second Part with a long Detail of the particular Advantages of this Enterprize of John Chastel; and thereupon he throws out the most satirical and extravagant Reflexions on Henry IV.

He maintains, in the third Part, that the Action of Chastel is Heroic. He raises him above Ebud, and Phineas, and Matatbias (26); and he forgets not to compare his Courage with That of the two Assas- sins of the Prince of Orange (27), and That of James Clement. Nor does he forget the Pious Poet, Corn- elius Musfus (28), martyred in Holland, whose Execu- tioner, adds he, de Lumay, was afterwards paid as he deserved, being torn to pieces, and eaten by his own Dogs. Our Apologist describes particularly the Constancy of Chastel, in his Confession, his Examination, the Torture, the Amende Honorable, and his Death. He was pressed to declare, at the time of the Amende Honorable, that he repented, and asked Pardon of God; but, all maimed as he was by the Torture he had endured, he said, that 'he 'cried to God for Mercy for all the Sins he had 'committed in the whole course of his Life, and 'particularly that he had not accomplished his De'sign of delivering the World from the worst Ene'my the Church has at present upon Earth (29).'
A deplorable Thing! that Assassins of this sort should discover as much Constancy, as the most illustrious Martyrs of the Primitive Church.

In the fourth Part, he criticises the Arrêt of the Parliament of Paris against John Chastel, and he pretends to discover in it some notorious Falsehoods, and a manifest Herey, and Impertinencies in the Censure of the Fact, and the Condemnation to the Amende Honorable, and the Prohibition to speak of the Designs of John Chastel. He insists, that they are neither scandalous, nor seditious, nor contrary to the Word of God.

The fifth Part is taken up in shewing the Vices and Impertinencies, which he pretends to find in the Arrêt against the Jesuits. Here he breaks out into brutal Rage against Acilles de Harlat, First President, and Servin, Advocate-General of the Parliament of Paris. He maintains, that there are Calumnies and Impostures in this Arrêt, he launches out in praise of the Jesuits, he replies to the Plea of Antony Arnauld, he takes pains to vindicate the two Jesuits, one of whom was put to the Torture (30), and the other hanged (31). He makes a Martyr of the latter. He concludes his Book with a forcible Exhortation to exterminate the Enemy of God and his Church.

This Apology of John Chastel was printed in the Year 1595. Some body reprinted it in the Year 1610, after the tragical Death of Henry the Great, and added to it four other small Pieces. I. The first was printed at Paris, in the Year 1589, for Nicolas Nivelle, in St James's Street, at the two Pillars, and Rolin Thierry, in the English Street, near the Place Maubert, Bookseller and Printer of the Holy Union, and is intituled, The terrible Effects of the Excommunication of HENRY DE VA-LOIS, and of HENRY DE NAVARRE, in which is contained an authentic Account of the Death of Henry de Valois, and that Henry de Navarre is disqualified for the Crown of France. II. The second is, A Letter of the most illustrious Cardinal Montalto, written by Order of our Holy Father the Pope, to the General Council of the Holy Union.
It had been printed at Paris, with Privilege, in the Year 1589, for the same Booksellers as the other.
III. The third is intituled, A Discourse, wherein is shewed, that it is not lawful for a Subject to speak evil of his King, much less to attempt on his Person. IV. The fourth is intituled, The Groans of France on the Death of King Henry IV, and the Fidelity of the French. The Collection of all these Pieces comprehends Three hundred and twenty three Pages in 8vo, of which the Two hundred and fifty six first are for the Apology of John Chastel.

This second Edition has not prevented this Book from becoming very scarce; for which Reason I believed my Readers would be pleased to find here an Analysis of it.

The Publisher, in 1610, confesses, that what principally induced him thereto, was, among other things, that the World might clearly see, that it is from the School of the Jesuits, that Assassins, such as Ravillac, proceed. He says, that This Parricide was confirmed in the Design of assassinating his King, following, among others, the damnable Doctrine of this Apology of John Chastel, in which it is impudently denied, that Henry IV, even though he were absolved, could be King; and besides it is taught in express Terms, that Heretics and their Abettors, doomed to death by Divine and Human Laws, and principally Relapsed Heretics, may be executed by private Persons, if it can no otherwise be done; as may be seen in Chapter viii, and following, of the second Part (32). Note, he observes, that 'the Jesuits had found out an Expedient to 'cover and suppress the said Apology, not thro'
'Shame or Repentance, which they might have,
'on account of such abominable Crimes and Par-
'ricides, but only lest the Horror, which Kings
'and Princes might thence conceive against them,
'should hinder them from entering into their 'Courts and Councils, to execute there the Will 'of the Pope (33). The Author of the Anti Coton affirms, that the Apology of John Chastel came from the Jesuits Forge (34); but the latter maintain, that it was an Imposture, and that no Jesuit had a hand in it (35). Every one knows,
'they are the Words of Richeome (36), that the 'Jesuits are by no means the Authors of a Book,
'De Justa Henrici Tertii Abdicatione, nor of Veron
'Constantine's Apology for John Chastel; and the 'late King (37), being fully satisfied as to our In'nocence, would not listen to any of the Calumnia-
'tors, who accused us before his Majesty.'

It is highly probable, that those two Books were composed by John Boucher, who, as has been seen in his Article (38), was the most seditious and furious Preacher, that ever breathed a Spirit of Revolt against the lawful Powers.

[E] — the Author of this Book relates, that a Layman, disguised as a Priest, was sent to confess John Chastel — but that this pretended Confessor knew not how to play his Part.] The following are the very words of the Author of the Apology:
'And, to mention Artifices, the good Lieutenant
'Lugoly, who played his Part therein so well, can 'give a good account of it: As also Those, who 'shared with him in the Sacrilege committed by 'him, disguising himself in the Habit of a Priest,
'and pretending to be a Confessor, in order to 'draw from, or to be able to say he had drawn 'from, the Penitent, by way of sacramental Con'fession, something, which might be made use of,
'both against him, and Those, who partook with 'him in the Martyrdom (39). — Could he (39)
'infamous a Cheat impose upon the Penitent?
'This Line is too weak to pull up so large a Fish.
'It is Childrens Play, and too gross an Artifice: so 'strong a Fly is not to be taken in such a Spider's
'Web: such Hares are not caught with such a 'Drum; nor such Birds in sight of the Nets. To 'play the Farce, they should have better understood
'mimickry: And the poor Animal, who under'stood not the Trade of confessing, like him,
'who frequents this Sacrament but once in a Year
'(as the Englishman answered, after the Treason
'of Paris), and therefore not being cunning in 'this Matter, as he is in the Courts of Justice,
'and at deceiving Women and young Girls, how
'grave soever he then looked, and how dark soever
'it was, did not fail of being immediately dis'covered, by one, who understood it better, and
'had been more conversant in it, than himself.

Accounts of this horrible Affassination vary so much [F]; nor is this the most scandalous ordinary Blessing, which the Confessor says to the Penitent before Confession. Whence, being discovered by Chastel, not to be a Priest, as a Rat by his Noise, and an Ass by his braying, and as fit for this Trade, as a Child to be an Hercules, or a Fool a Philosopher, and standing in need of a Precedent Book, like a young Conveyancer, the Mine being discovered, before it could take Fire, the Invention came to nothing, and the Wretch in as great Confusion, as his impious Ignorance, and ignorant Impiety required. Saving however his Redress, in impudently spreading the vile Reports as above, against him, from whom he had heard no other Discourse, than a severe Reprimand, and Detestation of his Sacrilege (40).

(40) Ibid. chap. 6. p. 137, 138.

The Apologist declaims with all his Might against this Abuse of the Sacrament of Penitence, and calls it Impiety and Sacrilege, and pretends, that no preceding Examples can excuse it. 'Though the like Action, says he, had been before done by two others of the same Faction, the one an open Enemy and an Heretic, the other a Traitor and a Hypocrite. The first of whom was Sautour of Champagne, in the Person of the Doctor and Preacher Mauclerc, whom he took on the Road from Treys, where he had been preaching the Lent-Sermons, as he was returning to Paris, in the Year 1589: on whom he played this Trick, after giving him all the Fears of Death, and upon his desiring to have a Confessor. The other was Marins of Gascogne, Nephew of the Sieur de Belin, one of the Ministers of the Treason of Paris, and left for this purpose in the Town, in quality of a Surgeon, Domestic of the Sieur le Bailleur, in the Year 1594, a little before the Treason, on account of a stray Ring, at the House of a poor Woman too well known, and whom, as well as others, and even her nearest Relations, he imposed upon, and on a Suspicion he had, that the Surgeon, who came there to dress him, had taken it. After having on this occasion squeezed his Thumbs, and abused him several other ways, he led him by Night, with his Eyes bound, to the River in order to throw him in, and, upon the poor Wretch's demanding Confession, imposed upon him in the same manner as the other, pretending himself to be a Priest. And the next Day the Ring was brought back to the Woman, by one of her other Lovers, who had taken it by way of Pass-time (41). But, if this be worthy of a Rover, a Robber, and a Heretic, (as it is an Invention of the Stews, and of a Heretic, to impose on Women, and to make a jest of the Church), why is it of a Man of the Law, of a Lieutenant of the Provost of the Hostel, and the long Robe, and of one, who, with his Cassock and Beads, counterfeits the Jesuit? If Heresy joined to Arms, and the Rashness and Fury of Mars to the Brothel of Venus, have given the Rein to this Sacrilege, how is it, that the Discretion and Wisdom of those, who are called Gods, and call themselves Catholics, carries them to the same Crime, and to so great an Impiety? What Agreement, between War, which hears not the Laws, and the State Gravity of those, who discourse of the Laws? Between the Barbarity and Licentiousness of Arms, and the Majesty of Justice? To counterfeit a sacred Character, &c. (42). He refutes likewise those, who may say, that it was following the Example of the Heads of this Parliament, who, at the extraordinary Sessions of Poitiers, named the Priests, who were to confess, forbidding to apply to others, and requiring them, on pain of Death, to reveal the Confessions: which they have since continued, and seem willing at present to continue, at Paris, after the same manner, to name the Confessors, whom they still make use of; under pretence, that it is for a good end, that they may not err in distributing Justice, nor the Guilty escape, and the Innocent suffer, and thus pass it gently into a Custom, maintaining, that is right so to do: O ridiculous Hypocrisy, and damnable Impiety (43)!

(41) Ibid. Part III. chap. 3. pag. 128, 129.

(42) Ibid. chap. 3. pag. 130.

(43) Ib. p. 131.

He maintains, that Priests ought never to reveal Confession, on any account, or in obedience to the Command of any one whatever, and that they are bound rather to suffer Death, which will be a true Martyrdom (44). And thereupon he expels the Jacobin Antony Antonine Temermans, Native of Dunkirk, who was strangled at Antwerp, in the Year 1582, for refusing to reveal the Confession of Jaureguy (45).

(44) Ibid. pag. 133.

(45) The Affassination of the Prince of Orange.

The Relation, which I shall speak of in the following Remark, does not report the Fact in the manner we have seen above. It supposes, that, John Chastel being taken, some of the principal Courtiers tried all imaginable means to make him confess, who set him on; and that they threw him on the Ground, and held a Dagger to his Breast, threatening immediately to stab him to the Heart, if he did not discover the Truth; that he replied, that no one had urged him to this Act, and that he demanded a Priest, to whom he might confess; that this favour was granted him; but that they suborned a Layman, who, disguising himself as a Priest, came near him, to hear his Confession; that Chastel represented to this counterfeit Priest the Confusion of Mind, which hindered him from recollecting his Sins, and begged that he might have a Paper, in which he had written his general Confession, a few Days before; that the Paper was found in the House of his Father, and not the least Hint concerning any other Person found in it. See the Margin; you will there find a Narration, very different from this, as to the Paper, in which the Affassin had written his general Confession (46).

I cannot believe, on the Testimony of the Apologist, that they endeavoured to discover the Secret by a pretended Confessor: but I know not whether it be right absolutely to deny it; for, if, in a common Process, and of no great Consequence, Judges think it allowable to employ a thousand Falsehoods, to extort the Truth, either from the Accused, or the Witnesses, why should we think, that, when the Life of Henry IV., on which at that time depended the public Safety, was in question, the Judges should scruple to make use of the means of a Confessional? They know, that the Weakness of Mind, which exposes a Man to suffer himself to be induced to such an Affassination, renders him susceptible of the greatest Courage. They, who, by the Motive of the Church's Good, suggest to him the design of killing a Prince, suggest to him likewise, by the Expectation of the Glory of Martyrdom, a firm Resolution to suffer all kind of Torments, and persuade him, that he will lose all the Merit of his Action, if he reveals his Accomplices; but that, if he can keep the Secret, his Constancy will procure him a thousand and a thousand Benedictions in this World, and an high Degree of Glory in Paradise. They ought therefore to believe, that John Chastel would hold out against the Torture, and that the only means of discovering whence proceeded those fatal and pernicious Counsels, which exposed the Life of the King to so many black Attempts, was to suborn a pretended Confessor. If the Paper, which was found in his Father's House, had contained what they wanted, they would, no doubt, have taken it for one of those convincing Proofs, on which a Sentence of Condemnation may justly be founded. The Judges of the Lady de Brinvillier acted in this manner (47), without any regard to the Reasons of her Advocate. See the Factum or Case of Mr Nivelles for this Lady (48).

(46) Thuanus, lib. 112, pag. 652, says, that they, who were sent to the House of John Chastel's Father, found, in examining every corner of the House, the Paper, in which this Wretch had written his general Confession: he did not deny this Writing. In it he acknowledged himself guilty of Sodomy, and of attempting to commit Incest with his Sister.

(47) But observe, that they had many other Proofs, besides those which were found in a Paper, in which she had written her Sins, in order to confession.

scandalous Circumstance of that Accident. Du Pleix was in the wrong to say, that John Chastel replied to his Judges, that the Devil had pushed him on to this wicked Attempt (1).

on them. He perpetually insists on Chastel's naming no Person, who suggested to him the Resolution of killing Henry IV; and he says not a word of what I relate in the Remark [A], and which was thought sufficient to render the Jesuits suspected. Sincerity does not allow of these sort of Suppressions; there is in them a very scandalous Artifice. Richeome could not avoid discussing the Answers, which John Chastel made to the Judges (51): it was a very unlucky Step for him; though, as to the rest, he has very artfully taken advantage of the Circumstances, favourable to his Order, which are found in the Prologs (52). Let us not forget, that he undertakes to prove the falsehood of the Interrogatory (53), which I have taken from Cayet (54), and which Tuanus, and an hundred other Writers, alledge. And note, that this Plea of Falsehood is in a Book, in which a Writer is refuted, who had made use of these Words. 'These are the express Terms of the Interrogatory of Chastel, the Original of which your Majesty may see, which shall be attested by more than thirty Presidents, or Counsellors, more credible a thousand Times, than all that the Parties can say in their own Cause. Being asked, where he had learnt this new Divinity, he said, it was by Philosophy, &c.'

The Temple of the Ruin of some unhappy Noblemen both of France, and of foreign Nations, in imitation of Boccaccio, printed at Paris by Gallot du Pré, in the Year 1517. The Instruction of a young Prince, containing eight Chapters, printed with the other Works (3). The Epitaphs of Hector and Achilles, with the Judgment of Alexander the Great, printed at Paris, 1525, in 8vo (4). The History of James de Lalain, Knight of the Golden Fleece, printed at Brussels, in 4to, in the Year 1634, and many other Pieces, which are to be found in Manuscript in the Abbey of St Vast, at Arras (5). He wrote the Life of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, in French. I do not believe, that it was printed. Pontus Heuterus had read it, and has borrowed something from it (6).

[B] — which have not been so long esteemed, as Olivier de la Marche said they would. These are his Words: 'I am sorry — I cannot have the Stile and subtil way of speaking of Messire George Chastelain, deceased, a Knight of my Acquaintance, who, though a Fleming born, wrote in the French Language, and did so many fine things in my time, that his Works, and the Subtlety of his Speech, will make him a more glorious and considerable Man, an hundred Years hence, than at this present time (7). This Prediction proved false: The Memory of this Writer was lost by degrees, and few People knew him by his Writings, fifty Years after his Death. Olivier de la Marche calls him, The Pearl and Star of all the Historiographers, that, in his time, or long before, have made use of Pen, Ink, and Paper (8). John le Fevre, Lord of St Remi, was, without doubt, in great hopes, that the Writings of this Author would be immortal. He declares, 'That, having written some short Memoirs, he had sent them to the noble Orator George Chastelain, to make use of them, at his Discretion, in the noble Histories and Chronicles, made by him, although they are but of little value, if compared with his Work. — I shall speak of the great and noble Actions of the Dukes and Knights of his Order, but not an hundredth part so much at large, as the notable Orator George le Chastelain has described them (9).'

CHASTELUX (CLAUDIUS, Sire de) Viscount d'Avalon, Baron de Quarré, Counsellor of State, and Chamberlain to the Duke of Burgundy, was created Maréchal of France, the second of June, 1418. He was sent into Guienne in the Year 1419, and deprived of his Office of Maréchal, the Twenty second of January, 1421. He sustained the Siege of Crevant against the Constable of Scotland, in the Year 1423, and acquired by it a very particular Privilege in Auxerre [A]. He assisted, in 1431, on the part of the Duke of Burgundy, at the Assembly, which was held in the same Town, to treat of Peace with the Embassadors of the Kings of France and England, and died in the Year 1453 (a). He was of a very ancient Nobility: his Posterity remains to this Day [B].

doubt, says he (1), the Privilege of the Eldest Son of this Family in the Cathedral Church of Auxerre. It was acquired them, about the end of the XIVth Century (2), by Claudius Sire de Chastelux, — for having defended at his own expence the Town of Crevant, belonging to the Chapter, against the Scots, whom he drove off and defeated, having, with his own Hand, taken Prisoner the Sieur Count de Doukan, Constable of Scotland, who commanded them. As he liberally restored the Possessions of the Church of Auxerre, the Chapter, by a juridical Act, granted him — for himself, and Posterity Male, possessing the Estate of Chastelux, the Privilege in question. That is, to have the Precedency in the Choir, and to sit in it in a warlike Habit, a Surplice over it, a Belt, and an Amice on his Arm, a Hawk on his Fist, a seat and deliberative Voice in the Chapter, and a Right of distribution as a Canon.

[B] He was of a very ancient Nobility: his Posterity remains to this Day. Father Anselme goes back no farther than the Father of our Claudius de Chastelux (3); but Mr de Vize assures him, that this Family is one of the most ancient of the Kingdom, that it has no other Name, or Origin, than That of Chastelux, and that from the end of the Xth Century, where we begin to know the Successors in a direct Line, to the present time, Mr le Comte de Chastelux, who died in the Month of September, 1701, is the 20th in a direct Line from Father to Son, and that his Ancestors have possessed all the military Employments of the State. You will find them among the Maréchals of France, among the Admirals, Governors of Provinces, Lieutenants-General, Gentlemen in ordinary of the King's Bed-Chamber, Chamberlains of the Dukes of Burgundy, Pages of Honour to the Kings, Captains of the hundred Men at Arms of the Ordonnances, at the time when those Companies were so considerable (4). Let us add, what the same Author relates concerning the present State of this Family. He says (5), that that PHILIBERT PAUL, Count de CHASTELUX, who was killed at the Attack of Chiari, in Italy, the first of September, 1701, at the Age of thirty three, 'had three Brothers, and three Sisters: his younger Brother served in Germany, where he died. ANDREW DE CHASTELUX, who is at present the eldest, is Ensign of one of the King's Ships. The Third is WILLIAM ANTONY, an Abbé. The eldest Sister is BONA DE CHASTELUX, married to Francis, Count de St Chamans, Marquis de Mercy. The second is JUDITH DE CHASTELUX, Lady and Canoness of Poussangy in Champagne. The third is ANNE DE CHASTELUX, married to Charles de Vienne, Count de Commerin in Burgundy, Head of the Illustrious Family of Vienne (6). CHATEAU-BRIAND (The Countess of) Wife of the Count of that Name, Daughter of Phœbus de Foix, and Sister of Lautrec, and of the Marshal de Foix, was Mistress of Francis I, as some Authors say [A]. Varillas has reported the History of this amorous Intrigue the most at large, and has not forgotten to say, that the Count caused his Wife to be put to Death. Others pretend, that This History is a meer Romance, and have published a Piece about it against Varillas. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (a).

[A] She was Mistress of Francis I, as some Authors say.] Brantome relates very particular Circumstances of these Amours. 'I have been told, says he (1), and have it from good hands, that, when King Francis I had left his much favoured Mistress Madam de Chateau Briand, to take Madam d'Esampes — as one Nail drives out another, Madam d'Esampes desired the King to take all the finest Jewels from the same Lady de Chateau-Briand, that he had given her, not by Reason of their great value, for at that time Jewels were not so much in vogue, as they have been since, but because of the fine Devices, which were engraved upon them, which his Sister, the Queen of Navarre, had made and composed; for she was a very good Lady.' Brantome adds, that, when the Gentleman, who was sent by the King, asked for those Jewels of Madam de Chateau-Briand, she pretended to be sick for that time, and put him off for three Days; that, in the mean time, she caused those Jewels to be melted, out of spite, and gave them to the Gentleman in Ingots, when he came for them again, and that she sent the King word, that she could not suffer any body else to enjoy those Devices; that the King sent her those Ingots back again, (for he wanted those Jewels only for the Devices) and said, that she had showed more Courage and Generosity in it, than he could have expected from a Woman. Brantome adds his Reflexion to That of the King: The Heart of a generous Woman, says he, provoked and slighted, can do great things. He tells us, in another place of his Memoirs (2), that Mr de Chateau-Briand gave his fine House of Chateau-Briand to the Constable de Montmorency to get the Order. See here what Mr le Laboureur (3) observed upon this: It was to have the Government of Bretagne, and also to secure him- self from the Proceedings, which were carried on against him for the Death of his Wife, of which he was accused.

The Author of the Gallantries of the Kings of France, lately printed (4) in several Places, relates the Amours of Francis I with the Countess de Chateau-Briand in the same manner as Varillas; and concludes thus (5): 'Some Critics have pretended, that Monfieur de Varillas, from whom I have taken these Memoirs, had been mis-informed; that the Countess de Chateau-Briand was reconciled to her Husband, and that she did not die till ten Years after the King's Return; but he has so well replied to it, that I believe the Countess's tragical End ought not to be questioned; and I made no Difficulty to follow That famous Historian word for word.' Take this for an Imposition. I desired one of my Friends to inform himself of this Answer of Varillas; and here is, word for word, what he wrote to me, in a Letter, dated from Paris, the tenth of June 1695. 'Whatever the Author of the Gallantries of the Kings of France may say, we have not seen any Writing here of Mr Varillas, in answer to what the late Mr Heven, Advocate in the Parliament of Rennes, wrote against him, concerning the Countess de Chateau-Briand: and Mr d'Hozier told me, upon this, that Mr de Caumartin, one of our six Intendants of the Finances, has, in his Library, the Cafe, which the Constable Anno de Montmorency caused to be drawn up against the Heirs of Mr de Chateau-Briand, to maintain the Grant he had made him of That Seat, and that That Piece begins with these words: The Misfortunes, which have accompanied the Life of Mr de Chateau-Briand, are so well known in France, that it is needless to mention them.'

CHATEL (PETER du) Great Almoner of France under Henry II. Look for CASTELLAN.

CHATEL (TANNEGUI du) a Gentleman of Bretagne, was one of the brave Men of the XVth Century. He commanded, in Italy, the Troops of Lewis of Anjou, King of Sicily, and defeated the Army of Ladislaus, King of Naples, in the Year 1409. He was afterwards Provost of Paris; and, in 1419, and 1420, he took upon him the Quality of Marshal of the Wars of the Dauphin, Regent of the Kingdom (a). He did That Prince great Services (b) [A], and rid him of his most dangerous Enemy, who was John Duke of Burgundy [B]. But there was a signal Perfidiousness

(a) Anselme's History of Great Officers, p. 142.

(b) It was King Charles VII.

[A] He did the Dauphin great Services.] The Burgundian Faction having possessed themselves of Paris, the Night of the Twenty eighth of May, 1418, would have seized on the Dauphin, if Tanne-gui du Chatel (1) had not run, and taken him out of his Bed, and, wrapping him in his Night-gown, carried him into the Bastille, and from thence brought him to Melun (2). We shall see, in the following Remark, with what Zeal he acted against That Prince's Enemy on the Bridge of Montreuil-faut-Yonne.

business in that Action. 'Tis to be wondered at, that Father Anselme has said nothing of it (c): his Silence occasioned That of Moreri. The Murder of the Duke of Burgundy was not the only one, that Tanneui du Chatel committed: he also killed the Dauphin of Auvergne [C] in the Year 1424, in the King's Presence, and in full Council. That Action occasioned many Persons of the greatest Quality to leave the Service of Charles VII; and Du Chatel was obliged to retire from the Court, whither, according to some Authors, he never returned any more. Others pretend, that of the Blood, and an effect of the immoderate Ambition of the Branch of Burgundy, which from that time expressed as little Tenderness for the Blood, from whence it sprung, as for the Ottoman Family. It has been always confederated with the greatest Enemies of the French Name, till it ended in the Person of Mary, who transmitted all That Hatred to her Descendants. John Duke of Burgundy was not contented to cause the Duke of Orleans, Brother of Charles VI, to be murdered (3); he added also several other wicked Attempts to That; but, at last, he himself perished in the Year 1419. The Servants of the Duke of Orleans, and particularly our Tanneui du Chatel, and the President Louvet, negotiated Interviews between the Duke of Burgundy and the Dauphin, with a design to murder the first; and they executed it on the Bridge of Montereau-faut-Yonne, where those two Princes had agreed to have a Conference. As Duke John comes to the Interview (I make use of Palquier's Words (4), Tanneui du Chatel begins to pick a Quarrel with him, saying, that he did not honour the Dauphin as he ought, and gave him such a Blow with his Battle-axe on his Head, that he died of it.

[C] He killed also the Dauphin of Auvergne. I shall again make use of Palquier's Words (5); 'The two chief Ministers of Charles the VIIth's Actions, and perhaps of his Ruin, were Tanneui du Chatel, and Louvet, President of Provence; for they were the cause of Duke John's Death. They enjoyed the King's Favour more than the rest of his People for a long time, particularly Tanneui du Chatel, with great Arrogance, who, abusing his Master's Indulgence, killed the Count Dauphin of Auvergne, in the Year 1424, in his Presence, and in the Presence of his Council; at which the Princes and Lords being angry, the Queen of Sicily, the King's Mother-in-law, the Constable of Richmont, and other Lords of note, forsook him. Which was the reason, why Tanneui was obliged to leave his place, Louvet remaining alone in his stead. But Louvet, seeing himself exposed to the same Hatred, and not being able to resist the great Lords, retired to A vignon; and afterwards neither of them was seen any more.' Mezerai says, that Charles VII promised to dismiss all those from his Presence, who had a hand in the Murder of the Duke of Burgundy; I say, he promised it, when, in 1424, he gave the Sword of Constable to the Earl of Richmont, who had quitted the King of England's Party; and that, thereupon, Tanneui, generously sacrificing his Fortune to serve his King, desired his Dismissal as a Reward (6). Varillas pretends, that Charles VII was forced, by the Treaty of Arras, to forsake du Chatel, who fled into his Country, and did not return to the Court, till he heard, that no body took care to see That Prince buried (7). According to this Account, he did not leave the Court till 1435. What I am going to say, seems to be the most probable Account: I take it from an Historian (8), who, having confined himself to the Enquiries relating to Bretagne, is more to be credited in what he says of Tanneui du Chatel, an illustrious Breton, than those, who only speak of him in general Histories. I except what is apologetic; for the particular Historians of a Province are less to be relied upon in such a case than others: and therefore I pay but little regard to what Bertrand d'Argentré (9) tells us concerning Tanneui du Chatel's Innocency with respect to the Murder of the Duke of Burgundy. Let us see what he says about other matters of Fact.

He says, that the Earl of Richmont, having received the Constable's Sword, the seventh of March 1425, was sent to raise Soldiers in Bretagne. At the same time, du Chatel was sent thither as Ambassador of Charles VII, to ask Leave of the Duke of Bretagne to raise Men in his Dominions. This was the Condition of the Kings of France at that time: They were surrounded with many petty Sovereigns, who played them a thousand Tricks. So that it is a great Mistake, to say, that the English have formerly almost conquered France. It should be said, that, with the Assistance of the greatest and most considerable Provinces of France, they were near conquering all the rest. But this is not the matter in hand. Du Chatel brought no other Answer, but that Assistance should be given, after the King had put all those Persons from him, whom he was desirous to remove. He was himself one of them, and resolved to retire, though the King was desirous to keep him. 'Sir, said he, I am a Gentleman, and have done you Service; but you must not lose the Service of great Persons, who may serve you so much against your Enemies, for such mean Persons as we are; tho' the Opinion they entertain of us is very groundless: however it be, you must not suffer for it. And since it is so, Sir, be pleased to provide for the old Age, which I have attained to in your Service, and give me some means to live the rest of my days: I desire, by no means, that you should lose, upon my Account, your Relations and Servants, whom you stand in need of, at this time. The King was obliged to consent to this, much against his Will, and said to him, My good Father and Friend, I shall always look upon you as my Father. I know that I am indebted to you, and shall remember, as long as I live, the Services you have done to me and to my Kingdom. It is much against my Will and Heart, that you must leave me: but, since things are brought to this pass, that I must receive Laws from others, I desire you to bear this Misfortune patiently till this Storm be over, and I may see, whether those, who will leave me on your Account, will do something to make amends for what they take from me. I have thought on this matter: go in the mean time to Beaucaire; I make you Senéchal of that Place: You shall keep the Office of Provost of Paris, of which you shall not be wronged: You shall have such Pensions assigned you, that you need not fear Poverty: You shall have fifteen Archers for the Security of your Person; and I will give Orders for their Payment. If any thing should happen to you, let me know it, and I will look to it; and will also lay hold of the first Opportunity, that shall offer itself, to see you again. With this Messire Tanneui retired to Beaucaire; but he came several times into France afterwards (10).

I think it may be inferred from this Passage, that all those, who do not place the Retreat of Tanneui du Chatel in the Year 1425, or who say, that he never returned, or that he was sent Ambassador to the Pope, or that he was made Great Master of the Horse, or Maréchal of France, or that he had the Generosity to bury Charles VII, are mistaken: They do not distinguish the Uncle from the Nephew: both of them had the Name of Tanneui du Chatel. But, if it were true, that the Uncle had been an Ambassador beyond the Alps in the Year 1446, and in the Year 1448, as Father Anselme is going to tell us, the Negligence of Argentré could not be excused; for he says nothing of it here; and, when he speaks (11) of the Embassy of Rome, he does not tell us, whether Tanneui du Chatel, who was one of the Ambassadors, was the same, who retired from the Court in the Year 1425.

We read, in the History of Marseilles (12), that, in the Year 1531, this Man was one of those, who negotiated a Truce between Those of Marseilles and the Catalans. He was at that time Captain General of the Militia of Provence.

[D] He

that he returned thither [D], and that he suffered another Disgrace, which did not hinder him from taking care of the Funeral of Charles VII [E], neglected by the Courtiers. He had a Nephew, whose Name was Tanneui du Chatel [F], who made a great Figure at the Court of France in the Reign of Lewis XI. Some, by an egregious Mistake, have confounded him with him, who killed the Duke of Burgundy [G]. An Italian Author has committed some great Mistakes here [H], as will appear in the last Remark.

[D] He was obliged to retire from Court, whither, according to some Authors, he never returned. Others pretend, that he returned thither. Father Anselme, having said, that Tanneui retired from the Court for the good of the Affairs of King Charles VII, in the Year 1425 (13), goes on thus: 'Afterwards he was made Senéchal of Provence, and dispatched to Genoa, in 1446, to endeavour the Reduction of That City to the Obedience of the King, whom they would have to be their Lord; and, in the Year 1448, he was sent, in Embassy, to Rome, with the Archbishop of Rheims, the Bishop of Aleth, and others, to Pope Nicolas V, to pay him a filial Obedience, according to Berri Herault (14). He died soon after, without leaving Children by his Wife Isabella le Vayer. Moreri has not transcribed all this, because he believed, that Tanneui du Chatel took care of the Obsequies of Charles VII. If Father Anselme had also believed it, he would not have said, that Tanneui du Chatel died, soon after his Embassy of the Year 1448: which cannot agree with what is observed by so many other Historians, that he was at the Expence of the King's Funeral, who died in the Year 1461. They are mistaken.

[E] It is pretended - - - that he took care of the Funeral of Charles VII. Some Authors say, that Tanneui was in Disgrace, when Charles VII died; others say, that he was actually Great Master of the Horse. 'Funus suis sumptibus curavit Taneguius Castellus, summus Regionum Eorum Magister, (nam ceteri Caroli Domestici metu Ludovici filii se diversi subdlexerant) (15). - - - Tanneui du Chatel, the King's Great Master of the Horse, buried him at his own Expence; the rest of Charles's Domestics being fled different ways, for fear of his Son Lewis. In the first case, his Action would be more commendable; nevertheless, it deserves to be praised in the second case. His persisting in his Duty, when every one else neglected it, and laying out his Money for his King's Funeral, will always be esteemed a good Action. It is said, that Lewis XI let many Years pass, before he re-imbursed the Sums, which Tanneui advanced (16). The latter would have been very old, at the Death of the King his Master, if he had been General of an Army in Italy in the Year 1409. If we believe Thuanus, those Sums amounted to thirty thousand Crowns (17). He does not agree with Beaucaire, as to Tanneui's Office. He makes him Great Chamberlain, and is one of those, who say he was out of favour. 'Castellus is perillatris in Armorica prognatus gente biculariorum nobilium Princeps sub Carolo VII fuerat: & quamvis optime de rege ac regno meritis cum domum relegatus esset, mortuo hero statim in aulam accurrit, & in funus regium ab omnibus neglectum de sua pecunia 30 millia aureorum egregio grati animi exemplo dependit (18). - - - This Chatel, born of a very illustrious Family in Bretagne, was Great Chamberlain under Charles VII: and, though banished to his own Country, notwithstanding his great Merits towards his King and Country, yet, upon the Death of his Master, he immediately repaired to Court, and gave a remarkable Instance of Gratitude, in expending Thirty thousand Crowns on the King's Funeral, neglected by all. We shall consult d'Argentré, in the Sequel of these Remarks, for the better understanding of all these Circumstances. See the end of the Remark [G].

[F] He had a Nephew, whose Name was Tanneui du Chatel. This Nephew had been educated with his Uncle at the Court of France, and was a Man of Parts. He attached himself to the Service of the Duke of Bretagne, and became High-Steward of his Household. He gave him very good Advice in the Year 1464, in a very nice Conjunction; for it concerned the avoiding of the Snares, laid by King Lewis XI (19). For the rest, he was a Man of Probity, who in no wise flattered his Master in his Amours. The Duke of Bretagne, being about thirty Years of Age, neglected his Wife, Daughter of the King of Scotland, and carried a Mistress every where with him, with whom he was passionately in Love. Her Name was Antoinette de Maillezé; and she was the Wife of the Lord Villequier. Tanneui often and freely represented to That Duke the Punishments, which the divine Justice inflicts on unchaste and adulterous Princes; but he only made himself odious by it. Perceiving his Master's Anger, and being unwilling to be any longer exposed to it, he retired to his House. The Lady Villequier sent him word, that she would reconcile him with the Duke, if he would leave off making Remonstrances to him. He rejected these Proposals: and, though the Lady was more inclined to make use of her Credit, in order to advance Men of Merit, than to revenge herself, yet he dreaded her (20). Lewis XI, being informed of the Disposition du Chatel was in, offered him some noble Employments. These Offers were accepted; and thus our Tanneui came into the Service of the Court of France (21). He had the Government of Roussillon and Cerdagne given him. We shall see, presently, that a Civilian, who did not want Learning, took the Country of Cerdagne for the Island of Sardinia. Tanneui du Chatel was employed, in 1475, about the nine Years Truce (22). He was killed at the Siege of Bouchain in the Year 1478 (23). If we believe Peter Matthieu (24), he, who buried Charles VII, was the same Tanneui, who so christianly exhorted the Duke of Bretagne to Chastity. He was the Nephew of Tanneui, who killed the Duke of Burgundy. Being vexed, because he was not reimbursed the Charges he had been at for the King's Funeral, he went over to the Duke of Bretagne. This deserves to be examined.

[G] Some - - - have confounded him with him, who killed the Duke of Burgundy. I found this Error in Forcatulus, with some Facts, that concern Tanneui du Chatel, the Nephew, and which deserve to be related here. Forcatulus says (25), that Tanneui was one of the Thirty six Knights of the Order of St Michael, who were first instituted by Lewis XI (26). He deserved it very well, continues Forcatulus; since, in the Reign of Charles VI, he had exercised the Government of Paris with so much good Fortune and Prudence. Here lies the Mistake. Tanneui du Chatel, Knight of the Order of St Michael, and Governor of Roussillon in the Year 1469, negotiated a Truce in the Year 1475. He is not therefore the same with him, who was Provost of Paris under Charles VI; for the latter commanded an Army in Italy in the Year 1409, which shews that he was then at least thirty Years of Age. So that he must have been born about the Year 1380. Had he been a Plenipotentiary at the Age of Ninety five Years, would not some Historians have taken notice of a Wit of so long standing, a much rarer thing than a Man of an hundred Years of Age? We have seen above (27), that, in 1425, Tanneui, the Provost of Paris, looked upon himself as an old Man; he was therefore above thirty Years of Age, and at least forty or forty five, when he commanded in Italy. Forcatulus observes, that Tanneui was one of Cardinal Baluzé's Judges, and that the King gave him That Cardinal's Goods, and fine Hangings. He makes an advantageous Description of the good Order, which Tanneui established in the Province of Roussillon (28). He does not forget his Journey to the Monastery of Roncevaux, nor his fine Exhortations to the Monks, nor the Question he put to them, after he had seen their Library, Whether they had not any piece of Orpheus's Lyre, or Head. If any one should ask, why This Civilian speaks at large of

THE Uncertainty we are left in by the Historians.

Tanneui du Chatel's Journey? I would answer, He did it, because his Great-Grand-father had a great share in the favour of This Governor of Rouffillon; but not so much as a Gentleman, whose Name was Polerme, descended from the Family of Grammont, who was Tanneui's Lieutenant in Cerdagne. To which purpose, Forcatulus gives us some Verses of Claudian and Martial, relating to the bad Air of Sardinia, and tells us, that Polerme, being well informed of the Disorders of That Island, accepted the Government of it much against his Will (29). This is what I had promised at the end of the foregoing Remark.

The Variations, we have just now read, may make my Readers sensible of the Negligence of Historians in relating the Circumstances of Things. Their Disagreement makes us uncertain of the Time when Tanneui du Chatel retired from the Court of Charles VII; whether he returned thither before That Prince's Death; whether he was Great Master of the Horse, or Great Chamberlain; what Sum he laid out for his Master's Funeral; whether he, who killed the Duke of Burgundy, is the same, who caused Charles VII to be buried; and whether he, who censured the Amours of the Duke of Bretagne, retired from the Court of France, because they did not pay him the Money he had laid out for That King's Funeral. We find abundance of such Variations about the Lives of all Great Men; which is a surprising thing, since it would be very easy to characterize the Facts, mentioned in a History, that an indifferent Reader might avoid confounding the one with the other.

(30) Histoire de Bretagne, liv. 12, chap. 3. pag. 592.

Here is another Passage of Argentré (30), which will give us a little more light into this matter. 'The officers, seeing the End of the said King Charles draw near, and knowing, that they should fall into a very suspicious Prince's Hands, they all left King Charles, one after another, before he was dead; so that there was scarce any, who remained to attend him, besides one faithful, loyal, and steadfast Servant, who was Messire Tanneui du Chatel, Great Master of the Horse, who would not forsake him, whatever Danger he might be exposed to by it, but staid with him till he died; and there was not a Man in France, who would defray the Charges of, or stir a Foot for, the King's Burial. Du Chatel undertook to do it, making all the Preparations, usual upon such an Occasion, and was at the Charge of the Funeral, things being in such a Condition, that there was no hopes of recovering any thing of it. He laid out above Fifty thousand Livres of his own, for which he was not re-imburshed 'till ten Years after, when, by good luck, they assigned for his Payment the Castles and Lordships of Cbantillon on Andely, Pacy, Oisy, and Nonancourt in Normandy, which have been since redeemed of his Heirs, because they made Part of the King's Demesnes. And, finding no place in the succeeding King's House, after his Master's Death, he retired into Bretagne, where he was very kindly received by the Duke, who made him his Great Steward, and Captain of Nantes, and married him to the second Daughter of the Family of Maletroit, the Maréchal de Rieux having married the eldest; but this Favour did not continue long, though he had very well deserved it, as we shall say hereafter.' These last Words relate to the History of Tanneui's Disgrace. The Author speaks of it in the 603d and 608th Page, and seems to contradict himself. He says, pag. 603, that Tanneui, during the Duke of Bretagne's Journey, which he made into Normandy against his Advice, obtained leave to go and see his Wife; and that the same Duke, having found, that the Distrusts, which Tanneui had endeavoured to inspire him with, were but too well grounded, thought he had a hand in the Plot; so that he would never see him. But, pag. 608, he informs us, that Tanneui could not endure the Life, that the Duke led with the Lady Villequier; which was the Reason, why she began to hate him mortally, and that he went in great haste into France to secure his Person. He was very welcome to Lewis XI, who advanced him to great Honours, and particularly to the Government of Rouffillon (31). Note, that the Lady Villequier was debauched by the Duke after his Journey into Normandy in the Year 1465 (32). Tanneui must therefore have appeared at Court after that Journey; for, if he had been quite out of Favour, what could he have done with the Duke against the Lady Villequier?

(31) Ibid. pag. 612.

(32) Ibid. pag. 608.

However it be, we may be sure, thanks to Bertrand d'Argentré for it, I. That Tanneui du Chatel, who buried Charles VII, is not the same, who killed the Duke of Burgundy. II. That he is the same, who retired from Bretagne into France, in the Reign of Lewis XI, and who was Governor of Rouffillon. III. That he did not return from his House, to take care of the Funeral, but that he was actually in Possession of the Office of Great Master of the Horse, and that he enjoyed the Affection of Charles VII, when That Prince died.

There are but few Articles in this Dictionary, which, for their Length, are made up of so many different Pieces as this; however, it will make my Readers easily know how the two TANNEUI's DU CHATEL must be distinguished.

[H] An Italian Author has committed some great Mistakes here.] See a Book, printed at Rome in the Year 1646, intitled, Ritratti & Elogii di Capitani illustri, and you will find there (33), that Tanneui du Chatel, Provost of Paris, and afterwards Lieutenant to the Dauphin, was magnificently adorned with military Rewards by Lewis XI, and by Charles VIII, and one of the first Knights of the Order of St Michael; and, that he died in the Year 1468. The first Fault is, that he confounds the Uncle with the Nephew; for, the Dauphin's Lieutenant, and the Provost of Paris, is not he, who was the Knight of St Michael. II. He, who was Knight of St Michael, did not die in the Year 1468; since, in 1475, he was employed to negotiate a Truce of nine Years (34), and he was at a Siege in 1478 (35). III. If he had died in the Year 1468, he could not have received any Office, nor any Reward from Charles VIII; for That Prince did not begin his Reign till 1483.

CH EDERLES is, among the Turks, what St George is among the Christians. The Dervises told Busbequius, when we went to Amasia in Cappadocia, that Chederles was a great Hero, who, having killed a furious Dragon, saved a Maid, who had been exposed to That hideous Beast. They added, that, after having wandered a long time in unknown Countries, he came at last to the Banks of a River, whose Water made those immortal, who drank of it; that this River is always covered with a dark Night, and that, since Chederles, it was never seen by any Body. This Hero, who is immortal, and mounted on a fine Horse, to which the Waters of that River procured the same Advantage, runs up and down the World, loves Battles, assists the Warriours, who have the best Cause, or who invoke him, of what Religion soever they be. They say he was one of Alexander's Captains [A]; and yet they will not have him to differ from the St George of the Christians,

[A] He was — one of Alexander's Captains.] This is not granted, in the Supplement to d'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale; for it is affirmed there, that, according to the Traditions of the Eastern Nations, Khedher was the Companion or Counsellor, and General of the Army, of Dhoulcarnein, who is not Alexander the Macedonian, but a more ancient Monarch than he, who first bore the Name of Alexander Dhoulcarnein, Alexander the Great having had that Name only in Imitation of him, and by reason Christians, so great is their Ignorance of Chronology. They have a Marble Fountain in their Mosque, the Water whereof is very clear; and they say it owes it's beginning to the Urine of Cbederles's Horse. The Hippocrene, mentioned by the Poets, was not so foolish an Imagination. Very near that place, they shew the Tombs of his Groom, and of his Nephew (a), where, they say, Miracles are continually wrought in favour of those, who invoke them (b). They say also, that, if any one swallows an Infusion of the Scrapings of the Stones of the Earth, where Cbederles stooped, when he staid for the Dragon, it cures the Fever, Head-ach, and sore Eyes. The Turks cannot forbear laughing, when they see the Image of St George, their pretended Cbederles, in the Christian Churches; for the Greeks paint him with a little Child riding behind him, who fills him Wine (c). This is a piece of Parallel for any one, who has a mind to enlarge the Books, which have already been published, about the Conformities of Religions.

The Passage which I shall set down, of Postel Cosmopolite, twice returned from ibence, and truly informed (d), will serve as a Supplement to what I have just now said [B].

reason of his great Conquests (1). Many Musulmen confound Kbeder with the Prophet Elias; but the Author of the Tarikh Montekheb distinguishes them very well, and adds, that Khedher lived in the time of Caikobad, an ancient King of Persia; and that, having found the Fountain of Life, and drank of it's Water, he is not to die till the Sound of the Trumpet; that is, till the Day of the last Judgment (2).

[B] A Passage — of Postel will serve for a Supplement to what I have been saying. This Author relates, that there are numberless Saints in Turkey, who work Miracles, and have each of them a particular Office. 'One comforts afflicted Persons — another assists the Travellers, who invoke him. Another, near Suria, not very far from Adena, whose Name is Sedi Cadi, Sir, or Lord Judge; where they say all Wishes are accomplished, and where the Soldiers recommend themselves to him, being persuaded, that whoever has been to see him shall not die in War. Others discover things that are lost (3): and there is a great one in Natolia, near Cariafar, who is called Guzel Mirsin, or Gotel Mirsin, the good Bringer back, who finds all lost Cattel. Another, who calls himself Bassa Effie, the God of Love, or the Prince, to whom they apply for success in Marriage, for Children, and to be reconciled. There is yet another, who is the Captain-General of them all; for he discharges the Offices of all the others; and they say, that he relieves all who ask any thing of him: he has no dedicated Place, but walks on a Grey Mare, throughout the Country of Natolia only, and appears every where to all those, who invoke him: They call him Cbederelles, and think him to be St George; for they call St George, Cbederelles, and a great many Persons say, they belong to him, and know also at what time the Christians observe his Festival Day; and they come, before, or on that Day, to beg Alms for his Sake: for, when they ask any thing of these Saints, they promise them, according to their Ability, to eat a hot Loaf for their Sake, or a Capon, or a Sheep, or an Ox, with the Poor, and the Pilgrims; which they perform carefully. They eat with the Poor for the Love of their Saints (4).

CHELIDONIS, a Woman of an ill Life, whom I only mention, to have an opportunity of relating what I promised above (a), and which is to be found in Cicero. This Woman loved Verres, and had a very great power over him. All those, who were at Law, had Recourse to her, when he was Pretor; and, there being no other way to succeed, some Persons of Honour, and whose Causes were good, were forced to go and sollicite him, at the House of Cbelidonis. This Basenesis is eloquently described by Cicero [A]. He observes, that a young Man of

[A] This Basenesis is eloquently described by Cicero. The Father-in-law, the Uncle, and one of the Tutors of a Pupil, seeing him threatened with a great Law-Suit, applied themselves to Marcus Marcellus, another of the Youth's Tutors. Marcellus went to desire Verres to protect the Pupil's Innocency, but did not obtain any Promise. It was then, that, all other Means failing, they had recourse to Cbelidonis. 'Quum sibi omnes ad istum allegationes difficiles, omnes aditus arduos ac potius interclusos viderent, apud quem non jus, non æquitas, non misericordia, non propinqui oratio, non amici voluntas, non cuiusquam autoritas pro precio, non gratia valeret, statuunt, id sibi optimum esse factum, quod cuius venisset in mentem, petere auxilium à Cbelidone: quæ isto prætoris, non modo in iure civili, privatorumque omnium controversiis populo Romano præfuit, verum etiam in his fartis tectis dominata est. Venit ad Cbelidonem C. Mullius eques Romanus publicanus, homo cum primis honestus: venit M. Junius patruus pueri, frugalissimus homo, & castissimus: venit homo summo honore, pudore, & summo officio spectatissimus ordinis fuit P. Potitius tutor. O multis acerbam, ô miseram, atque indignam præturam tuam, ut mittam cætera, quo tandem pudore tales viros, quo dolore, meretricis domum venisse arbitramini? qui nulla conditione istam turpitudinem subsistent, nisi officii necessitudinisque ratio coëgisset (1). — Finding it difficult to lay before him any Proof, and that all Access to him was denied them, since neither Right, nor Equity, nor Pity, nor the Request of a Neighbour, or Desire of a Friend, could prevail on him, they determined to apply to Cbelidonis, as the properest means they could think of; who, during his Pretorship, decided all the Law-Suits of the People of Rome. Caius Mullius, a Roman Knight, and Farmer of the Revenues, a Man of distinguished Honour, comes to Cbelidonis, together with M. Junius, the young Man's Uncle, a most frugal and chaste Man, and P. Potitius his Tutor, a Man of the greatest Honour, and Modesty, and the most distinguished of his Rank. How ungrateful to many, how wretched, how unworthy a Pretorship was your's! to say no more, with what Confusion, think you, must such Men apply to an Harlot: Men, who would, upon no terms, have complied with such Meanness, had not Duty and Necessity obliged them to it? They found her surrounded with Persons, who were at Law, and, before they could be heard, they were obliged to wait till she had dispatched them. At last it came to their Turn; the Business was proposed to her; her good Offices were desired, and Money was offered her. She answered them, like a Courtisan, I will serve you with all my Heart, and will speak earnestly to him about it; but, the next Day, she declared, that she could not prevail with him, and that he expected a good Sum of Money. Veniunt, ut dico, ad Cbelidonem. Domus erat plena, nova jura, nova decreta, nova judicia petebantur. Mihi det possessionem, mihi ne adimat, in

* in me iudicium ne det, mihi bona addicat. Alii nummos numerabant, alii tabulas obsignabant. Domus erat non meretricio conventu, sed prætoris turba referta. Simul ac potestas primum data est, adeunt hi quos dixi, loquitur Mustius, rem demonstrat, petit auxilium, pecuniam pollicetur. Respondit illa, ut meretrix, non inhumane, libenter ait se esse facturam, & se cum isto diligenter fermocinaturam, reverti iubet, tum discedunt: postmodum revertuntur. Negat illa posse hominem exorari, permagnam cum dicere ex illa re pecuniam confici posse (2). The Chamber Counsellors had nothing to do; no one went any more to them; but all applied to Chelidonis: she regulated the judgments; the Pretor revoked his Sentences, and gave quite contrary ones, according as she suggested to him. Cicero describes this excellently well. Quæso redite in memoriam, iudices, quæ libido istius in iure dicendo fuerit: quæ varietas decretorum, quæ nundinatio, quam inanes domus eorum omnium, qui de iure civili consuli solent, quam plena atque referta Chelidonis:

(3) Id. ibid. cap. 46. See also Orat. v. in Verrem, cap. 13.

[B] A young Man of Quality could not name this Creature without great Reluctancy.] Cicero did not fail to cry out, What a Shame is it, that a Pretor should perform the Functions of his Office, as it pleased a Woman, whom Domitius thought he could not name without offending Modesty? 'L. Domitius — de Chelidone reticuit, quoad potuit, aliò responsonem suam derivavit. Tantus in adolescente clarissimo ac principe juvenutis pudor fuit, ut aliquandiu, quum à me premeretur, omnia potius responderet, quàm Chelidonem nominaret. Primo necessarios istius ad eum allegatos esse dicebat, deinde aliquando coactus Chelidonem nominavit. Non te pudet, Verres, ejus mulieris arbitratu gessisse præturam, quam L. Domitius ab se nominari vix sibi honestum esse arbitrabatur (4)?'

CHELONIS, Daughter of Leonidas King of Lacedemon, and Wife of Cleombrotus, also King of Lacedemon, found her self in a nice and difficult Juncture, from which she freed herself, not like an able Woman, but like the Heroine of a Romance. So formidable a Faction arose in Lacedemon against Leonidas, in favour of Cleombrotus, that the former was obliged to retire to a place of Refuge, and the latter was placed on the Throne. Chelonis was so far from sharing in her Husband's Fortune, that she retired into the same Temple, where her Father was, and where she appeared, like him, under the sad and melancholy Figure of those, who fled to those places of Refuge. They cannot be better compared, than to Penitents, clothed with Sackcloth, and covered with Ashes. Some time after, Leonidas was permitted to retire to Tegea. Chelonis went with him, as the inseparable Companion of his Misfortunes: Cleombrotus stood in need of a privileged place, in his turn; for Leonidas was recalled, and set on his Throne again. Then Chelonis left her Father, and went to her Husband. It was a Spectacle, very worthy of Admiration, to see her intercede with her Father for her Husband, being fully resolved to share in his Disgrace, though she had not been Partaker of his good Fortune, and not to partake of her Father's Prosperity, though she had shared in his Misfortunes. Leonidas came with armed Men to the place of Refuge, where his Son-in-law was, and very severely upbraided him with the Injuries he had received from him, with the Loss of the Throne, with his Exile, and the Consequences of it. Cleombrotus had nothing to answer. His Wife spoke for him, and did it with so much force, and so pathetically, even protesting that she would die before her Husband, if her Tears and Prayers could not prevail, that she saved his Life, and obtained for him the Liberty to retire where he pleased. Among other things, she represented to her Father, that he made his Son-in-law's Apology, and that by her Conduct she had made a Manifesto against her Husband [A]. After Leonidas had granted her Cleombrotus's Life and Liberty, he earnestly desired her to live with him, Leonidas; but she excused her self from it; and, giving her Husband one of her Children to hold, whilst she held the other, she went to say her Prayers near the Altar: after which, she set out with her Husband for the place of their Exile (a). The Passage, in which Montagne praises her, deserves to be consulted (b).

that he was excusable, and make the World believe, that a Kingdom is a Thing so great, and so worthy of our Desires, that one ought to spill the Blood of a Son-in-law, and not value the Life of one's own Children, in order to secure it to one's self?

CHESNE (JOSEPH du) in Latin Quercetanus, Sieur de la Violette, Counsellor and Physician of the King, was of Armagnac in Gascogne, and died at Paris in the Year 1609. Some give him the Title of Baron (a). He became famous for his Skill in Chemistry [A], and he published Books, which were well received, and often

(a) See Remark [B].

[A] He became famous for his Skill in Chemistry.] The Passage of Gaffarel, which may serve me as a Proof, contains a remarkable Particular, which hinders me from reducing it to the bare words, which relate to the Capacity of our du Chesne: The whole will be read with Pleasure. 'Mr. du Chesne, Sieur de la Violette, one of the best Chemists our Age has produced, relates, that he had seen a very skillful Polish Physician of Cracow, who kept in Phials the Ashes of almost all the Plants we have often reprinted [B]. I believe he was a Protestant, as is affirmed in the Index Librorum Prohibitorum (b). He married Margaret de Trie (c), whose Mother was Daughter of the learned William Budeus. He had by her one Daughter, of whom I shall speak in another place (d). Patin has greatly abused him [C], and no wonder, if we consider the Hatred he bore to Chemists, and Antimony. The Sieur de la Violette did not prescribe Antimony; but he became in some manner it's Patron (e). This, and some other branches of his Practice, raised Enemies against him. He was obliged to answer some Books of Riolan, where he was abused. He might comfort himself under these light Persecutions; for he found himself honoured with the Favour of the Great. Mr de Setteri, who had been Chancellor of France, was one of his Patrons. He carried him with him into Switzerland, when he was sent thither as Ambassador, to renew the Alliance of 1601; and, it being much talked of at that time, that there was a young Woman, who had lived a long time without eating, he sent him to Berne to examine into the Matter. He reported, that the Story was true (f). I shall observe a small mistake, which has crept into the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library [D].

(f) Taken from the Dieteticon, of Du Chesne, fol. 31.

‘ have any Knowledge of; so that, when any one out of Curiosity would see, for example, a Rose in these Phials, he took that, in which the Ashes of a Rose-Bush were kept, and putting it over a lighted Chandle, after it had a little felt the Heat, you might see the Ashes begin to move; afterwards, mounting up, and being dispersed about the Phial, you might observe a small dark Cloud, which, dividing itself into several Parts, came at last to represent a Rose, so beautiful, so fresh, and so perfect, that you would have thought it palpable, and odoriferous, as That which comes from a Rose-Bush. This learned Man says, that he had often endeavoured to do the same, and not effecting it by Industry, Chance at length presented him with this Prodigy; for, as he was amusing himself with Mr de Laynes de Formetiers, Counsellor of Parliament, with the Sight of some curious Experiments, having extracted the Salt from some burnt Nettles, and set out the Lie after Sun-set, in Winter, in the Morning he found it frozen, but with this surprizing Circumstance, that the several kinds of Nettles, their Shape and Figure, were so perfectly represented on the Ice, that the live ones were not more so. Being thereupon in a sort of Rapture, he called the Counsellor, to be witness of this Secret, the Excellence of which made him conclude in these Terms:

*This Secret shews us, tho' the Body dies,
The Form entire within it's Ashes lies.*

At present this Secret is not so uncommon; for Mr de Claves, an excellent Chemist of our Time, shews the Experiment every Day (1).

[B] He published some Books, which were well received, and often re-printed. We need only see the Number of Editions, mentioned in Lindenius renovatus (2). I refer my Readers thither, both for this, and for the Titles of his Books. I will only say, I. That, as far as I can discover, The first Book he published is Apologia pro Chymicis. Thus du Verdier entitles it (3): he mentions particularly the Edition of 1575, at Lyons, in 8vo. It is doubtless the same Book with the ad Jacobi Auberti, Vindonis, de ortu & causis Metallorum contra Chymicos Explicationem, brevis Responso. Et de Exquisita Mineralium, Animalium, & Vegetabilium Medicamentorum spagyrica preparatione & usu perspicua Tractatio: at Lyons, 1575, in 8vo. Du Verdier ascribes to him A Treatise of St Augustin of the Christian Life, with the Treatises of Charity, and of the Vanity of this Age, and inferior World of Obedience and Humility. And the Ladder of Paradise, at Paris 1542. But I cannot conceive this Work to be his, if the Year 1542 be rightly marked. I am of Opinion, that his Cut, prefixed to his Dieteticon, printed in 1606, was made this Year. Now it informs us, that he was sixty Years of Age. In this case, he would be born after the Impression of This Treatise of St Augustin. II. I will say, in the second Place, that, in the Bibliothèque of du Verdier, it is only Sieur de la Violette, Counsellor and Physician in Ordinary to Monsieur the King's only Brother; but that, in That of la Croix du Maine, he is simply Baron and Lord of Morencé and Lyserable. It is certain, that these two Writers speak of the same Person: for they ascribe to their Joseph du Chesne, A Treatise of the general and particular Cure of Gun-shot Wounds, printed at Lyons in 1576. It was printed there in Latin and French the same Year. Mr Bailliet mentions a Baron de Morencé, called Joseph du Chesne (4). He speaks of him only as a Poet, and he is certain, that this Physician wrote Verses. Du Verdier ascribes to him The Microscop, or of the Folly, Vanity, and Inconstancy, of the World, in a hundred Odonaries, with two Doric Odes on Celestial Love, and the Sovereign Good, at Lyons, in 4to. I believe this Edition is not the first: for the Author, citing this Work in his Dieteticon (5), printed in 1606, observes, that it was Twenty six Years since he published it.

[C] Patin has greatly abused him.] ‘ This same Year, 1609, died here a rascally Quack, who killed many People, during his Life, and after his Death by the wretched Writings he has left us under his Name, which he got composed here and there by chymical Physicians; I mean Josephus Quercetanus, known at Paris by the Name of the Sieur de la Violette. He was a great Drunkard, and a meer Ignoramus, who knew nothing of Latin, and who, having been originally but a Chirurgeon's Man of the Country of Armagnac, a mean and wretched Country, passed at Paris, and particularly at Court, for a great Physician, because he had learnt something of Chymistry in Germany. The best Chemist, that is to say the least bad, never did any good in the World; and ‘ This Man has done a great deal of Harm (6). There is much spleen in these Words of Patin.

[D] I shall observe a small Mistake — in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library.] Mention is made in it (7) of John du Chesne, to whom it ascribes the Treatise of the Cure of Gun-shot Wounds, printed at Lyons, 1576, in 8vo, and the Great Mirrour of the World, printed in the same Town, in 1587, in 4to. These two Works certainly belong to our Joseph du Chesne. Mr Mercklinus says nothing of the latter (8); but the Author himself cites it, at Fol. 398. of his Dieteticon Polybistoricon. I observe farther, that the Bodleian Catalogue, in giving a long List of the Latin Works of Josephus Quercetanus (9), takes no notice, that he had already been mentioned under the Word CHESNE.

CHIGI (a), a noble Family of Siena, which had made a Figure a long time in that Country, when it began to raise itself at the Court of Rome in the Pontificate of Julius II (b). Indeed, it was not promoted to the Prelacy, but had considerable Employments in the Apostolic Chamber. Julius II. gave the Intendance of the Finances to AUGUSTIN CHIGI, and was very well pleased with his choice. No one is ignorant of that Pope's martial and restless Temper, nor of the Expences, which such a Humour necessarily occasions. Augustin Chigi was forced to display his utmost skill, to find out sufficient Funds for so many Expences, and shewed as much Activity, Contrivance, and Fidelity, as were necessary for such a Design [A]: so that Julius II., being very well pleased with his Financier, honoured

[A] AUGUSTIN CHIGI, Intendant of the Finances of JULIUS II. — had — the requisite Fidelity.] I have exactly followed my Original, which says, That there was never any Occasion to suspect the Integrity of This Financier. Non hebbe mai Giulio che ombra di delli integrità di che l'asservitava (1). I am not ignorant, that very strange Things have been published concerning Augustin Chigi's Luxury. One Day, he treated the Pope, and all the Sacred College, with so much Magnificence, that one would have thought he had a Design to exceed the extravagance of Vitellius. The Plenty, Exquisite, and choice of the Dishes, would have been sufficient to cause That Feast to be admired; but That was not the Thing by which he desired to distinguish himself: All that was taken from the Table, at every Course, was thrown into the Tiber, though every thing was served in Silver Plate; and, in the last Place, a great number of Parrot's Tongues were served up, dressed several ways. A Financier, who acts thus, may well be suspected of having enriched himself unlawfully. I wish that the Author, who informs me of this, had had the goodness and equity to have told us in what Author he had read it. It is not my Fault, if he shall be believed on his Word. However, here is what he says: 'Privatum hominem ad prodigiosi luxu enormem licitationem non macelli unius, sed peregrini quoque orbis conturbatricem aspirasse quis non merito maximo demiretur? Is fuit Augustinus quidam Chigiensis, Romanus Trapezites, qui Leoni X. Pontifici Maximo totique purpurei Senatus cœtui, exterorumque Regum Legatis, ob filium ab illo baptismi lavacro tinctum, splendidissima, ut ita dicam, repotia constituit, in quibus non satis fuit edulorum omnis generis missuumque exquisitissimorum apparatus modum omnem ademisit, nisi etiam lances, pinaces, cæteraque cum escaria vasa, tum potus instrumenta ex argento affabre facta omnia, in Tiberis præterlabentis alveum inani luxu ostento præcipitarentur, idque non una modo, sed pluribus quoque vicibus, quotiescunque scenicum illud scelerum et mensarum choragium mutandum foret. Atque ista parvo constituisse æstimandum erat, nisi & alieno ex orbe petitarum immani pretio avium (quas Pſittacos nominamus) solæ linguæ variis in patinis conditæ, ultimo sculo omnem luxu ostentationem longè superassent (2). — Who does not, with the greatest reason, wonder, that a private Man should aspire to such a prodigious Luxury, as ransacked, not a single Market, but the foreign World? Such was one Augustin Chigi, Financier of Rome, who entertained, in the most splendid manner, Pope Leo X, the whole College of Cardinals, and the Embassadors of foreign Kings, at the Christening of a Son; in which, not satisfied with exceeding all bounds in preparing the most exquisite Delicacies, he even ordered all the Dishes, and Plates, which were curiously wrought of Silver, to be thrown into the Tiber, through an empty ostentation of Luxury; and That not once, but many times, as often as the Courses were changed. And, as if the Expence would have been otherwise too small, Parrot's Tongues, fetched from abroad, at an immense Price, were served up, as the last Course.' This Author makes use of the Word Trapezites, a Banker, in describing the Qualities of our Chigi. It is as good as Mezerai's Expression (3).

They, who understand Latin, may read here a Story, which I met with in Paul Jovius, and which confirms what we have just now seen concerning the Luxury of our Chigi. They will see likewise, that he had a Mistress, to whom he made a Present of the Head of a Fish, which Cardinal San Severino, his Debtor, had sent him. A famous Parasite of those Times followed This Head to That Whore's House, and satisfied his Gluttony, after having tired himself by running after That good Bit. This narrative is very graceful in the Original. I shall set it down at length (4). Eam (Umbram) hodie Romani Umbrinam vocant. Capita Umbrarum, sicuti & Silurorum, Triumviris rei Romanæ conservatoribus dono dantur, qui piscatores inveterata quadam consuetudine eorum caput tributum nomine vestigales fecerunt. — Extat adhuc in ore quorundam factorum ridenda fabula de T. Tamisio, qui Romanis aulicisque salibus erat insignis, sed gulæ adeo proficitæ, ut infamis haberetur. Is quum per servum, qui in foro piscario in eam curam intentus esse solebat, ingentis Umbræ caput Triumviris delatum esse cognovisset, in Capitolium protinus ascendit, ut simulato apud magistratum negotio, sermoneque de industria protracto, prandium capteret. Verum illud Triumviri jam Riario Cardinali donandum decreverant: ita Tamisius, quum lime curiæ offerri ingenti coronataque patina caput illud nobile conspexisset, primo deceptus consilio, illud subsecutus est præmissis servo, qui vestigiis deferentium ministrorum insisteret. Nec multo post quum Riarianis ædibus inferretur, bene habet, salva res est, inquit Tamisius, opipare excipiemur: erat enim in primis mensæ Riarianæ, quæ longè omnium semper lautissima fuit, familiaris. At Riarius, ut erat natura munificus, maximum, inquit, hoc Triumvirale caput maximo debetur Cardinali, statimque Federico Sanseverino proceritatis administrandæ Cardinali transmittitur. Colligit extemplo togam Tamisius, Riarium intempestivæ munificentiae incusans, in mulamque refilit, & munus ad Sanseverianam domum consequitur. Idem pari liberalitate facit Federicus, caputque ipsum splendidè exornatum verbis (5), aurataque illatum patina Ghisio publicano ditissimo deferri jubet, quod ei multo ære alieno, gravibusque usuris obstrictus erat. Voluit tertia jam spe avidam frustratus gulam æstusans Tamisius, festinabundusque incalente jam die in Transiberinos hortos, quos ipse Ghisius magnificè exstruxerat, contendit: ibique sessus admodum & multo sudore madidus, quod gravissimum abdominis, quarto à Fortuna decipitur: quippe qui Ghisium caput illud recentibus floribus redimitum adamato scorto, cui ab forma eruditique illustribus Imperiæ cognomen fuit, ut extemplo deferretur, curantem reperit. Fleat itaque indignabundus habenas retro, nec tamen subitatus gulæ, quæ Herculeos labores attulerat, & ad Imperiam jam multo sole Sixtini pontis semitam exurente adequitur. Ad extremum anhelantis gulæ ea vis atque libido fuit, ut qui per totam urbem fuerat raptatus, idem & togatus & senex, cum scorto admirante novi hominis adventum, nullo pudore discubuerit. — The Romans call That (Umbram) at present Umbrina. The Heads of the Umbræ, as also of the Siluri, are given, by way of Present, to the Triumvirs, Conservators of Rome, who, thro' custom immemorial, have obliged the Fishermen to pay these Heads by way of Tribute. — The Jesters still relate a diverting Story of one T. Tamisius, a Man famous for Wit, but gluttonous even to infamy. This Man, being informed by his Servant, who used to wait in the Fish Market for that purpose, that the Head of a large Umbræ was carried to the Triumvirs, posts away to the Capitol, that, by pretending business with the Magistrate, and industriously protracting his Discourse, he might get a Dinner. But the Triumvirs had designed the Head as a Present to Cardinal Riarius: Thus Ta- milis,

honoured him with a kind of Adoption: he would have Augustin Cbigi, and his Posterity, reputed to belong to the Family of Roveri. Under the Pontificate of Paul III, the Family of the Cbigi declined, and was forced to leave Rome, and return to Siena. They had a very fine Garden on the Tiber, near the Palace Farnese: That Neighbourhood proved fatal to them: the Imbellishments of That Palace required, that This fine part of the Inheritance of the Cbigi should be added to it. From That Reign, till That of Urban VIII, their Family kept retired at Siena; but, at that time, Fabio Cbigi went to seek his Fortune at Rome, and succeeded so well, that, in 1655, he was raised to the Papacy, under the Name of Alexander VII. I speak of him in the following Article. That Pope took great care to enrich and aggrandize his Family. Mario Cbigi, his eldest Brother, Governour of Rome, concerned himself but little with Politics or Matters of State; but, on the other side, he was extraordinarily addicted to heap up Money (c), and found effectual Contrivances for it, which made the People complain much. Donna Berenice, his Wife (d), who was come to Rome very ignorant of the ways of the Court, soon became such a Proficient, that she was able to instruct others. She went very rarely to the Pope's Audience: They took care at first, that she should concern her self with no other Business than her own: They made a good use of the Complaints, which still continued against Donna Olympia, Sister-in-law to Innocent X. Flavio Cbigi, the Son of Don Mario, was made Cardinal Patron. He loved his Pleasures too well [B], and was as yet too young to gain esteem by State Intrigues [C]. He did not trouble himself about heaping up Money, either bemisus, being disappointed in his first Design, and seeing the noble Head carried out in a large garnished Dish, followed it, ordering his Servant to follow those who bore it. When it entered the Cardinal's House, Al's well, we are safe, cries Tamisius; I shall be splendidly entertained: for he was a very frequent Guest at Riarius's Table, which was always the best. But Riarius, who was naturally generous, said, This greatest Triumvir Head deserves to be sent to the greatest Cardinal: immediately it is dispatched away to Federic Sansverin, a Cardinal of surprizing Tallness. Tamisius immediately tucks up his Gown, and, accusing Riarius of an unseasonable munificence, mounts his Mule, and follows it to the House of Sansverin. Federic, by a like liberality, does the same thing, and orders the Head, attended with an handsome Complement, and laid in a Golden Dish, to be carried to the rich Banker Chigi, to whom he was greatly in Debt. Away flies Tamisius, his greedy Appetite a third time disappointed, all in a sweat, and hastens in the Heat of the Day to Chigi's magnificent Gardens, crosses the Tyber; where tired, and in a great sweat (for he had a great Paunch), he is a fourth time deceived by Fortune; for he finds Chigi giving orders to carry the Head, adorned with fresh Flowers, to his Mistress, whom, for her Beauty and attractive Charms, he surnamed Imperia. With indignation, therefore, he turns the Reins, not yet angry at his gluttonous Appetite, which had occasioned him Herculean Labour, and rides to Imperia, the Noon-day Sun now scorching the Path of Sixtus's Bridge. At last, such was the force and eagerness of his insatiable Appetite, that, after burrying all over the Town, he was not abated to sit down, notwithstanding his Age and Character, with an Harlot, who wondered at the arrival of a Stranger.

[B] Flavio Chigi - loved his Pleasures too well. One may easily understand what Angelo Corraro meant, when he said, that That Cardinal kept his Bed more than his Youth seemed to require; and that he defired his Physicians not to tell the Pope the Reason of it, for fear his Holiness should imagine, that he loved good Cheer, and the Fair Sex, too well. Goderebbe assai migliore sanita se fosse piu temperato nel mangiare, nel che eccede ogni precetto di viver sano, con largo e succoso pasto. Vogliono anco che non sia sobrio quanto dovrebbe ne' piaceri del senso, onde e che piu spesso di quello che doverebbe aspettarli dalla sua gioventu, viene obbligato al letto. I medici però non riportano al Papa le vere ragioni della sua decumbenza, così avvertiti dal Cardinale, accio sua Santita non concepisca sinistra opinione di lui, como di crapulone e incontinente (6). — He might have enjoyed better health, had he been more temperate in eating, in which he exceeded every Precept for the preservation of health, by extreme Gluttony: some say likewise, that he was not so moderate, as he ought to have been, in sensual Pleasures; whence it happened, that he was often confined to his Bed, than one would have expected from a Person of his Age. The Physicians however did not acquaint the Pope with the true Reasons of his Confinement, being so instructed by the Cardinal, that his Holiness might not conceive an ill Opinion of him, at of one given to Drinking and Incontinence. It has been said, That the Insult offered (7) to the Duke of Crequi, Ambassador at Rome, proceeded originally from a Passion of Gallantry, that the Cardinal Patron had in his Head. The Count de Buff-Rabutin built on that Foundation (8), as appears by his Satires. However it be, Cardinal Chigi was much cried down for his Venerable Pleasures, when he was in France in the Year 1664 (9); and a great many Ballads were sung about him, all over the Kingdom. The long Diseases he had in the last Years of his Life, and which have been so much spoken of in the Gazettes, are but ambiguous Proofs of a debauched Youth. See the Remark [C] of the following Article.

[C] He was yet too young, to gain esteem by State Intrigues. Angelo Corraro speaks contemptibly of him on that Account. Nothing but Compliments and empty Promises could be had from him; which was the reason why Corraro applied himself no more to him, but directly to the Pope. Di quel che vaglia, says he (10), nel negotio non mi dà l'animo d'affermare cosa certa, perche s'egli non fa fare più di quello che fa, bisogna dire che vaglia poco, già che da esso non riportano fe non complimenti, gentilezze di concetti, e speranze di voler far affari, che in fine si risolvono in nulla: terminando le risposte in repugnanze trovate in S. S. e in qualche motivo delle cause, o della negativa, o della prolatione. Onde io hò ritrovato meglio ne' negozi importanti, andarmene di primo tratto al Papa medesimo, che valerli dell'interposizione del Cardinale. He takes notice of two or three Faults, that hindered him from being a Man of Business. I. His too great Attachment to Pleasures. II. His Forgetfulness of the fittest Circumstances to procure what is desired. III. His readiness to slacken, as soon as he perceived that a Thing troubled the Pope's Mind (11). It is certain, that these are three capital Obstacles to the Success of a Negotiation, which one is intrusted with. This Cardinal must needs have mended as he grew older; for he maintained his Credit in the Conclaves, a the Head of his Uncle's Creatures. Few great Affairs have been seen at the Court of Rome, in which he has not appeared with Authority. This because he had well provided himself in his Uncle's Life-time: Now, when a Man has his Hands well filled, he may intrude any where; he may speak high, and Clients are never wanting. See here what has been said of this Cardinal in a Book, printed at Amsterdam (12): Many cause he was an expensive Man, or because he thought it of but little importance to get an Estate for another Branch; for he had no Brother. We speak more amply of him in the Remarks. AUGUSTUS CHIGI, the Brother of Don Mario, had left two Sons, of whom Pope Alexander VII took great care. The Eldest, AUGUSTIN CHIGI, designed to be the Head of the Family, married (e) one of the greatest Fortunes of Rome, (viz.) the Niece of Prince Marc Antony Borgbese. She had an Estate of 180 thousand Crowns. She was handsome, and had been educated by a Lady of excellent Virtue (f). Perhaps this Marriage would not have been effected, if the Uncle had lived; I say the Uncle, who, hearkening very civilly to the first Proposal, enquired nevertheless what Estate and Dignities Don Augustin might expect. This was to waver, and to think, that the Pope's Alliance was not singly worth the Lady: which did not please his Holiness. On the other side, the Son of the Constable Colonna made his Addresses to the fair Lady, and pleaded her better than Don Augustin. But Prince Marc Antony Borgbese happening to die, the matter was concluded with an extraordinary haste, by the good Offices of the Princes of Rossano [D], the Lady's Mother. Such an advantageous Marriage in so many respects did not settle Don Augustin's Love [E]. The Pope bought him the Principality of Farnese, which is a Fief of the Empire in the Province of the Patrimony, and which cost him 170 thousand Crowns. SIGISMUND CHIGI, Don Augustin's Brother, was gratified with many great Pensions by Pope Alexander VII (g), and promoted to the Cardinalship by Pope Clement IX, in 1667 (h).

The

Many Cardinals, capable of being made Popes, are in Chigi's Faction, of whom the Chief, Flavio Chigi, is powerful, and has known so well how to manage himself, since the Death of Alexander VII, his Uncle, that he has already had one Pope at his Devotion; because he did not obstinately desire to have one of his Creatures in the two last Conclaves, but thought it enough to join with other Factions, as much as his Interest suffered him. And, because Barberini did not do so, he never had a Pope, who was obliged to him for his Exaltation. The Conclave of Clement IX informs us, that, although Cardinal Chigi did not desire, that Cardinal Rospigliosi should be created Pope, yet it was impossible to give the Papacy to the latter, before the other had suffered himself to be persuaded to concur with it. The Conclave of Clement X (13) shews, that Cardinal Chigi had almost as much Credit under Clement IX, as under Alexander VII. That Cardinal was so strong in the Conclave, where Clement X, was elected, that Cardinal d'Este said one Day to him, Well, Cardinal Chigi, what do we here? Why do not you give us a Pope (14)? And, indeed, the Election of Altieri would never have succeeded without the Influence of Chigi. Let us say, by the way, that, in the Conclave of Clement IX, Cardinal d'Arach, the Head of the Spanish Faction, told Cardinal Chigi, That he was not very much experienced in the present Affairs; that, since it was the first Conclave he had been in, he could not have all the possible Experience in it, and that, before one undertakes a matter of that importance, one ought to make one's self capable of it (15).

[D] The Princess of Rossano. Her Name was Donna Olympia Aldobrandina. She was grand Niece of Clement VIII; and her first Husband was Prince Borgbese. This Lady's Ambition had been known a long time: being a Widow in her Youth, and having Beauty, Birth, Wit, and a great Estate, she was courted by several Princes: but she preferred Don Camillo Pamphilio, Nephew of Innocent X; to all the Matches that were offered her, in order to have a share in the Government. The same Reason made her prefer a Pope's Nephew to the Constable Colonna's Son, for her Daughter (16): she did it only per guadagnare l'affetto della casa pontificia, e per haver parte al Vaticano, che e tutto quello che sempre ha cercato questa Signora. — To gain the affection of the Pope's Family, and to have an Interest in the Vatican, which That Lady had ever desired. She found herself much deceived under Innocent X; for, instead of coming into Favour by her Marriage with Don Camillo, she was forced to follow him in his Exile. The Instruction of the French Embassadors at Rome, attributed to the Bailly de Valençay, gives an ill Character of That Princess. As God resists proud and haughty Persons, the Princess Rossano sees herself abased, humbled, mortified, and fallen from that supreme Grandeur, and high degree of Glory and Honour, of which she had made a vain-glorious Shew, and so great an Ostentation on the Stage of this august and glorious City of Rome; and at present she is so much the farther distant and removed from the Scene, indulging and pleasing herself only with some melancholy and Romantic Fancies, which are never satisfied with present things, but indifferently speculate and look on things past and gone a long time ago, and on those that may happen hereafter. As for me — I cannot imagine that this can bring any trouble, or never so little importance — although that Lady should confine her Ambition within the narrow Limits of Doors and Chambers, rather than to make it visibly appear and break out by ridiculous and superfluous Ostentations in the Corners of the Streets, public Places, Passages and Walks of the City (17). The Author of the Travels of the Queen of Poland, (18) having spoken of Aldobrandin's famous Garden, most justly called Belveder, which is at Frescati, goes on thus (19): 'Prince Pamphilio, the Pope's Nephew, heretofore a Cardinal, is at present Possessor of That Place, as also of the Princess, Heiress of the Family of the Aldobrandini, whose first Husband, Prince of Rossano, presumptive Heir, and the only hopes of That of the Borgbese, died some Days before our Arrival (20), in that same place, being under Twenty two Years of Age, like her, and had left her two Sons and two Daughters. It is That Cardinal's Happiness to have so soon found such an advantageous Match, both for Riches and Beauty: for she is the finest Princess in all the Country, and, besides, one of the most witty.

[E] Marriage — did not settle Don Augustin's Love. His Wife had brought him vast Riches; she was handsome, well-educated, and fruitful, and yet he loved other Women. What a Disorder! — Essendo la sposa di non ordinaria bellezza, e allevata sotto la disciplina dell'Ava, Signora di santissimi costumi, non restava che desiderar più in questo genere di contentezze, & già s'è cominciato a goderne i frutti, havendo la Principessa già data segno di fecondità, co'l parto di una figliuola. Non resta però che il Sig. D. Agostino non vada vagando in altri amori, come lo lusinga la sua natura proclive al gusto del senso, e la facilità di pascersia quando gliene possa mai venir voglia (21). He had no great Tenderness for his Wife, since, after his Wedding, he could not forbear saying, that he rejoiced more for the Victory he had obtained over his Rival, than for the Enjoyment of the Princess, whom he possessed. The Constable Colonna, hearing this, answered, that his Son had courted the Princess, because he had Merit enough to demand her; but that Don Augustin had obtained her by the Credit and Authority

The Relation of Angelo Corraro, which I have cited, imports, that this Family began to advance itself at the Court of Rome under the Pontificate of Julius II: but we must correct this; for it appeared with distinction under Alexander VI [F].

thority of his Uncle the Pope. Some Years after, the Constable's Son married a Niece of Cardinal Mazarin (22). The Match, as to Riches, was much better; but they lived badly together. The Public has seen the History of it.

[F] This Family appeared with Distinction at the Court of Rome under Alexander VI. Tomaso Tomasi, in the Life of the Duke de Valentinois, remarks, that LAURENCE CHIGI, a Gentleman of Siena, was crushed to death, when a Storm overthrew a Chimney in one of the Chambers of the Vatican, on St Peter's Days (23). This Accident had like to have been fatal to Pope Alexander VI. This Author adds (24), that, when the Duke de Valentinois prepared himself for the Expedition of Romania, in the Year 1500, Augustin Chigi, Brother of Laurence, one of the rich and magnificent Gentlemen, who were then at the Court (25), lent him not only many thousand Crowns, but even went so far, as to cause all his Silver Plate, which was considerable, to be coined into Money, of

CHIGI (FABIO) born at Siena, the sixteenth of February 1599 (a), was Pope under the Name of Alexander VII. His Family, seeing him a hopeful Young-man, sent him early to Rome, where he contracted a very useful Friendship with the Marquis Pallavicini (b); for that Marquis recommended him in such a manner to Pope Urban VIII, that, in a little time, he procured him the Place of Inquisitor at Malta. Chigi, having shewed, in that Employment, that he was capable of greater things, was sent to Ferrara in the Quality of Vice-Legate, and afterwards Nuncio into Germany (c). He had the most favourable Opportunity, that a Man of That Character could desire, to shew his intriguing Genius; for he was Mediator at Munster, during the long Conferences that were held there for the Peace of Europe. He acted his Part very well there [A]. Before he went to Munster; he had the Nunciature of Cologne, and exercised it some Years after the Conclusion of the Peace. He exercised it in 1651, when Cardinal Mazarin fled to the Elector of Cologne; and he was ordered to complain, in the Name of Pope Innocent X, a great Enemy of That Cardinal, that That Elector permitted that Eminence to raise Troops (d). Cardinal Mazarin bore some Repentment for it against Fabio Chigi, who was soon after promoted to the Cardinalship, and to the Office of Secretary of State, by Innocent X; but That Repentment was sacrificed to Politic Interests, at the Election of a Pope in 1655. Cardinal Sacchetti, a good Friend of Cardinal Mazarin, seeing no likelihood to obtain the Papacy, by reason of the great Obstacles of the Spanish Faction, advised That Eminence to consent to the Exaltation of Fabio Chigi. His request was granted. When the Dispositions of France were known in the Conclave, all the Partizans of That Crown united their Voices in favour of Chigi. The flying Squadron, who looked upon him as their Master-piece, resolved to be favourable to him. The Faction of the Medicis and Spaniards had their particular Reasons to choose him; inasmuch that he was created Pope (e) by the Voices of all the Sixty four Cardinals that were in the Conclave (f). There are but few Examples of such an Unanimity in the Election of Popes. Cardinal Chigi deserved, that Day and the following Years, the Elogy that the Duke of Guise gave to Innocent X [B]. It being known, the day before the Election, what Choice the Holy Ghost had resolved to inspire the next day, the Cardinals went to congratulate That Eminence, who answered them at first only with Sighs and Tears in his eyes (g), desiring them to make a better Choice (h): but afterwards he took Courage, and thanked them for their Good-will. After the Election, he was carried, according to custom, to St Peter's Church, to receive the Adoration of the Cardinals on the great Altar. He would not be placed in the middle of that Altar, but on one of the Corners of it; because, as he said, he did not think himself worthy of the Place that his Predecessor had. During all the Ceremony of the Adoration, he continued prostrate on the Ground

[A] He was Mediator at Munster — He acted his Part very well there.] A modern Author observes, that the Mediation of Denmark, which was at first accepted, for the Peace of Munster, having been afterwards rejected by Sweden, the whole Mediation remained to the Pope, and in some manner to the Republic of Venice, who made use of the Talents of Fabio Chigi, and Aloysio Contarini, to perfect such a glorious Work. The first had, among many other great Qualities, That of perfectly dissembling his bad ones; and he did it so artificially, that the whole College of Cardinals could not discover it, till they had made him Pope. The other was a Man of Honour, and had discharged, with great Reputation, so many Embassies, that he had acquired That of one of the best Negotiators of his Time (1). The Cavalier Angelo Corraro observes, that, though Fabio Chigi could not well support the Catholic Interest, because the Influence of the Protestants was superior to That of the Catholics in the Assembly of Westphalia; yet he did not fail to do his Duty (2); so far, that he had the Ability to preserve the Esteem of the Spaniards and Imperialists, though he reproved them very sharply for having consented to a Peace so prejudicial to the Catholic Church.

[B] He deserved — the Elogy that the Duke of Guise gave to Innocent X.] The Discourte, which Cardinal Grimaldi had with him, and the manner of negotiating of Monsieur de Fontenay, and of the Abbot de Saint Nicolas, affected him very sensibly, and were insupportable to him, publishing, as he said, every where, that he was a Cheat, and that no one ought, or could, trust to his Word; which he was so vexed at, that the Tears stood in his Eyes for Anger; which nevertheless did not much affect me, as knowing very well, that he shed them, when he pleaded, and that he was a very great Dissembler (3).

Ground with great Humility, with a Crucifix in his Arms. Being come to his Apartment at the Vatican, before thinking of any thing else, he ordered his Coffin to be made, wherein his Body was to be laid after his Death, and to be placed under his Bed, to excite him the more to Holiness by a continual Idea of Death. When they clothed him with his Pontifical Habits, they found a Hair cloth under his Shirt. He continued to fast twice a Week, as he had done when he was Cardinal. The Day after his Election, he repulsed Signora Olympia rudely, who was come to wish him joy, saying to her, that it was not decent for a Woman to set her foot in the Palace of the Head of the Church. He forbid his Relations to come to Rome without his leave (i). His subsequent Behaviour shewed, that this was only Dissimulation and Cunning; and many Roman Catholics made no scruple to complain of his Artifices. Afterwards he became civil and obliging to his Nephews [C], and heaped many Favours upon them; which was a sad Disappointment to the famous Antagonist of Father Paul [D]. What Moreri says, that Alexander VII promoted, with a true fatherly care, the Conclusion of the Peace between France and Spain, by the Marriage

(i) Ex Conclavi Alexandri VII. apud Heideggerum, ubi supra.

[C] He became civil and obliging to his Nephews.] No Pope better deserved the Palquil, & homo factus est, nor took more advantage of the Privileges of Nepotism, than He. It is said (I know nothing of it) that he had sworn never to receive his Relations in Rome, and that, being perplexed with the Sacredness of his Oath, he knew not how to satisfy the Affection he had for his Family; that Father Pallavicini removed those Scruples, by advising him to go and meet his Relations, some Leagues from Rome, and made him understand, that his Holiness's Oath did not forbid him to receive his Relations on the Road from Siena to Rome, but only to receive them at Rome; that the Pope, grounded on such an ingenious Distinction, went to meet his Family, and received it upon the Road, in the very high way. Afterwards he poured Dignities and Benefices on his Relations. His Brother, Don Mario, was made Governor of the Ecclesiastical State. Flavio Chigi, the Son of Don Mario, was made Cardinal Patron. Sigismund Chigi, the orphan Son of another of the Pope's Brothers, was gratified with several good Pensions, till he came to be of Age to be made a Cardinal with some Decency (4). Augustin Chigi (5), designed to be the Pillar of the Family, was married to a very rich Niece of Prince Borghese. 'Augustinum futurum Chisianæ familiæ columen, cui Principis Borghesi neptim opulentissimam conjugem, dote centum millium ducatorum & viginti insuper millibus duplionum loco margaritarum expensis, denique sexaginta millibus duplionum in manus ipsius sponsi resignatis, impetravit (6). — Augustin, the future Support of the Family of Chigi, for whom he obtained the Niece of Prince Borghese, a very great Match, with a Fortune of an Hundred thousand Ducats, and Twenty thousand Doubloons over and above, instead of Jewels, and lastly, Sixty thousand Doubloons delivered up into the Hands of the Husband.' One of the Pope's Sister's Sons (7) was made a Cardinal; the other, who was a Knight of Malta, was made General of the Gallies. Dona Berenice, the Wife of Don Mario, and her Daughters, had also rich Presents (8). Flavio Chigi, who was Cardinal Patron, and who was sent Legate à latere into France, to make Satisfaction concerning the Business of the Corse, made himself much spoken of. He died (9) loaded with Riches and Titles, Vice-Dean of the Sacred College, Bishop of Porto, Arch-Priest of St John of Lateran, Prefect of the Signature of Justice, &c. He made his Nephew Don Livio Chigi his chief Heir, and left ten thousand Crowns, and the Enjoyment of the Estate, which he had at Siena, to his Brother-in-law the Marquis Zandadari, whom he charged to take the Name and the Arms of the House of Chigi (10). See the Remark [B] of the foregoing Article.

[D] This was a sad Disappointment to the famous Antagonist of Father Paul.] I mean Father Sforza Pallavicini, Author of an History of the Council of Trent, designed for the Refutation of Father Paul, and which was rewarded with a Cardinal's Hat. He prefixed a pompous Elogy of Alexander VII to his Book, wherein he had very much praised the Design, which the holy Father had persisted in, not to suffer his Relations to come to Rome. Every body sees, that many fine things may be said on that Subject, and that it affords noble matter for an excellent Panegyric in the Hands of a good Orator. But it fell out unluckily for Father Pallavicini, that the Pope altered his Resolution, and desired to aggrandize his Relations, according to the Practice of Nepotism: nay, it is said, that That Father was obliged to remove the Scruples of his Conscience. After all, it was more advantageous to please the Pope and his Family, than to be fond of a Prologue already printed, though the Panegyric, which it contained, was never so fine. Nevertheless, this was not agreeable to an Author; but there was no help for it; he was forced to suppress what was already come out of the Press, and to adjust things as well as he could. If what I have just now said be not true, it must not be laid to my Charge; but those, from whom the Author, quoted by me, has it, ought to be blamed for it. Thus he speaks: 'Jamque Cardinalis Pallavicinus in ejus laudes effusissimus Historiæ Concilii Tridentini galeatum prologum præfixerat, quo Alexandri ceu Angeli ἀπερσσωπολήπης heroicum isthuc neglecti Nepotismi facinus tertium uique in Cœlum tulit: quem tamen, cum res alium longè eventum sortita esset, non sine pudore & impensarum iactura (plurima enim folia jam impressa, laudes has fictitias ebuccinantia, suppressi debuerant) ceu abortivum scetum tollere, & cum nescio quo Epilogo operis (qui ipse tamen post mortem Alexandri, saltem in Latina editione Baptistæ Giattini, omisus etiam fuit) commutare necesse habuit (11). — And now Cardinal Pallavicini, who is extravagant in his Praises, had prefixed a pompous Elogy to his History of the Council of Trent, in which he extolled to the third Heaven the heroic Conduct of Alexander, in declining the Practice of Nepotism; which however, when Affairs took another turn, he was obliged, not without Shame and Loss, (for he was forced to suppress many Sheets, sufficed with those fictitious Praises, already printed off) to destroy as an abortive Production, and to change it for I know not what Epilogue of a Work, which likewise, after the Death of Alexander, was left out, at least in the Edition of Baptistæ Giattini. The Author pretends, that Cardinal Pallavicini was Confessor of Alexander VII, and that he was a Cardinal before That Pope's Relations came to Rome; but it is certain, that he was not promoted till after the Edition of his History; from whence it results, by the very Narrative of That Author, that the Cardinalship of the Historian followed the Pope's Reception of his Family. I do not believe, that ever any Cardinal was the Pope's ordinary Confessor, nor that Father Pallavicini was ever so to Alexander VII (12). Yet the Author of the Nepotism affirms it (13), and perhaps he did so only to set off the Story he had a mind to tell of That Jesuit's Book. He does not say, that a Panegyric was prefixed to the History, but only that some Praises had been inserted in several places about the Pope's not permitting the Family of the Chigi to come to Rome. Above twenty Sheets, which contained something on that Subject, were reprinted. This, however, would seem to me more likely, than the other Story.

Marriage of Lewis XIV with the Infanta, stands in need of a Correction. [E]. He was in the wrong to praise him on occasion of the Pyramid, that was raised at Rome after the Affront, which the Corfes offered to the Duke of Crequi. This Pope deserves no Praise for the Satisfaction he made to France in that Business; for he did it much against his Will, and to avoid a War, which would have obliged him to leave Rome in a little time. France was never well persuaded, that he was free from Partiality against her. The Spaniards were not always satisfied with his Conduct [F]. For the Curiosity of the Thing, I shall observe, that there are some printed Books, wherein it is asserted, That he had a mind to abjure his Religion, and to turn Huguenot [G]. The Dutch Gazettes praised him much [H], and informed the Public, that

[E] What Mr Moreti says, stands in need of a Correction. There was nothing in the Pyrenean Peace, so much attended to by the Public, as it's being concluded without the Pope's Intervention. Some Cardinals would not have given their Votes for Fabio Chigi, had it not been for the Hopes, that he would apply himself to pacify the two Crowns, and that he would succeed better in it than any body else: And yet the thing succeeded in such a contrary manner, says Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato (14), that several People have published, that That Peace was shameful for the Holy See, and that many have spoken ill of it in Rome itself. And indeed it was only looked upon as the effect of the Care and Diligence of the two chief Ministers alone, who concluded it when his Holiness was no more concerned about it, and, it may be, thought no more of it. I do not deny, but that Priorato adds, (15), that Alexander, at his first coming to the Pontificate, performed very earnestly the Office of a common Father, to bring the two Crowns to a Peace, and even to obtain, that the Conferences might be held at Rome in his Presence; but he says also, that, during the Offices, which the Cardinal caused to be done with the Pope, for the Peace, by Father Donelli the Jesuit, the Pope shewed such Jealousies, and such a Coldness, as were a sufficient Excuse for France to exclude him from the Treaty of Peace (16). He was not named in the Preambles of the Articles of the Treaty, which vexed him; nay it has been known, that Cardinal Mazarin was disposed not to make any mention at all of the Pope. The bad Intelligence, that had been between them, increased, because the Peace was concluded without the Mediation of the Court of Rome; and That was the Reason why the Pope was vexed at That Peace. And indeed the Cardinal would say sometimes, in common Conversation, that the Pleasure, which the general Peace afforded him, was mixed with some Bitterness, because it did not appear, that his Holiness rejoiced at it; and the Pope, on his Part, might have said the Spanish Proverb, Provided the Miracle be done, I care not but little whether God or the Devil does it (17). Let us conclude from all this, that Moreti did not exactly consider the things he has mentioned. If he had read the Relation of Angelo Corrado, he would not have so much praised the Assistance, given to the Venetians, by the Pope, for the War of Candia; for two things are complained of in that Relation: I. That the Pope obstinately refused all the Favours, that might be useful in the War against the Turks: II. That he had no Zeal for the Peace of the two Crowns. 'Chi havebbe mai pensato che un Cardinale, che prima anche d'essere Cardinale, spirava tutto zelo, e mon- strava di languire su la considerazione dello stato miserabile, in che si andava riducendo il mondo Christiano, con una guerra così ostinata tra le maggiori corone di esso, non dovesse assunto al pontificato inservorarsi per la pace universale (18)? — Who would ever have thought, that a Cardinal, who, before being so, breathed nothing but Zeal, and seemed to languish under the Consideration of the miserable State, to which the Christian World was like to be reduced, by so obstinate a War among it's chief Princes, should not, when elected Pope, have interested himself in favour of an universal Peace?' [F] The Spaniards were not always satisfied with his Conduct. Mr Wicquefort supplies me with the Proof of it in this manner. 'Don Pedro of Arragon, the Spanish Ambassador at Rome, in the Year 1665, having let fall some Words of Resentment against the Court, which favoured the Affairs of the King of Portugal, in what concerned the Churches of That Kingdom; Pope Alexander VII, being informed of it, told him, That he was a wicked Man, and a Minister unfit to serve the King his Master. The Ambassador replied, That the Pope had reason to accuse him of Negligence and Incapacity, since he had not been willing to perform the King's Order, when there was a Treaty carried on, to his Prejudice, with the King of Portugal: That the Pope, by making such a Reproach, reproached him also with his Goodness; but that he was in the wrong to say, that he was a wicked Man; and that he could more justly tell him, That Fabio Chigi was a wicked Man, since he forced him to execute the King his Master's Orders, and to desire the College of Cardinals to consider, whether the See of Rome was more concerned to do something for four Bishopsrics of Portugal, than to hazard an hundred and thirty Bishopsrics and sixty Abbies in Spain. The Pope told him also, That the Meetings, which he held at his House, were very dangerous, and might give an Opportunity to plunder the City. The Ambassador answered, That, if That was his Intention, he had nothing to do but to retire with all the Subjects of the King his Master, because those that should remain, being not able to submit, would commit the Disorder, which could not be feared from him (19).

[G] There are printed Books, wherein it is asserted, that he had a mind — to turn Huguenot. The Book, which informs me of this, is a Journey into Switzerland, printed at Geneva in the Year 1686, though the Title says at the Hague, by Peter du Glaffen. The Author of That Journey is a French Minister, and a Refugee in Holland, called Mr Labrun. I shall recite what he says concerning the Religion of Alexander VII. The Thing cannot but belong to this Dictionary. If it be true, it takes it as being an Historical Dictionary: If it be false, it seizes on it as being a Critical one. Fabio Chigi — was sent Inquisitor to Malta, Vice-Legat to Ferrara, and afterwards the Pope's Nuncio to Cologne, when the Peace of Munster was made. The Affairs of the Princes of Europe were ended happily enough, after two Years Negotiation at Munster and Osnabrug. Chigi, who was sent thither as the Pope's Nuncio, and who was obliged to converse daily with Protestant Princes, or with their Ministers (20), gained an Idea of their Religion, and, though he had almost at the same time published That Judgment of a Divine, under the supposititious Name of Ernestus Eusebius, wherein the Protestants are so much abused, yet he remained convinced, that there was nothing heretical in their Doctrine. But he went no farther. Count Pompey, one of his near Relations of Italy, at last opened his Eyes. That Count lived on an Estate in Germany, which was fallen to him by his Mother's side. — Chigi — would not return to Rome, without seeing That Relation — he went to him, with two of his Nephews, who had accompanied him to Cologne, and staid all that Winter with him. — They discoursed of Religion, and, after many Conversations, they resolved to read the Bible with Diodati's Notes. The Count had already read those learned Notes, and knew also the strongest Observations therein. They both examined the matter, and were surprized to find themselves convinced that he did not approve of the Violences, which were committed against the Vaudois in Piedmont. What he said to some Protestant Gentlemen, who came to kiss his Feet, has been much talked of [I]. It has been said, in other Books, (not without convinced every Moment. They knew not what Party to take: but, at last, after having well considered it — they agreed, that the Protestant Religion was the True one, and, from that Time, Chigi engaged himself with his Kinsman to forsake his Errors, as soon as he should have given an Account of his Nunciature, and to come to him again at his Country Seat, conjuring him to make forthwith an Abjuration of the Romish Religion, since God had given him Grace to know the Truth, and to be free. Chigi departed with his Nephews, being fully resolved to forsake the Court of Rome, and never wrote to the Count without exhorting him to execute his Design. His Journey was longer than he thought. The Sickness of one of his Nephews, which ended with his Death, was the Cause of it. In the mean time, Count Pempey disposed himself to do what he had resolved. — He went to Orange, where he made a public Profession of our Religion. He was also some time at Nîmes, and made himself known there. This Conversion made a Noise. It was spoken of all over Europe, and even too much; for, as he retired to Germany, he was poisoned at Lyons, where he died. This News sunk Chigi down. The Death of That Count — broke all his Measures. He imagined, that he might have the same Fate: He found himself deprived of a Place of Refuge; but, while he was wavering, he was made a Cardinal, and First Secretary of the Apostolic Chamber. There needed no more, to stifle those Seeds of Truth in Chigi's Heart, which were not yet deeply rooted: the Splendor of the Purple dazzled him. — He was made a Pope by the Tricks that every body knows. As soon as he was a Cardinal, he affected to be always sick. He caused his Apartment to be hung with Mourning, and adorned his Chamber with a Coffin, and a dead Man's Head (21). — He was a Calvinist in his Heart. He endeavoured, in vain, to hide himself, in the Affair of the Janfenists; for he was discovered. In the time of his Pontificate, some Books were printed in Flanders, wherein he was accused of being a Heretic. They are Books which every body has seen. One Day Mr Amyraut had a Conversation with the Duke of Longueville, in his House of Plessis Belleau (22), which agrees very well with what we have said. Mr Amyraut was a sincere Man. He related, that That Prince, whom he had the Honour to see very often, told him, That, when he was Plenipotentiary at Munster for his Most Christian Majesty, he knew That Pope to the bottom, who held at that time the Pontificate; that he had very much inclined to a Reformation; and that, if the Huguenots would make any Concessions, there never was a better Opportunity to be re-united, since they might be assured, that the Head of the Church would not be against them.

(19) De l'Ambassadeur, Tome II, pag. 168.

(20) Wicquefort, in the first Volume of his Embassy, pag. 648, says, that That Nuncio declared, he would have no Communication with the Heretics, and that he pretended to be a Mediator only for the Catholic Princes. Wicquefort calls this a strange Fantasticalness in Fabio Chigi, and in the two employed him; which he opposes to the Conduct of Bevilacqua, who was Nuncio at the Conference of Nimwegen, and who was so far from abhorring the Company of the Ministers of the Protestant Princes and States, that he offered to prevent them with his civilities, if they would promise to return them.

I am persuaded, that the Author of this Narrative will not take it ill, if I impart to my Readers what Mr Amyraut, the Son, has communicated to me. He has assured me, that he knows nothing of his Father's having had any Conversation with the Duke of Longueville about the Nuncio Chigi, nor about Pope Alexander VII. That it is very true, that the Duke of Longueville had a Seat three Leagues from Saumur, but that it is not true, that it was called le Plessis Belleau; for it was called Monstreuil-Bellai (23). When he went thither, he did not fail to send and enquire of Mr Amyraut's Health, who, on his part, was very punctual to go and pay his Respects to him, and that he was always very kindly received by him; so that his Highness ought to be added to those Great Lords, who expressed their Esteem for that Minister (24). Now, since Mr Amyraut, the Son, never heard any thing of those Conversations of Monsieur de Longueville, concerning Alexander VII. it must be concluded, without Hesitation, that Mr Amyraut, the Father, never learned any such thing in his Conversations with Monsieur de Longueville. And here we have an Instance, which shews us how distrustful we ought to be of Stories, which are only grounded on Hear-says. I believe the Author of this Journey into Switzerland is now fully persuaded, that one ought to stand upon his Guard against those kind of Traditions.

[H] The Dutch Gazzettes praised him much. This is what I find in a Letter, which Curcellæus, Professor of the Arminians at Amsterdam, wrote to Sorbiere, the Twenty fourth of December, 1655 (25). 'I am willing to believe, says he, that Alexander VII. deserves a good part of the Praises that the Public gives him. The Amsterdam Courants, that are not used to celebrate the Praises of the Popes, as the Paris Gazzettes often do, have spoken so well of him, that there must be something in it. They have also testified, that he disapproved the Cruelties, which were lately exercised on the poor Vaudois of the Vallies of Piedmont, saying, One ought not to proceed in that manner, to bring into the Bolom of the Church those, who are gone astray. If it be true, that this Pope disapproved the Duke of Savoy's Conduct, the Vaudois might glory in it with much more reason, than the Reformed of France could boast of the Judgment, which, it is said, Innocent XI. made of Dragooning: for That Pope's ill Humour against the Court of France was sufficient to make him say, That he did not approve of such a way of converting People.

[I] What he said to some Protestant Gentlemen, who came to kiss his Feet, has been much talked of. Sorbiere (26), being to answer a Letter, wherein some body had wrote to him, That his Journey to Rome would make him return again to the Reformed Church, declared, That he had seen nothing at Rome, but what edified him, 'and that the Roman Court, notwithstanding its Pomp, had a great deal of Affability and Modesty. 'For my part, he goes on, I can assure you, Sir, that I could not observe so much Haughtiness in any of the Cardinals, whom I had the Honour to approach, as there is in some Ministers of our Acquaintance; and, in all the Audiences that I have had of our Holy Father, I spoke to him with the same Liberty as I converse with you, his Goodness requiring it so from all those, who approach him. I shall tell you a remarkable Particular on this Occasion, that you will not be displeased to know. A little before my Departure, some English Gentlemen, who had a mind to be Witnesses of what I tell you of his Holiness, got in among those, who went to pay their Respects to him on their Knees. He asked them what Countrymen they were, and, afterwards, if they were not Protestants, which they owned. Whereupon his Holiness replied, with a smiling Countenance, Rise therefore, I will not have you to commit an Idolatry, according to your Opinion. I shall not give you my Blessing, since you do not believe me to be what I am; but I pray God to make you fit to receive it.

A famous Protestant Controversist relates this Story wrong. These are his Words, which I take from the One hundred fifty eighth Page of his Answer to a Book of Mr Brueys (27). 'I must refer Mr Brueys to a Convert like himself, which is Sorbiere; who says somewhere, That some Englishmen, being at Rome, had a mind to see Pope Alexander VII. to salute him, and to kiss his Toe. That Pope, having heard, that they were Englishmen, asked, what Religion they were of. They were afraid, and made some Difficulty to confess, that they were Protestants. Alexander VII. having encouraged them, they confessed; and thereupon he told them, That their Religion would not permit their Conscience to do him the Homage of kissing his Feet. I do not receive it as a Temporal Prince of Rome, said he, which is all you acknowledge in me; but as the Vicar of JESUS CHRIST, a Quality that you do not acknowledge in me. I will pray to God to convert you, and I give you my Blessing; but, out finding some Mystery in it) that he was related to the Grand Signior Mahomet IV [K]. This is a greater Singularity, than that which I am going to speak of. Alexander VII was an Author [L]; we have a Volume of his Poems. He loved Literature, and to discourse of Poetry, History, and Politics, with learned Persons. He loved stately Buildings; and it was not his Fault, that the whole City of Rome did not become equally magnificent and regular as to the Streets, Squares, and Houses. The Mischief was, that Those Expences exhausted the Apostolic Chamber, and that, by ordering the demolishing of many Houses, which were not according to the Rules of Symmetry, he ruined the Proprietors (k). There is something great in the Design of the College della Sapienza, the Building whereof he finished, and which he adorned with a very fine Library. The Confiſtorial Advocates raised him a pompous Inscription on that Subject (l). He died the Twenty second of May 1667, much more lamented by the Jesuits, than by the Janſenists.

(22) Compare with this what has been said in the Article AMYRAUT, Rem. [D], and see whether there be not a Mixture of different Facts in these Narratives.

'till you receive the Illumination which is to 'come from above, I do not exact any thing from
'you, by way of Complaisance, against your Re'ligion and Inclination. I cannot tell whether
'Sorbiere contrived this Story to honour Pope Alex'ander VII, or not. However it be, they are the 'Sentiments of an honest Man, and our Conduct
'ought to be regulated by That Maxim in point
'of Religion.' By comparing these two Relations together, it appears plainly, that our Controversit had never read Sorbiere's Writing, or at least that he had it not before him, when he answered Mr Brueys. He heard the thing in general, and took the flourishing of it upon himself. Prudence will not permit this; One ought to distrust his Memory. When a Man falsifies a Narrative in these two Points; the one, That the English Gentlemen were afraid; and the other, That the Pope gave them his Blessing; he may falsify it in many others;
and it is a great Chance if he does not alter some essential Part of it. I could make many Reflexions on the Fate of Controversits; but they would be unreasonable. The Author of the Preservative did not foresee, when he praised the Maxims of Alexander VII, that he should write a Book about the Rights of an erroneous Conscience, that he should confute himself, and lay down Principles, according to which That Pope would have been much in the wrong to oppose the Kneeling of the Englishmen.

[K] It is pretended, that he was related to the Grand Signior. I have not the Book, wherein this is proved; so that I can only serve my Reader with these Words of Heidegger: 'Mahometem
'eo ipso tempore Imperatorem Turcicum quinto
'gradu consanguinitatis, ex Alanc Moruglio, com-
'muni stirpe & atavo utriusque parentis Pontificii
'& Turcici, pessimo utique omine contigit, uti
'quidem Pastorius in Henninge redidit pag. 157
'demonstravit (29). — He was a-kin to Mahomet,
'at that time Emperor of the Turks, in the fifth
'Degree, by Alanc Moruglio, the common Stem
'and Ancestor of the Fathers, both of the Pope
'and the Grand Turk, as Pastorius, in Henninge
'redidit, has demonstrated.' I have since met with a Book, which sets forth in a Table the Parentage of Alexander VII, and the Great Turk. It is pretended, that Margaret Marfili, Daughter of Nani Marfili, a Noble Sieneſe, was the Wife of Solyman, and the Mother of Selim II, whose Son Amu-rath III was the Father of Mahomet III. The latter was the Father of Achmet I, who was the Father of Amurath IV, whose Son Ibrahim was the Father of Mahomet IV. On the other side, Leonard Marfili, Brother of Margaret, had a Son, whose Name was Cesar Marfili, who was the Father of Alexander Marfili, and of Laura Marfili, the Mother of Fabio Chigi, who was Pope by the Name of Alexander VII. The Author, whom I cite (30), alleges the Account, which Francis Niger gives of the taking of a Castle, in the Territory of Siena. The Turkish Pirates, who plundered That Castle about the Year 1525, found Margaret Marfili there, and, because she was very handsome, they kept her for Solyman.

[L] Alexander VII was an Author.] The finest Edition of his Latin Poems is That of the Louvre, in Folio, in the Year 1656. It consists of Heroic, Elegiac, and Lyric Verses: the last exceed the other in number. There is also a Tragedy, intitled

Pompey. The Author made it in the Country, in the Year 1621. Seneca was his Model, both for the Disposition of the Piece, and the Measure of the Verses. A Letter, prefixed before this Collection, inform us, that he unwillingly consented to the printing of his Poems, and that he would not suffer his Name to be put to them, nor any other Title, than That which discovers, that they are only the Fruits of his younger Years (31). But there are many Pieces in it, that he composed when a Man, and in great Offices. Read Pages 65 and 66 of Mr (32) Kortbol's Treatise de Poëti; Episcopis, printed at Keil, in 1699. Borrichius finds, that Pope Urban VIII was better qualified, both by Nature and Art, for Poetry, than Pope Alexander VII, but that the latter laboured his Poems more than the other (33). He finds some Harshness in the Heroic Verses, wherein Alexander described his Travels from Rome to Ferrara, from Ferrara to Cologne, from Malta to Rome. That is but Part of his Travels; he described moreover Those from Cologne to Munster, from Munster to Aix la Chapelle, from Aix la Chapelle to Triers, &c. If all the Praises, which the Authors of the Poetical Acclamations (34)
have bestowed upon This Pope's Verses, were true, one could not forbear to say, That he was the most accomplished of all the Poets. But, because Those Authors made Part of the Pleias, that flourished at Rome under This Pontiff, their Elegies are not much to be relied upon (35). I dare not affirm, That a Piece, which came out in the Year 1646, under the Title of Judicium Theologicum super quæ-stione an pax qualem desiderant Protestantes sit secundum se illicita — — — opera ac studio Ernesti de Eusebii civis Romani, was written by the Nuncio Fabio Chigi; I only believe, that it was printed under his Auspices and by his Order. The Author of it endeavoured to persuade, that the Peace, desired by the Protestants, was too disadvantageous to the Catholic Church, to be granted in Confidence by the Emperor. But all those Remonstrances were useless; they were forced to grant the Protestants many Things, that vexed the Court of Rome, and against which the Nuncio Chigi protested in a most violent manner, shaking the Dust from his Feet. The Pope thundered a Bull of the same Stile against the Treaty of Munster. All which was Time and Paper lost. Here I must observe, that there are many Manuscripts in Cardinal Chigi's Library, adorned with Notes written with Alexander VII's own Hand, and a great Collection of Authentic Acts and Pieces, drawn up and compiled by That Pope, and which shew his Application to Study (36). In the Book, which informs me of this, I have read one thing (37), which shews his Inclination for Learning; he got three Bookfellers from Holland to Rome, who deceived him basely about the Polyglot Bible of Paris; for they made him believe, that it was an Edition, which they undertook under his Auspices, and to his Honour; they caused a new Title to be printed to it, with an Epistle Dedicatory, as flattering as if some good Papists had been the Authors of it; but they could not hide their Fraud long. 'Ab ultimis Belgarum, Urbem Do-

CHOCQUET (LEWIS) a famous French Poet, about the middle of the XVIIth Century, and Author of a very rare and uncommon Work, some Extracts of which we shall give below [A]. He was unknown to La Croix du Maine, but not

(1) Sir Hans Sloane, a celebrated Physician of London, who has many curious Books in his large Library, did me the Favour to lend it me, and Dr Sibthorp took the trouble of conveying it to me.

[A] He is Author of a very uncommon Work, of which we shall give Extracts. The Copy, which was lent me (1), consists of Three Parts; the first of which is intituled, Le premier volume des Catholiques œuvres & Actes des Apostres redigez en escript par saint Luc Evangeliste & historiographe, depute par le saint Esprit. Iccluy saint Luc escriptuant a Theophile, avecques plusieurs histoires en iccluy inferrez des gestes des Césars. Et les demonstres des figures de L'apocalypse veues par saint Jeban Zebedee en l'Isle de Patmos sous Domitian césar, avecques les cruantez tant de Neron que d'icelluy Domitian. Le tout veu & corrigé bien & deurement selon la vraye verité, & joué par personnages à Paris en l'hôtel de Flandres l'an mil cinq cens XLI. Avec privilege du Roy. On les vend en la grand Salle du Palais par Arnoul & Charles les Angeliers freres, tenans leurs boutiques au premier & deuxiesme piliers devant la Chappelle de Messigneurs les Presidents. — The first Volume of the Catholic Works, and Acts of the Apostles, reduced to writing by St Luke Evangelist, and Historiographer, deputed by the Holy Ghost. This St Luke writing to Theophilus. With many Stories of the Césars inserted in it. And the demonstrations of the Figures of the Apocalypse, seen by St John the Son of Zebedee, in the Isle of Patmos, under César Domitian, with the cruelties, as well of Nero, as of the said Domitian. The whole seen and thoroughly corrected according to the true Truth, and acted by Personages at Paris in the Hôtel de Flandres, in the Year one thousand, five hundred, XLI. With the King's Privilege. Sold in the great Hall of the Palace, by Arnoul and Charles Angelier, Brothers, keeping their Shops at the first and second Pillars of the Chapel of Messieurs the Presidents. This first Volume contains, in Two hundred and ten Leaves, five Books of the Acts of the Apostles. Let us see the Title of the Second Part. Le second volume du Magnifique Mystere des Actes des Apostres continuant la narration de leurs faits & gestes selon l'escripture sainte, avecques plusieurs histoires en iccluy inferrees des gestes des Césars. Veü & corrigé bien & deurement selon la vraye verité, & ainsi que le mystere est joué à Paris ceste presente année mil cinq cens quarante & ung. Avec Privilege. — The second Volume of the Magnificent Mystery of the Acts of the Apostles, continuing the Narration of their Actions, according to the Holy Scripture, with many Stories inserted in it of the Actions of the Césars. Seen and thoroughly corrected according to the true Truth, and as the Mystery is acted at Paris, this present Year One thousand, five hundred, and forty One. With Privilege. This second Volume contains One hundred and sixty five Leaves, and ends at the ninth Book of the Acts of the Apostles. The Third Part is, l'Apocalypse saint Jeban Zebedee, ou sont comprinses les visions & revelations que iccluy saint Jeban eut en l'Isle de Patmos, le tout ordonne par figures convenables selon le texte de la sainte escripture. Ensemble les cruantez de Domitian César. Avec Privilege M. D. xli. — The Apocalypse of St John the Son of Zebedee, in which are comprised the Visions and Revelations, which the said St John had in the Island of Patmos, the whole disposed with Figures, suitable to the Text of the sacred Writings. Together with the Cruelties of César Domitian. With Privilege. M. D. xli. It contains Forty six Leaves, and was printed off the Twenty seventh of May 1541. The Work is in Folio.

Lewis Chocquet has prefixed his Name only to the Third Part. He has prefixed it two ways, first by a Latin Epigram on the back side of the first Leaf (2), and afterwards on the Top of the second Leaf; Here follows the Mystery of the Revelations of VOL. II.

'St John, with the Cruelties of Domitian, Emperor of Rome, composed by Master Lewis Chocquet.' We find no mention of him in the Licences for Printing. It was William Alabat, a Merchant residing at Bourges, who obtained the Privilege of Francis I, at Lyons, the Twenty fourth of July 1536. He obtained it for six Years. He sets forth, that, 'to the Honour and Praise of God, of our Holy Mother Church, and the Holy Catholic Faith, and for the Consolation of good and true Christians, he would willingly publish the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, in five or several Volumes which he had by him, and which had been composed in French Rime, and corrected at great charge and expence.' He and his Booksellers (3) had a suit before the Parliament of Paris, in the Year 1540, against Master Francis Hamelin, Francis Potrain, John Louvet, and Leonard Chollet, Masters and Undertakers of the Acts of the Apostles, at Paris, this Year. The Court forbid these four Undertakers to cause to be printed the Mystery of the said Acts of the Apostles by others, than those, who had the Privilege to print them, whatever addition they should make to them. We see, in a Ballad at the beginning of the Second Volume, the Names of these four Undertakers, and their Profession in these Terms.

Au Plafmateur rendent grace les quatre
De bon vouloir entre Parisiens
Les quels ont fait apparoir le Theatre
Bien ensuyvant les Rommains anciens
François de nom les deux, nen fant debatre
Lung Hamelin, l'autre Potrain, sciences
Lung en pratique, & l'autre pour sembrate
Tixtre tapis sous rethoriciens

Et Jehan Louvet operateur aux fleurs
Bien congnoissant des bons grains les meilleurs.
A iceux quatre honneur royal desire

Qui sont humains a vertu contredire.

The Four return thanks to the Creator, and wishing well to the People of Paris, they have opened the Theatre, exactly following the ancient Romans. Two of them are Francis Hamelin, and Francis Potrain, The former a Practitioner in Law; the other a Tapestry Maker; the third is Leonard Chovelet, a Butcher, and the fourth John Louvet, a Gardener and Florist. The Royal Honour favours these four, that they may abolish the Errors, which make Men contradict Virtue.

I report all these minute Particulars, because they may serve to illustrate some Circumstances of the Comedy of That Age. Some of these Circumstances are not in Moreri (4): for instance, we do not find in him, that the Hôtel de Flandres was the Place, where they exhibited, at Paris, Drammatical Representations of the Stories of sacred Scripture. But, the better to shew what the French Stage was at that time, I will cite some Fragments of our Chocquet's Pieces. They will suffice to inform us, that, at the same time that the People were forbidden to see the sacred Stories in the Book, which contains them faithfully and in purity, they were allowed to see them on the Stage, sullied with a thousand gross inventions, most part of which were expressed after Remark, by the way, that a very gross Mistake in the preceding Editions is corrected in this, but not without letting an Error of the Press creep in. There was in the foregoing Editions, sur quoi l'on peut voir Boccolini & Ragguaglio; and, in the Edition of 1699, they have put it sur quoy on peut voir Boccolini dans son Ragguaglio di Parnaso. It should be dans les Ragguagli di Parnaso.

not to Du Verdier, who has mentioned him in his Bibliothèque (a) as Author of a Folio, a low manner, and in the Style of a Farce-Player.

The first Story, described in this Volume, is the Election of an Apostle in the room of Judas. The Author meanly supposes, that the Apostles caused Lots to be drawn; for so I may call the Expedient, which he relates (5):

(c) First Book of the Acts of the Apostles, fol. 3.

Baillez les festus preparez
Ainsi que l'avons assigne.
Lung en y a qui a ung signe
Comme il appert, signe lavons
Pour lamour de nos compaignons.
Le second de signe na point,
Dont pour acheuer nostre poinct
Pierre, tenez les en uos mains,
Et eulx deux, qui font incertains
Ou le signe est, n'en quelle espee,
Viendront tirer chascun sa piece,
Et celluy auquel escherra
Le signe, subroge sera Au lieu qui est ja devise.

Deliver the prepared Straws, as we have marked them: One of them, as it appears, is marked; we have marked it for the sake of our Companions; the other has no Mark; now, to accomplish our Design, you, Peter, hold them in your Hands: and let those two, who do not know where the Mark is, or of what kind, come and draw each his Piece; and he, to whom the marked Piece shall fall, shall be chosen into the Place.

After drawing the two Straws, the Apostles examined who had the sign, and all together cryed out,

C'est Mathias:

It is Mathias:

upon which St Peter expresses himself thus:

Loue soit dieu,
Ca Mathias, entre nous autres
Faites nombre des douze Apostres.
Joyeux en suis, proficiat,
Conferme soyez en l'estat (6).

(6) Ibid.

Blessed be GOD; Mathias makes up, among us, the number of the Twelve Apostles: I rejoice at it; Success attend him; may he be confirmed in that Place.

Our Author very often brings Devils upon the Stage; and it is upon those Occasions the Poet exerts himself the most and chiefly uses his skill; but he ill supports the Characters, and, instead of inspiring Horror, he is more fit to excite Laughter. He gives himself up to Burlesque; so bad a Taste reigned at that time. He introduces Lucifer, who summons all the Devils; and he makes him say:

Dyables meschans destinez en terre estre,
Clos a jamais dans le centre terrestre,
Viendrez vous point a mes cris & aboys,
Sortez au feu de nostre infernal être
Par mes haulx cris vous puez bien congnoistre
Que c'est a droict que complaindre me doibs:
Haro, haro, nul de vous je ne veoyz,
Si ne venez desespérer m'en voys.
Dyables maudicts, Dyablesses, Dyabletons,
Courez en lair, traversez champs & boys
Fouldre geëlez, accordante a ma voix
Approchez tost dyaboliques luytons: &c (7).

(7) Ibid. fol. 3. verso.

Ye wicked Devils, doomed to inhabit the Earth, shut up for ever in it's Center, will not you come at my Call; quit the infernal Fire: By my loud cries you may be assured I have reason to complain. Haro, Haro, I yet see none of you: If you do not come I shall go mad. Ye Devils, Male and Female, great and small, fly in the Air, traverse the Fields and Woods, with Thunder and Lightning, obedient to my Voice. Approach immediately, ye Hobgoblins.

Satan answers:

Prince denfer tes cris as fait estendre
Si trefavant qu'ils font venus descendre
Jusques au sons des noires regions
Nos vils manoirs tu as presque fait fendre
Que te fault-il? Es tu prest de te pendre Dyables font hors par grandes legions (8).

(8) Ibid. fol. 4.

Prince of Hell, your Cries have penetrated to the very bottom of our gloomy Regions: You have almost split asunder our vile Mansions. What's the matter? Are you ready to hang yourself? The Devils are abroad by whole Legions.

Another Speech of Lucifer:

Haro, haro, approche toy grant Dyable,
Approche toy notayre mal fiable.
Fier Belyal procureur des enfers
Si tu ne fais ung faulx trait desuoyable
Nous perdons tout le genre humain saluable
Et demeurons seuls enchainez en fers.
Sur terre auons des ennemis peruers
Encontre nous machinans prescherie
Ce sont villains yssus de pescherie.
Voulans noncer de dieu la paix cherie.
Mais si vostre art a mort ne les ruïne
Ravis ferez tous a la boucherie
Si gay n'aura de qui la bouche rie
S'il le convient laisser metre en ruïne.

Haro, Haro, approach thou great Devil, approach thou Notary not to be trusted. Fierce Belial, Attorney of Hell; If you do not some treacherous enticing thing, we lose all the saveable part of human Kind, and remain alone chained in Irons. --- On Earth we have perverse Enemies, who have contrived Preaching against us; they are the villainous issue of Filibery, pretending to bear tidings of GOD's dear Peace. But if your art destroys them not, you will be all carried by force to the Butchery.

Another Answer of Satan:

Prince dampne de tenebre & bruyne
Loup ravissant, ton hurlement ne fine
Que te fault-il, as tu la rage au cueur?
Prens plomb fondu, chaulx, soufre, & poix refine
Metail bouillant qui seront drogue fine
Pour destouper ta maudicte rancœur.

Damned Prince of Darkness and Rain, ravenous Wolf, your Outcry has no end: What is the matter? Have you rage in your Heart? Take melted Lead, Chalk, Brimstone, and Pitch, a boiling Metal, which will be a fine Drug, to uncork your cursed Rancour.

Another Speech of Lucifer:

Après que Christ fut au tombeau rendu
Trois jours après de mort ressuscita
Et qui plus est tout vif se presenta
A ses amys qui ne sont pas des nostres,
Douze coquins qui se nomment Apostres,
Grans seducteurs de la loy Judaïque
Auxquels il dit le texte Evangelique

(9) First Book of the Acts of the Apostles, fol. 5.

Three Days after that CHRIST was laid in the Tomb, he rose from the Dead, and, what is more, presented himself alive to his Friends, who are not ours, Twelve Knaves, who call themselves Apostles, great Seducers from the Jewish Law, to whom he said, The Gospel must be maintained and preached by you: Afterwards he mounted up to Heaven before them all, leaving them all twelve on Earth; who, at present, wage hard War against us, in the City called Jerusalem, and all about the Country of Judea; which greatly perplexes us. Ye obscure Devils, be each incited to get these Varlets put to Death. If you suffer them to go on, it will be much worse for us. For this purpose, you Satan, go towards them, and give them Battle: To put an end to this cursed Rabble, transport yourself to the Priests of the Law, who are always wealthy, and, stirring up their cursed Avarice, give them notice of these Rascals.

Satan replies:

De tous les droicts assez entends l'affaire
Pour exploicter sans long temps pretendu
Au fonds d'enfer je puisse estre pendu
Si en brief temps je ne fais des merveilles
Puis qu'il convient que je souffle es oreilles
Bien tost mourront les coquins de Jesus.

I understand the business perfectly well, so as to finish it in a very short time, and may I be banged up at the bottom of Hell, if I do not speedily perform Wonders, and, since I must prompt them, the Knaves of JESUS will presently die.

Lucifer having divided among the Devils his Commissions, Satan speaks to him thus :

Voy Lucifer tous Dyables sont enclins
Par tours souldains mouvemens & declins
Dessus les champs leur deuoir tres bien faire,
Mais au depart pour mieulx nous satisfaire
Ta patte estends sur nos groings dyabolicques
Pour confermer nos esprits drachonicques Que recevons pour benediction (10).

(10) Ibid. fol.
5. verso.

See, Lucifer, all the Devils are ready, with Tricks and sudden Motions, to discharge well their Duty. But, before we depart, for our farther Satisfaction, stretch out your Paw over our Diabolical Snouts, and, to confirm us in our Dragon-like dispositions, let us receive your Benediction.

Lucifer replies :

Dyables damnez en malediction
Dessus vous tous par puissance interdite
Ma patte estends qui est de Dieu maudicte
Pour de tous maulx & malvaisies vous abouldre
Couverts foyez de fulminante fouldre.

Ye damned and accursed Devils, I stretch out my Paw, accurs'd of G O D, over you, by a forbidden

Power, to absolve you from all mischief and evil Actions; and may you be covered from the force of Thunder.

Is not this to turn into ridicule, and indirectly to burlesque the Holy and Apostolical Ceremony of laying on of Hands?

After these Dialogues of Devils, we meet with others which are worse in their kind; for the discourses, which the Author supposes to be holden between GOD and JESUS CHRIST, are utterly unworthy of the Majesty of the Subject. The Constables, who imprison the two Apostles, that healed a lame Man, speak in such burlesque terms, that it is a perfect Farce.

Slow-pace, Messenger of the high Priest Annas, exceeds in Burlesque, as follows:

C'est rage comme je chopine
De chanter ne me puis tenir,
Toutes les fois que je chemine
Il n'est chose qui ne se mine
J'ay huy si bien tire lauraille
Puis le matin a ma bouteille
Que tout est pieca mis en vente

Let us produce some Fragments of the Dialogue between Annas and Catphas.

(13) He speaks of the two Apostles, Peter and John, in Prison.

Et

it is a Volume, in which the Acts of the Apostles, and the Revelation of St John are put into French Rime, &c. (§ a). He has neglected to give Extracts of it, tho' it be not usual with him to omit doing so, when a Book contains things a little uncommon. He has even frequently recited long Passages, which have nothing curious. We have reason therefore to wonder, that he has cited nothing of the Poetry of Lewis Chocquet; for we find in it very strange and surprizing Scenes. We will supply this defect, and make this Work a little better known, than it is in Du Verdier.

[§ a) The Acts of the Apostles, of which Mr Bayle gives here some extracts, were not written by Lewis Chocquet, but by Arnoul and Simon Greban, Brothers; as la Croix du Maine informs us in his Bibliothèque, p. 24, 456, and 391. Mr Bayle was deceived by du Verdier, who, in his Bibliothèque, p. 796, ascribes to Chocquet both the Acts of the Apostles and the Apocalypse of St John, tho' he is only the Author of the Apocalypse. See in the Letters of Mr Bayle, printed at Amsterdam in 1729, the Remarks on the CCXLVth Letter, Tom III. p. 921, & seq. Concerning these pious Comedies, see Mr Rymer's Short View of Tragedy, Chap. V. p. 53. & seq. REM. CRIT.] quite the contrary. Tell me freely, if you did so; I will procure you a Pardon; and besides, I will get for you some Money, to provide well for yourself, more than They have: We are sure they bribed you with Money, to say, that They restored you to Strength and Health, that they might be talked off over the City as workers of undeniable Miracles.*

By these Specimens of the first Book, you may judge of the whole Volume; but it must be remembered, that they are not so grotesque as a multitude of other Passages.

Observe, that the Author carefully follows the popular Traditions. He foists in (16) a long Episode concerning Dionysius the Areopagite, and his Ordination to the Episcopacy. He foists in (17) another much longer concerning the Death, Resurrection, and Assumption of the Holy Virgin. These Theatrical Performances were applauded in the former times;
but at present they are looked on as wretched things.
Here I must cite the following Verses of Boileau.

Chez nos devots Ayeux le Théâtre abhorré
Fut long-tems dans la France un plaisir ignoré.
De Pelerins, dit-on, une troupe grossiere
En public à Paris y monta la première,
Et söttement zélée en sa simplicité
Joüa les Saints, la Vierge, & Dieu, par piété.
Le Savoir à la fin dissipant l'Ignorance
Fit voir de ce projet la dévöte imprudence.
On chassa ces Docteurs préchant sans mission,
On vit renaitre Hector, Andromaque, Iliön (18).

*In pious Days of Yore, a barbarous Stage,
In France, gave Pleasure to an ignorant Age.
Pilgrims for Players wou'd, at first, go down,
Their monstrous Farces follow'd by the Town.
The Company, religiously severe,
Made Saints and Martyrs in the Scene appear;
The Holy Virgin, and ev'n GOD was there.
Knowledge at length put Ignorance to flight;
A Zeal so indiscrete exposed to light;
Drove th' uncommission'd Doctors from the Stage;
Andromache reviv'd in Tragic Rage,
And Troy and Hector charm'd once more the Age.*

If you would have a Comment on this, read these words (19). 'It is certain, that Pilgrimages introduced these devout Representations. Those, who ' returned from Jerusalem and the Holy Land, from
' St James of Compostella, St Baume of Provence, St
' Reine, Mount St Michael, Notre Dame du Puy,
' and other places of Piety, composed Songs on their Judgment, after a gross manner, but which the singing and Simplicity of the Times seem to render pathetic; they sung the Miracles of Saints, their Martyrdom, and certain Fables, to which the Credulity of the People gave the Name of Visions and Apparitions. These Pilgrims, who went in Companies, and who took their Stands in Streets, and public Places, where they sung with their Staves in their Hands, and their Hats and Mantles covered with Shells, and painted Images of divers Colours, formed a kind of Spectacle, which pleased, and which excited the Piety of some Citizens of Paris, to raise a Fund for purchasing a proper place to erect a Theatre, on which to represent these Mysteries on Holy-Days, as well for the Instruction of the People, as their Diversion. Italy had public Theatres for the Representation of these Mysteries; one of them I saw at Veletri, in the Road from Rome to Naples, in a public Place, where it is not forty Years since they left off to represent the Mysteries of the Life of the Son of God. These pious Spectacles appeared so fine in those ignorant Ages, that they made them the principal Ornaments of the Reception of Princes, when they made their Entry into Cities; and, as they sung a Christmas Carol instead of the cries of Long live the King, they represented in the Streets the good Samaritan, the wicked rich Man, the Passion of JESUS CHRIST, and several other Mysteries, at the Reception of our Kings. The Psalms and Pious Devotions of the Church were the Opera of those times. They walked in Procession before those Princes with the Banners of the Churches; they sung to their Praise Hymns composed of several Passages of Scripture, tacked together, to make Allusions to the principal Actions of their Reigns.

CHRYSEIS, the Daughter of Chryses, Priest of Apollo, is more known by This Patronymic Name, than by That of Astynome, which was her proper Name. She was taken by Achilles, when he plundered Lyrnessus, and some other Places near Troy. She was married to the King of that Country (a). Agamemnon, finding her to his Taste, kept her for himself, and was so far from restoring her to good Chryses, who was come to redeem her, clothed with his Priestly Ornaments, and furnished with a very great Ransom, that he drove him unworthily from him (b). We learn from Homer, why he would keep This Concubine [A]. Chryses prayed to Apollo to revenge him, and was heard; the Plague infected the Greek Army, and did not cease, till, by the Advice of the Diviner Calchas, Chryseis was restored to her Father (c). She was with Child, and yet she boasted that no one had touched her; but, when she could hide it no longer, she maintained, that it was not the Work of a Man, but of the God Apollo (d). The Son she was delivered of was called Chryses. He learned his Extraction somewhat late; but it was soon enough to do good Service to his Brother Orestes [B]. Some say, that [A] We learn from Homer, why he would keep This Concubine. He declared, in the Council of War, that he preferred her before his Wife Clytemnestra, whom he had married a Maid, and that Chryseis did not yield to Clytemnestra either in Beauty, Wit, or Handy-work.

He had already told Chryses, that he would detain Chryseis till she became old, and that he pretended to keep her to make Linnen-Cloth for him, and also to lie with him.

VOL. II. N^o. XLVI.

Mine is thy Daughter, Priest, and shall remain,
And Prayers, and Tears, and Bribes shall plead in vain,
Till Time shall rifle every youthful Grace,
And Age dismiss her from my cold Embrace,
In daily Labours of the Loom employ'd,
And doom'd to deck the Bed she once enjoy'd.

POPE.

Mr Perrault, laughing at this Place of the Iliad, mistook one Name for another: Let Agamemnon, says he, keep Briseis, the Daughter of the Great Priest, to make him Linnen-Cloth (3). I must observe, that Agamemnon, though never so well pleased with Chryseis, declared to the Council of War, that, if they would make him amends for her, he would restore her, if it was necessary to prevent the Destruction of the Army. He actually restored her, but made himself amends at the Expence of Achilles, from whom he took Briseis (4). Achilles left off fighting, from whence proceeded an infinite number of Evils; and thus the Misfortunes of That War were always occasioned by Women. If three or four Persons could have lain without Women, it might have saved the Lives of Two or Three hundred thousand Men. The Case was not so deplorable, nor so base, when it was said:

[B] Her Son — did good Service to his Brother Orestes.] By helping the Matter a little, we find, in the Hundred and Twenty first Chapter of Hyginus, that Orestes and Iphigenia, being fled from the Chersonesus Taurica, with the Statue of Diana, landed in the Isle of Smintha, where Chryses was the Priest of Apollo. Young Chryses, I mean the Son Iphigenia was the Daughter of Agamemnon and of Chryses (e). Others relate, that Chryses, being informed of the good Treatment that his Daughter had received from the Greeks, brought her back again to their Army, and returned her to Agamemnon (f). We have shewed, in the Remarks of the Article BRISEIS, that Horace reasoned ill, when he made use of That Greek Prince's Example, to prove that his Friend ought not to be ashamed to love his Servant-maid. I shall remark here, that Briseis and Chryseis were first Cousins [C].

Son of Agamemnon and Chryseis, had a mind to send these two Persons back again to Thos King of Taurica; but his Father acquainted him with the Fraternity, that was between him and those two new Comers. Then young Chryses joined with Orestes, and both returned into Taurica to kill Thos; which having performed, they went to Mycenæ with the Statue of Diana. This is ill enough related in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary; they have added some Circumstances to it which are in Hyginus, and forgot those, which are in That Author, and yet he is the only one that is cited. Stephanus Byzantinus informs us, that the City of Chryseopolis took its Name from Chryses, the Son of Agamemnon and of Chryseis. Those who say, that This Woman maintained, she had brought her Chastity sound and whole from the Greek Army, say no improbable thing; for it is the common Talk of almost all the Women, who are carried away, or who are in Towns taken by Assault (6). It was a very convenient Thing, for a Woman, at the Time of the Siege of Troy, to be allowed to say, that she was with Child by a God.

[C] Briseis and Chryseis were first Cousins.] For Bryses and Chryses were Brothers. Εἰς τὸν γὰρ καὶ Χρύσης ἀδελφοὶ ἦσαν, παῖδες Ἀδρύου. They are Eustathius's Words (7). The learned and obliging Mr Drelincourt gave me notice of This Passage.

CHRYSIPPUS, the natural Son of Pelops [A], was of an incomparable Beauty (a). Laius became passionately in love with him, and carried him away (b); but he was so speedily pursued, that they took his Prey from him, and carried him Prisoner to Pelops, who pardoned him that Action, considering that Love had drove him to it. Pelops's Affection for Chrysippus was greater than That which he had for his Legitimate Children; for which reason his Wife Hippodamia, animated with all the Spite of a Step-Mother, exhorted two of her Sons, Atræus and Thyestes, to take away this Bastard's Life: She did not question but that one Day he would aspire to the Crown. They refused to perform that base Action; upon which she resolved to do it her self: for which purpose, she took Laius's Sword, while he slept, and killed Chrysippus with it. The Suspicions fell on Laius, because of his Sword; but Chrysippus had time enough, before he died, to clear him. Pelops was contented to turn away Hippodamia (c). Some Authors (d) say, That she did not kill Chrysippus with her own Hand, but that she caused Atræus and Thyestes to commit that Murder; and that, after they had killed Chrysippus, they threw him into a Well. Their Father would see them no more; and they retired into Triphylia (e). Some say (f), That he was not indulgent enough to be satisfied with banishing his Wife, and that he was resolved to revenge the Death of Chrysippus chiefly upon her, but that he could not do it, because she fled to Midea (g). Others say, That, seeing her self accused by her Husband, she killed herself (h). We learn from Thucydides, that Atræus fled to his Nephew Euristheus, King of Mycenæ (i). We must not think, that this Chrysippus differs from him, whom Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and Firminus Maturnus, have associated with Ganymede [B]. This Son of Pelops has not been mentioned yet in Moreri's Dictionary,

[A] He was the natural Son of Pelops.] Some say, that the Mistress, by whom he had This fine Child, was the Nymph Danaë (1). Others call her Acte (2) or Apsyche (3); but the Scholiast upon Homer pretends, that Chrysippus's Mother was Pelops's lawful Wife. Consult him upon the Hundred and fifth Verse of the second Book of the Iliad. He speaks, as others do, of Hippodamia's Jealousy, and of the Murder committed by Atræus and by Thyestes, and he quotes Hellanicus.

[B] We must not imagine, that this Chrysippus differs from him, whom Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius - - - have associated with Ganymede.] Clemens Alexandrinus upbraids the Pagans with the Pederasty of their Gods, and makes use of these Words: Οὐδὲ γὰρ ἐδὲ παῖδων ἀπέσχετο οἱ παρ' ἡμῶν θεοί. ὁ μὲν τις, Τάλλε, ὁ δὲ Τάκινος, ὁ δὲ Πέλοπος, ὁ δὲ Χρυσίππου, ὁ δὲ Γανυμήδης ἐραῖντες. τίς τις ὅτων αἱ γυναῖκες περσχυνοῦσιν τὸς θεούς, τοῖς τε δὲ ἐν χερσὶν εἶναι τὸς ἀνδρας τὸς ἐαυτῶν, οὕτω σώζοντας, ἵνα ἴσιν ὁμοιοὶ τοῖς θεοῖς, τὰ ἴσα ἐμμελῶτες. Nam nec à pueris quidem dii vestri abstinere: unus quidem Hyllam, alius verò Hyacinthum, alius Pelopem, alius Chrysippum, alius autem Ganymedem, amantes. Hos deos vestre uxores adoret, tales autem suos esse maritos precentur, adeo temperantes, ut sint diis similes, familia consecantes (4). — For your Gods abstained not even from Boys; One being in love with Hylas, another with Hyacinthus, another with Pelops, another with Chrysippus, and another with Ganymede. Let your Wives worship these Gods, and let them pray that their Husbands may be such, so temperate, as to be like Gods, following the same things. Arnobius, who copies this Passage, and a great many others, out of the same Father, expresses himself likewise in an indeterminate manner: 'Quid, quod non contenti feminei generis attri- buisse diis curas, etiam sexus adiungitis adamatos ab his mares? Hylam nescio quis diligit: Hyacintho est alius occupatus: ille Pelopis desiderii flagrat: hic in Chrysippum suspirat ardentius: Catamitus rapitur delictum futurum, & poculorum cultus: & ut Jovis dicatur pullus, in partibus Fabius aduritur mollibus, obignaturque posticis (5). — What! is it not enough that you make your Gods enamoured with the Female Sex, but you must make them in love with the Male likewise. One of them is in love with Hylas; another is taken up with Hyacinthus: This God burns with desire of Pelops: That sighs more ardently after Chrysippus: A Catamite is carried away, to be a favourite and a Cup-bearer; and, that he may be called Jove's Young-One, Fabius is burnt in the soft Parts, and marked behind. Firminus Maturnus is a little more particular: he not only names Jupiter in relation to Ganymede, but also Hercules in relation to Hylas, and Apollo concerning Hyacinthus: Only he has not named the Lovers of Chrysippus.

It is not true, that this Disciple of Erasistratus composed Georgics; for it is a Work, which Diogenes Laërtius ascribes to another Chrysippus (l).

Pederast may find Ganymede in Jupiter's Arms, may see Hercules with all the Impatience of a Lover seeking after Hylas, and may learn that Apollo was in love with Hyacinthus. Another may see Chrysippus, another Pelops; inasmuch that he may say, he is authorized by his Gods to do, whatever is at present most severely punished by the Roman Laws. His Commentator (7) has nothing to say. I have looked in vain for some Note, in Theodorus Canterus, in Godefridus Steucrius, in Gebhartus Elmenhorstius, and in De-fiderius Heraldus, four famous Commentators on Arnobius: I have found them all as dumb as Fishes, as to what concerns our Chrysippus, and the God, or the Hero, who loved him criminally. But what may be the Reason, why the three ancient Authors, whom I have cited, keep to such indeterminate Expressions on this last point, and even that the first did not name the Lovers of Hyacinthus and Ganymede? It would be rash and unjust to suspect him of Artifice, as if, knowing that he, who loved Chrysippus, was a meer Man, he durst not name him; and that, lest it should be thought, that there was some Design in this Forgetfulness, he, at the same time, suppressed the Names of the rest. Let us say, that either his Memory deceived him, and that, having confused Ideas, he mixed Chrysippus with the Boys, whom the Gods had loved; or rather let us say, that he remembered, that certain Authors (8) attributed to Jupiter, what almost all the rest attributed to Laius. Let us keep to this last Tradition, and let us say, that the Lover of this fair Youth was neither a God, nor a Demi-God; he was a Theban (9), the Son of Labdacus. Consult Athenæus, who will inform you, that Laius, being lodged with Pelops, fell in love with Chrysippus, the Son of his Host, and fled away with him to Thebes (10). That Author adds, that it was said, that Laius was the first, who loved in this manner. Ælian says the same thing, and that it was the reason, why the Thebans thought it a fine and laudable thing to make love in that manner

(11). Note, that, according to Hyginus, it was Thebes, who ran away with Chrysippus (12); but it is probable the passage is corrupted: See the ingenious Conjecture of Mr Perizonius (13), by which, instead of quem Thebes ludis rapuit, he will have it to be read quem Nemeis Laius rapuit. In effect, Hyginus had said, in his Eighty fifth Chapter, that Laius had carried away Chrysippus at the Nemean Games (14). Note, that he adds, that Pelops recovered him, having made War with the Ravisher. Note also, that Pisander was of Opinion, that the young Man was so ashamed of his Adventure, that he killed himself. Pisander apud Eurip. Scholiast. pag. 402. [C] Moreti's Dictionary says nothing of CHRYSIPPUS of Tyana.] Jonfius pretends, that A- thenæus gave him the Elogy of most venerable Writer (16); but it is meer Irony in the Mouth of one of the Interlocutors of Athenæus; and we may justly compare this with the Docte Cati, mentioned above (17). There is more reason to say, that Athenæus called him an ingenious Talker about Tarts and Cakes. Σοφός περὶ μαζῶν λόγος. Sapiens ille Pemmatum Scriptor (18).
